Wednesday 15 November 1995

Mercredi 15 novembre 1995

The committee met at 1533 in committee room 1.

ELECTION OF CHAIR

Clerk of the Committee (Mr Douglas Arnott): Honourable members, it is my duty to call upon you to elect one of your membership as Chair of the resources development committee. Are there any nominations, please?

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): I nominate Steve Gilchrist.

Clerk of the Committee: Are there any further nominations? There being no further nominations, I declare the nominations closed and Mr Gilchrist duly elected Chair of the committee.

ELECTION OF VICE-CHAIR

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): I'll take my name plate and go.

We'll move immediately to the election of a Vice-Chair. I call for nominations for Vice-Chair of the committee.

Mr Bob Wood (London South): I'd like to nominate Barb Fisher as the Vice-Chair of the committee.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Wood. Are there any further nominations?

Ms Frances Lankin (Beaches-Woodbine): Can I second that?

Ms Marilyn Churley (Riverdale): And I'll third it.

The Chair: Thank you. Are there any further nominations? There being none, I declare nominations are closed and congratulate Barb Fisher on her election as Vice-Chair. Thank you. Good luck, Barb.

Now, has someone got a copy of this motion?

APPOINTMENT OF SUBCOMMITTEE

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-Walkerville): I move that a subcommittee on committee business be appointed to meet from time to time at the call of the Chair or at the request of any member thereof to consider and report to the committee on the business of the committee; that the presence of all members of the subcommittee is necessary to constitute a meeting and that the subcommittee be composed of the following members: Mr Gilchrist as Chair, Mr Baird, Mr Duncan, and Mr Christopherson; and that any member may designate a substitute member on the subcommittee who is of the same recognized party.

The Chair: Anyone wish to speak to the motion?

All in favour of the motion as read? Contrary if any? Carried. Thank you, Mr Duncan.

BRIEFING

The Chair: I guess that's the end of the official agenda, but Mr Arnott has indicated that he'd like a few minutes to give us a bit of the history of the committee. Some of the members of the committee are blessed with that firsthand knowledge, but for the rest of us I'm sure it would be very illuminating.

Clerk of the Committee: If you can't hear me, I'll try to speak a little louder.

The standing committee on resources development, as you know, is one of four policy field committees. These policy field committees consider business either as it's referred from the House or as the committee itself may initiate it pursuant to either standing orders 108 or 125.

I'll just give you a brief overview of the provisions and of the past history of the committee in the 35th Parliament.

In terms of referrals from the House, there may be three categories of business referred: government bills, private members' public bills and special studies by order of the House, by special reference of the House, and all three matters pertained in the last Parliament.

The resources development committee considered nine government bills in the last Parliament: three in the first session, two in the second session and four in the third session. Among the bills considered were: An Act to amend certain Acts concerning Collective Bargaining; Workers' Compensation and Occupational Health and Safety Amendment Act; Power Corporation Act; An Act to establish the Ontario Training and Adjustment Board; the Farm Registration and Farm Organizations Funding Act; and the Ottawa-Carleton French-Language School Board Act. As you'll see, the last one there really doesn't seem to be of the same category of ministries that normally fall under resources development committee policy grouping. You may find this from time to time: that bills are referred for reasons other than the fact that they would normally fall under the policy field grouping that is assigned to a committee.

In the category of private members' public bills, this committee in the last Parliament considered two and reported them to the House. Those were the Highway Traffic Amendment Act dealing with bicycle helmets and a bill dealing with slow moving vehicle signs.

In terms of the one special reference to this committee, by special order of the House the committee undertook a study and reported to the House on graduated licensing.

In terms of initiatives by the committee itself, this committee, as is the case with the other three policy field committees, is empowered "to study and report on all matters relating to the mandate, management, organization or operation of the ministries" or the offices that are assigned to this committee, and that assignment will take place in very short order. That is required to be done by the Legislative Assembly committee. So we will know soon which ministries or offices are assigned to each policy field committee, as well as the agencies, boards and commissions that relate to those, who report to those ministries and offices.

So as long as the subject matter relates to a ministry assigned to the committee, then the details and duration of a study undertaken pursuant to standing order 108 are entirely at the committee's discretion. Standing order 108 is usually used when the committee as a whole agrees on what it wishes to study, and the result of a study under the standing order may be a substantive report containing recommendations.

In the last Parliament, this committee did use standing order 108. It presented a report to the House on its observations and recommendations with regard to the hearings it held on the private member's bill referred to it, dealing with bicycle helmets. When legislation is referred to a standing committee, the report of the committee normally is the legislation reported back to the House. There cannot be a report of commentary on the legislation normally. In this case, after going through the hearings on the subject of bicycle helmets and Bill 124, the private member's public bill, the committee decided it wanted to report its observations and make some recommendations to the House, and it was able to do that under standing order 108.

In terms of standing order 125, designated matters, the committee in the last Parliament did see more of those. Standing order 125 provides that in each calendar year each member of the subcommittee, except the Chair, can designate a matter other than a bill to be considered by the committee for a period of up to 12 hours. There are only two restrictions on this study: The matter must relate, again, to a ministry or office that's assigned to the committee; and the study cannot exceed 12 hours.

I'll be discussing standing order 125, designated matters, with the subcommittee when it meets, since it is the subcommittee whose prerogative it is to make a report on that issue and that report is deemed to be adopted; it's not a matter that the committee itself can debate and amend once the subcommittee reports on a standing order 25 issue. In any other case, a subcommittee report, under normal circumstances, would be debatable, amendable, once it's presented from subcommittee.

In the last Parliament, this committee considered five designated matters. It was either under standing order 125 or the predecessor, 123. It presented three reports on those. I have two of them here, and one of them seems to be out of print, on exotic species, purple loosestrife and zebra mussels. The other two dealt with service delivery at the Workers' Compensation Board and the state of emergency and the income crunch in Ontario agriculture.

In terms of attaching priority to the business that comes before committee, the standing orders clearly state that it's government business that takes first priority.

Standing order 125, designated matters, may follow that. But it is government bills that take first priority.

Seated to the left of the Chair is the committee's research officer assigned by the legislative research service, Ray McLellan. Ray may wish to add some comments with regard to the work provided by research officers to committees.

Mr Ray McLellan: I think you've probably covered off most of the topics. I'm new to this particular committee. I've spent a number of years on public accounts and finance and agencies, boards and commissions, so it's relatively new territory for me.

I think Doug has really covered off our two primary functions. Essentially, we work at the instruction of the committee in the preparation of these reports, dealing with both legislation and, as Doug has outlined, referrals from the House. After the hearings are completed, we're sent away on the instruction of the committee to draft these reports and to prepare recommendations and come back and the committee has an opportunity to review the report and to comment and to amend or to instruct us further to either modify or in any way change those reports. So we're operating, obviously, at the instruction of the Chair and the committee.

The Chair: Well, we have certainly a vast range of potential topics. I won't make a speech on this one but I'm looking forward. I think this has the potential to be a very interesting committee and I really do hope that we can conduct debate in here in a way that's productive and in the best interests of the people who put us here.

I would encourage all members, if they have an interest in a specific area that they think might be worthy for consideration under 125, to speak to the relevant subcommittee members. We will discuss that promptly. In addition, I guess we must be prepared to stand ready for whatever legislation that's sent our way. I take it the meetings then are at the call of the Chair.

Mr Christopherson, I see, is still tied up there, so I'll have to speak to him, but I wonder if perhaps we could arrive at a mutually convenient time for the subcommittee. After this meeting we'll stay around for a minute and see if we can get Mr Christopherson—oh, are you subbing?

Ms Lankin: But I can't speak to that issue because I am subbing.

The Chair: We'll work on a mutually convenient time, because it's my understanding that the subcommittee also deals with some of the procedural matters: how the Chair recognizes, either in rotation or first hand up, that sort of thing. So I'd like to get those out of the way so we're not taking up valuable committee time if a bill does get referred to it.

Ms Churley: Mr Chair, I can act as sub for the subcommittee person today.

The Chair: Okay, thank you, Ms Churley. Ms Lankin, did you have a question?

Ms Lankin: Yes, to Mr Arnott. I was just wondering, for those of us who've never been on committee before, myself included, if you would introduce the other members of the Legislative Assembly staff who are here and their roles.

Clerk of the Committee: To my right is the Hansard reporter or Hansard interjectionist. Then to the right again is the console operator from the Broadcast and Recording Service. Broadcast and recording, of course, then makes an audio tape of all committee proceedings. That is used by the Hansard transcribers to produce the verbatim transcript of every committee meeting.

The tapes alone would not always provide a sensible transcript, and that is why the tapes are supplemented by the Hansard reporter who will record interjections, record the beginnings of sentences, the ends of sentences, search out unusual words, place names, proper names that may be used by members in debate in order to supplement the tapes.

Mr Baird: If there are no more questions from anyone, I'd move adjournment.

The Chair: All in favour? Carried. Thank you, all, and I look forward to seeing you as the pressures dictate.

The committee adjourned at 1549.

Consideration of Bill 15, An Act to amend the Workers' Compensation Act and the Occupational Health and Safety Act / Projet de loi 15, Loi modifiant la Loi sur les accidents du travail et la Loi sur la santé et la sécurité au travail.

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): It being 3:30, the standing committee on resources development is called to order. Today we're beginning our hearings on Bill 15, An Act to amend the Workers' Compensation Act and the Occupational Health and Safety Act.

MINISTRY OF LABOUR

The Chair: My name is Steve Gilchrist. I'm the Chairman. It's my pleasure to greet our guests today and the members of the committee. We will commence with a brief opening statement by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour, with responses from the opposition critics.

Following the opening statements, we'll hear from our first presenters. Each presentation has been scheduled for 15 minutes exactly, which the witnesses may use as they wish. Any part of that time they choose to leave for members' questions will be up to them.

I propose to divide the question time available, if any, equally among the three parties and to rotate recognizing questioners, starting with the official opposition on the first round. If there's no other business, I'll now recognize the parliamentary assistant for up to 10 minutes.

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): The minister has asked me to appear on her behalf today. Unfortunately, she's sick at home with the flu and wanted me to apologize for not having the opportunity to meet with the committee to make an opening statement. So I'm pleased, on her behalf, to appear before you to introduce Bill 15.

As I present the bill for public hearings to the committee today, I do so mindful that the window of opportunity for turning around the Workers' Compensation Board is rapidly closing.

That Ontario's workers' compensation system has serious problems is beyond dispute, even among members in this room. The board has by far the highest unfunded liability in the country. It has a staggering $11.4-billion unfunded liability. On top of that, it has the second-highest assessment rates in the country. High assessment rates and a huge unfunded liability are problem enough. They are a drain on the economy and a deterrent to future investment and job creation in the province of Ontario.

What makes the situation even more desperate is that the board long ago stopped meeting the needs of its principal clients: the employers and workers of the province of Ontario. Management and governance is ineffective, and there is no sense that the board is accountable to either its stakeholders or to government. Our government is determined to turn around the deteriorating situation. We're doing so quickly, but we are also doing so thoughtfully.

Bill 15 begins this essential process of reform. It overhauls the governance, management and accountability of the board and also provides the tools a revamped WCB needs to ensure compliance with the legislation.

With these reforms, the stage is set for the second set of reforms based on the recommendations of my caucus colleague, the minister without portfolio responsible for WCB reform, Cam Jackson. He is conducting a study into what injuries are compensated, how they are compensated and at what level. His recommendations will fix the financial problems with the system and retire the unfunded liability by the year 2014.

Mr Jackson is examining the adjudication system, the service delivery system, as well as how the government will meet its commitment to reduce employer assessment rates. He will report to cabinet next spring.

More immediately, though, Bill 15 is why we're here today. Specifically, Bill 15 establishes a new multi-stakeholder governance structure, introduces a new accountability framework, introduces measures to ensure that the board operates according to sound financial practices, and adds provisions which strengthen the board's ability to aggressively attack the problem of both worker and employer fraud.

In addition to these measures, there are amendments that reflect the changes the government has made to the Workplace Health and Safety Agency and amendments to the purpose clause of the WCB to reflect the shared objective of improved workplace health and safety.

Bill 15 establishes a new, more representative multi-stakeholder board of directors. Our intention is to broaden representation on the board beyond simply employers and labour. This amendment is necessary because bipartite governance structures have proven in the province of Ontario to be both ineffective and, in the end, unsuccessful.

ful in the government's view. It recognizes that other stakeholders also have legitimate interests in the well-being of the system, and their expertise will contribute to a well-governed Workers' Compensation Board.

We've also strengthened the purpose clause to ensure that all WCB activities are carried out in a financially accountable manner. While a financial accountability provision does already exist in the purpose clause, it applies only to the board of directors. It does not go far enough in ensuring that the whole compensation system makes financial sustainability a priority, let alone a top priority.

We are amending the legislation to require the board to prepare a five-year strategic plan, a statement of priorities for administering the act and regulations and a statement of the board's investment policies and goals.

Bill 15 also gives the minister permanent authority to issue policy directions to the board of directors. These and other related amendments recognize that while the WCB remains an independent, self-funded agency, the government retains an overriding public interest in its successful operation.

The bill imposes a requirement on the WCB to conduct annual value-for-money audits. These are tools used by organizations to ensure that efficiency, economy and effectiveness are achieved in the delivery of programs. These audits will be undertaken by an external auditor.

The bill introduces a new offences and penalties section. It clarifies the board's authority to prosecute and impose sanctions for illegal acts. New obligations are created for employers and workers to provide the WCB with material information. These new provisions place positive obligations on workers and employers to report to the board when there are changes in circumstances that, in the case of workers, affect their rights to benefits or, in the case of employers, affect their obligations under the act.

This legislation is all about proper administration and giving the board the tools it needs to go after all forms of fraud. It recognizes that fraud and abuse of the workers' compensation system is a problem for both workers and employers, as well as for taxpayers in the province of Ontario. Thus, it will become an explicit requirement for employers who must register with the WCB to do so within 10 days of beginning operations. Failure to register will be made an offence under the act, subject to penalties.

The act establishes for the first time fines of up to $25,000 for individuals who are convicted of an offence under the act. Maximum fines for corporations are increased to $100,000. Directors and officers can now be convicted of wrongdoing.

Other measures give the board authority to order restitution; in other words, the board will now be able to collect moneys owing to it, a power it did not previously have. In addition to these provisions, further amendments are proposed for the purpose clause to make occupational health and safety a priority objective of the WCB. I believe that this change is long overdue.

We are also amending the Occupational Health and Safety Act to reflect the changes previously made to the governance structure of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency. This includes the revocation of order-in-council appointments of the board of directors and the appointment of an executive director to administer the agency.

In conclusion, I'm very pleased to present this bill to the committee for your review. As I mentioned to you at the outset, the objectives of these reforms are to establish an effective multipartite governance structure; provide stronger, more effective management at the WCB; establish a new accountability framework; provide the WCB with the tools that will allow it to administer and enforce the act, and set the stage for the systematic reforms that will be introduced following Minister Cam Jackson's study.

As I review our government's objectives for this first stage of reforms, I am confident this strategy is right. I am confident we have reflected and implemented the strategy correctly in the drafting of this bill. Having said that, I recognize that the committee has a very important task in front of it. No doubt it will be hearing from many interested groups who will have comments and suggestions to make. I know too that members themselves will have valuable input of their own. So on behalf of Minister Witmer and the government, I want to say that I'm looking forward to the committee's deliberations and am committed to working with you to achieve the best possible results for the people of the province of Ontario.

The Chair: Mr Duncan will be responding on behalf of the official opposition, 10 minutes.

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-Walkerville): I want to begin by saying that it's good to be having hearings on a bill of this import, a bill affecting injured workers and employers across the province. We weren't given that opportunity with Bill 7, so this is indeed a pleasure.

I want to take a few minutes to discuss some of the aspects of the bill that we see as problematic, because I think we probably all agree that there is a financial problem, a crisis at the board that needs to be addressed in a substantive manner. To that extent, we are a bit disappointed that the government has brought forward a bill that really doesn't deal with the substantive issues. We had anticipated that we would be dealing with WCB reform in its entirety. Indeed, based on the government's own commitments prior to the election and during the election, we assumed that the reform the government envisioned would be out sooner than it's going to be.

We want to begin by saying that this is only a very small component of reform that needs to be undertaken, and we're disappointed that we can't be dealing with the entire package all at once.

With respect to the substance of the bill, I want to begin by talking about the bipartite versus the multi-stakeholder model. As members of the committee are aware, our party supports the multistakeholder model. We did so in the pre-election period, we did so during the election and we continue to believe that the multi-stakeholder approach is the proper approach.

Where we part company with the government in terms of Bill 15 is in the lack of definition of "multistake-holder," the three to seven members of the board, without giving any kind of specifics with respect to whether that will be one labour representative and six management representatives. We'll be bringing forward some amendments to give precision to that, that would see us in effect say we have to have equal representation. We'll also bring forward amendments with respect to specificity around the question of who the other stakeholders are.

Again, as you know, we did that in our Back to the Future document, which formed the basis of our party's position on workers' compensation reform. We'll be talking about those issues in greater length in committee here and we'll, as I say, be bringing forward amendments.

The value-for-money audits are an interesting concept that's been used in other jurisdictions and by other levels of government to some effect and with some success. I don't think that we ought to assume somehow that these value-for-money audits are going to fix the problem. I'll give you a for instance. Members of the committee will be aware that with respect to the WCB's accident fund, it has an outside audit done every year now. It's done this year, I believe, by Towers Perrin. The portfolio is analysed with respect to its investment objectives as well as with respect to rates of return relative to other funds of a similar nature. So value-for-money audits are useful in some instances, are indeed being used by the board now in parts of its operation.

What we don't want to see happen, however, is if these value-for-money audits become a tool by which we justify cuts to injured workers in the future. Value-for-money audits ought to be directed very specifically with respect to what their target is; if it's vocational rehabilitation and the proper management, are we getting the best bang for our buck, certainly. But we want to talk a bit about the implementation of those.

Finally, we will bring forward amendments to the bill on this particular issue that will give the Legislature the power to determine where value-for-money audits happen, not the minister, and certainly not by this government. One can envision a situation in the future where part of the board could be embroiled in controversy, and business people and injured workers at our doors pounding them down and the minister, because he or she doesn't want to fan the flames, will have the value-for-money audit done on some other aspect of the board. So we'll bring forward amendments to that effect.

I want to just take a couple of moments to address the question of the closure of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency, because the bill contains amendments that give effect to this. My friends opposite have gleefully held up the red book, as I said, that we no longer supported the inclusion of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency in the board.

We did so with two very clear reasons: One is Dr Tuohy's report, which is in the possession of the minister, was in the possession of the previous minister, that very clearly and unequivocally recommended against that. Dr Tuohy, who I suppose it could be said was viewed as a management-side person, advocated that the agency ought to have the opportunity to address her concerns prior to collapsing it or folding it into the board. Her concerns—she had, as I recall, about 24 recommendations with respect to the administration and management of the agency.

Finally, we had a letter from the auditor of the agency—I forget, one of those big accounting firms with a long name—signed by the senior partner, saying that in effect the agency is well run and ought not to be part of the WCB. It may have been Mr Farlinger's firm, if I'm not mistaken. I stand to be corrected on that. In any event, it was a senior partner, and they made that point.

Then, finally there was my own experience. As a health care administrator I had employees and managers in our operation partake in the programs last spring and was astounded simply by the quality of the programs and the effect they had on our workplace, both for management and worker. Therefore, based on that, I persuaded our caucus to change its position.

The last issue I wanted to address today was the whole section around offences and penalties. The government has made a very clear case and has advocated for a long time the need to get government red tape dropped back. As I read the sections dealing with offences and penalties and filings, I sense that the management community, if it hasn't already realized it, had better give some thought to what those people down at that big building will do with this in terms of operationalizing the clauses of the act and what that means for red tape. I think, just reading the bill, that the red tape that will be needed to give effect to this will probably cause a lot of businesses to shudder. So we will, again, be bringing forward amendments in that area.

Finally, with respect to the whole question of offences and penalties, it's not exclusively the wording of the act that will determine whether or not we're good at enforcing our act. It comes down to the issue of enforcement. It comes down to the resources you apply to prevent fraud, at what point there's a cost-benefit to additional resources. So we'll be looking at those parts of the bill closely as well, because our fear is that while the bill says a lot of good things about preventing fraud and abuse, our fear is that what it does is to create a paper burden for employers as well as workers and at the same time will not, in our view, realistically reform or improve the prevention of fraud and abuse.

With those few words I will relinquish the seat.

The Chair: Mr Christopherson, will you be speaking on behalf of the third party? Yes? Then you have 10 minutes, please.

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton Centre): First of all I would like to make it very clear that in the opinion of the New Democrats this is, by and large, to do two key things. The first is to deny workers the equal share in the decision-making that they now enjoy under existing WCB legislation, and the second is, this is the tee-up for the slashing that Minister Jackson will be bringing forward in the spring.

The changes to the makeup of the board of directors will allow the government to load up that board with a clear majority of people who view the WCB and workers' minority place in that vision, into place, where they can implement the kinds of destructive policies that this government is hell-bent to put in place.

With regard to the Workplace Health and Safety Agency, which my colleague from the Liberal Party has commented on, I am pleased that he continues to remind the public, and I'll join with him in doing that, that the Liberals are also keen on changing the makeup of the WCB to ensure that workers are put in their rightful place as Tories and Liberals see it; and the rightful place for workers, according to Liberals and Tories, is to clearly be in a minority position, if one is forced to go that far, "but by God, this business of workers having a 50% say in matters that affect their lives has to go." You not only have changed the makeup of the board with Bill 15 in the WCB, but annihilated the entire agency when you took office and announced what you were going to do with workplace health and safety.

Of course, it needs to be said that none of these things can be taken in isolation. One has to look at the entire picture when you're dealing with the Tory agenda. The whole picture, when you fold in what will happen on Wednesday with regard to the Ministry of Labour, and then start to put all the pieces together, clearly it's the intent of this government to put workers back in their place, as they see it, that silly, warped vision of how the world ought to be in the late 1990s as compared to the 1950s, which very much seems to be where this government is going. What's interesting is, of course, they've always accused us of being social engineers, yet that's exactly what this government is doing in a way that's unprecedented in the history of Ontario.

Clearly, in our opinion, there are other aspects to Bill 15, and I will comment on them, but it is our view that most of those things are meant to provide cover and distraction from the main intent, which is to take away the 50% decision-making power that workers now enjoy under existing WCB legislation, move them into a minority position, load up the board with like-minded Tory types and jam through your anti-worker agenda as it relates to the WCB. I'm convinced that as time unfolds, over the years, actually—it's going to take a couple of years—these comments will be seen to be an accurate reflection of what is really happening here and what's happening to working people.

I will comment on the funding, again, the funding ratios and the unfunded liability. We know that this government has decided that it needs to create a crisis in every area that it wants to make changes, to provide a justification for the kind of ruthless attack on benefits to ordinary Ontarians that it's conducting. In the case of the Ministry of Education and Training, of course, there is even the minister on tape, on the record, stating that they need to manufacture a crisis. That, in our opinion, is consistent with the way the government is operating in every area.

We also know that this is being done in large part because $5 billion of the cuts they're making is to make room for a tax cut that the wealthy will benefit from the most. As long as they can keep everybody thinking there's a crisis out there, then they can move under that cover, and we intend to do everything we can to make sure that's exposed for what it really is.

This is no different. The government talks of the crisis that exists, when the reality and the fact is that there was a plan brought forward by experts within the WCB administration, at the behest of the board, that would see the unfunded liability eliminated by 2014. That plan was endorsed by all of the worker representatives on the board. I think that shows there is an ability, if you're willing to work with workers' representatives in this province, to deal with real problems that exist in a real, meaningful way.

But this government's not interested in that. That's not what this is all about. This is all about going after those benefits, and in this case it's so blatant. It's a 5% cut that will be coming in the spring, and I still say it's attached to Bill 15, because this puts in place the decision-making structure the Tories need to fulfil this. In the spring, Minister Jackson will bring forward recommendations that he says will show a 5% cut to workers on disability, and at the same time bring in a tax refund, because it is no different, an assessment cut for employers.

Again, as we've seen time after time after time, it's a question of taking away rights that workers have legitimately gained and worked for over the years to pay for a political commitment that you made in the Common Sense Revolution to the very wealthy in our province. You're bound and determined to give that money to those who have the most already at the expense of disabled workers, and as we've seen in other cases, through government action, through the poor, children, abused women, all those who are most vulnerable in our society. That's probably what we in our party find so despicable, the blatant attack on benefits to ordinary Ontarians, not to deal with the deficit but to give an even greater benefit from the wealth of our province to those that are already fortunate enough to have the most.

Specifically on the unfunded liability, in 1985, which was the last time the Tories were in power, the ratio was 31.8%. As of December 31, 1994, it was at 37.4%. That's not a huge change, but it's a trend in the right direction, and that's the kind of approach we've always advocated: Attack these problems in a way that maintains the values that we have as Ontarians and at the end of the day resolves the problem, as would have happened with the unfunded liability in terms of eliminating it by 2014.

And speaking to the unfunded liability, again, the trend lines are there. In 1993, the unfunded liability was $11.4 billion; in 1994, it was down to $11.5 billion. Again, not dramatic, but a trend line in the right direction that allows us to meet those fiscal obligations, but not making victims of people who are already innocent victims.

With regard to the fraud, again, the government's very good at finding hot buttons. I give them their due. They're excellent at it, and your ability to capitalize on that is quite extraordinary. But again, if you can talk about fraud in a way that suggests that's the big problem, as you've done with welfare, if you can find one or two cases that you can use as an example and play to the perception in the public that there's this widespread fraud and that's why we have a debt and deficit problem and that's why we have fiscal pressures on us, then you're away to the races, because nobody looks beyond that.

You've done that with welfare and virtually attacked everybody when we know that it's about 3%; every independent study has shown it's about 3%. You're doing it again with WCB in the way that you've put this bill together, suggesting that there's massive fraud out there and that's what is causing the problem. And the reality is that you're not doing anything extraordinarily new with regard to fraud. In fact, the fraud department within the WCB just recently won an independent award for the way they conduct their business.

So in wrapping up our opening comments, it will be our position to consistently show, through the evidence of people making presentations, that this is not to address and correct the WCB; this is to go after workers, among the most vulnerable people in our society, so that the government can again benefit their political backers, which are the very, very wealthy in our society. It's an absolute disgrace, and we will do everything we can to expose it for that.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Christopherson, and I thank the three presenters for staying within their time.

CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: We'll now hear from our first presenters, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Would the representatives please come forward. We all have copies of your submission. How you use the 15 minutes to make your submission is up to you; I'll remind of that. Any time you want to allow for questions has to be taken out of the 15 minutes. Welcome to the committee. Please introduce yourself to the members of the committee and for the benefit of Hansard.

Mr Paul Nykanen: My name is Paul Nykanen, and I'm vice-president of the Ontario division for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. With me is Ian Howcroft, the director of human resources policy.

On behalf of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, I would like to extend our appreciation for the opportunity to present our views to the standing committee on resources development on Bill 15, An Act to amend the Workers' Compensation Act and the Occupational Health and Safety Act.

What I'd like to say from the outset is that we at the CMA fully support the direction of the government with regard to workers' compensation reform. It is a good first step. We recognize that this is a first step, and we want to assure the committee that we will be very involved in the reform initiative as it proceeds. We're looking forward to providing input and further comment to Minister Jackson as he conducts the broader review that will examine the entire system in order to make the necessary long-term changes.

Before we provide some substantive comments on Bill 15, I'd like to state a few facts about the CMA. First of all, it's a voluntary association with members from all regions of the province. This year we celebrated our 124th anniversary representing manufacturers. Our membership base contains small, medium and large companies from all aspects of manufacturing, and our membership produces approximately 75% of the total manufacturing output of Ontario. That represents about $121 billion on an annual basis. There are about one million individuals in Ontario who are directly employed in manufacturing and another 800,000 who are employed in directly providing services to the manufacturing sector. These statistics clearly state that manufacturing is certainly the engine of growth, and particularly in Ontario.

Secondly, we've had a very long involvement with the issue of workers' compensation. As a matter of fact, our submissions date right back to 1912, when we made our first submissions to Justice Meredith. His work became the seminal work which is the basis of the whole framework for the system as it stands today. We've continued our active involvement in this thing and I believe are recognized today as one of the leading associations dealing with the issue.

There's one very good reason for this issue, and that is that the significance of it to our manufacturers is very great because almost half of the total assessment rates for the system are borne by the manufacturing sector, so it is a very big issue for us. We want to ensure a strong and sustainable workers' compensation system. To achieve this, we feel that major reforms are necessary, that we must return to the insurance principles and that we must recognize that workers' compensation must be related to work-related injuries. It has gone far beyond the original intent or scope and we thus have the severe problems that we have today. If such reforms are not implemented, the system on which injured workers rely could be undermined and unable to guarantee the benefits on a continuing basis.

I'd like to comment on a few issues with regard to Bill 15, starting out with governance. We're very pleased that the current bipartite governance structure at the WCB is being replaced with one that will be more efficient, more productive and more able to directly affect the Workers' Compensation Board. The bipartite system has proven to be counterproductive, confrontational, divisive and unable to deal with the essential issues. This is true not only for the Workers' Compensation Board but also at the Workplace Health and Safety Agency. The agency "experiment" in institutional bipartism was a failure.

Given this afternoon's time constraints, we're providing members of this committee with our submissions on the Workplace Health and Safety Review Team, as it provides in more detail our views on health and safety regulatory reform.

We therefore support the introduction of a multi-stakeholder board comprised of individuals with the requisite skills to effectively guide and govern the Workers' Compensation Board. It is essential that well-qualified experts be appointed to deal with and to solve the board's financial crisis.

Given what we have just said, it should come as no surprise that we support the amendments pertaining to the governance structure at the agency. We also look forward to providing ongoing input as the health and safety regulatory system is reformed.

Financial accountability: With an unfunded liability of approximately $11.4 billion, it is hard to understand why stronger financial accountability requirements were not introduced years ago. The current financial accountability framework, which is set out in the purpose clause, falls markedly short of what is necessary. Consequently, CMA is pleased that Bill 15 will address the current inadequacies. The workers' compensation system must be based on sound financial principles which include fully funding the cost of new workers' compensation claims; improving the ratio of assets to liabilities; providing a positive cash flow; eliminating the unfunded liability through a range of strategies; and maintaining a competitive workers' compensation system in its entirety.

An entrenched financial accountability structure would ensure that sound financial principles are observed, implemented and followed to keep the system operating efficiently, equitably and in a fiscally prudent manner. It would prevent a future financial crisis from ever occurring again.

However, the CMA wants to confirm its view that the Workers' Compensation Board itself should remain at arm's length. It must not be subject to government interference or involvement on a day-to-day basis.

I will now call on Ian Howcroft to comment on some of the other substantive issues.

Mr Ian Howcroft: Good afternoon. The CMA feels that the best way to ensure the Workers' Compensation Board operates in a fiscally prudent manner and adheres to the requirements of the entrenched financial accountability structure is to conduct regular value-for-money audits. With the enormity of the financial problems at the Workers' Compensation Board, we agree with the provisions in Bill 15 for mandatory annual audits. We have long argued for such audits and we have always advocated that they be conducted by outside independent auditors. In addition to ensuring that the Workers' Compensation Board is operating properly, the audits would identify problems immediately and allow for the necessary corrective action. This would prevent small problems from growing to become a crisis.

With regard to fraud and revenue loss, we'd like to say that fraud of any kind cannot be tolerated within the workers' compensation system. In addition, it must be incumbent on the Workers' Compensation Board to take any and all reasonable action to recover moneys paid out because of fraudulent misrepresentation or because of an overpayment for whatever reason. CMA believes that the government's direction in this regard is a positive step. However, we would like to see even stronger provisions to address this serious problem that is estimated to be approximately $150 million a year.

We had argued that extreme cases of fraud should be pursued through the criminal process and other lesser cases of fraud or the intentional provision of misleading statements or false statements be pursued through a system similar to that found in the unemployment insurance system. For example, with regard to unemployment insurance, if a claimant makes a false or misleading statement knowingly or with intent, that individual can be penalized up to 300% of their benefits.

With decreasing resources and the current financial crisis, it is essential that all moneys paid out go to the legitimate recipient in the correct amount. Bill 15 allows for more offences under the Workers' Compensation Act, which is a positive step and one we support, but we would like to see an even more expeditious way to deal with this problem. It may therefore be worthwhile to further explore this type of approach.

To conclude, we support Bill 15 as a first step in the long-needed reform of our workers' compensation system. As Paul stated at the beginning of our remarks, we are pleased that the government has appointed Minister Jackson to conduct a comprehensive review of the entire system, as many other changes are necessary if the system is to become financially sustainable. We'll be providing comments to Minister Jackson as his initiative continues and we'd like to outline some of the areas that we feel must be addressed.

First is reducing the benefit rate to 85% of net from the current level of 90% of net. In fact, we've even argued for a tiered or staggered rate whereby the first 39 weeks would be at 80% of net and then they would go to 85% thereafter.

There's also great need for a new definition of what is a compensable injury. The current level of entitlement has been expanded far beyond that which was originally intended or what should have been allowed. For example, we'd also like to see stress specifically excluded in the definition.

The workers' compensation system should provide for a waiting period similar to what has been required in other jurisdictions with great success.

It is also essential that employers be charged appropriate premiums. The government has recognized that the current assessment levels are too high and it has stated that they will be reduced by 5%. Again, we're pleased with this direction but we want to raise the fact that manufacturing, as a sector, has been paying more than its fair share for many years. We'd like to see this inequity addressed.

There's a need to improve and strengthen the current experience rating system to more appropriately and adequately deal with and reward individual employers. We will be providing further comments to Minister Jackson as his initiative continues, and the result, we hope, will be an equitable and financially sustainable system. It's essential that injured workers receive fair, adequate and guaranteed benefits from a well-run and competitive Workers' Compensation Board.

Those are our formal submissions and we'd be pleased to answer any questions.

The Chair: Thank you very much. I must apologize to both you and future groups. In our efforts to make sure we had as many presentations as possible, we've of needs limited each presentation to 15 minutes. So I guess we have time for probably one question. Mr Duncan.

Mr Duncan: I wanted to ask you a couple of questions. The issue of governance and the multistakeholder model, the way the legislation is framed, it leaves open the question of what the balance and what the makeup of the board should be. Would you support an amendment that gave effect to saying that the management and labour reps should be equal on the board, recognizing that there's room for other stakeholders?

Mr Nykanen: If we take the experience of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency, where you had equal representation on both sides—

Mr Duncan: No, I'm not advocating bipartism. Let's just, by way of example, say that we have a seven-person board and we then say that there will be management and labour representation, which the bill says, would you support a clause that said that labour and management representation—let's say it totals four—should be two each, with the balance being other stakeholders? Would you support that kind of amendment?

Mr Nykanen: We haven't specifically attached numbers as to what the representation might look like. The whole principle would be that if the directors are selected on the basis of their skills and what they are to bring to the board—in other words, if the objective is to provide on-going, continuing benefits to injured workers and to have the system on a financially sound basis—then it's more the qualifications of the individuals towards that objective. I would say that from both the employer side and the worker side this is the principle objective of the thing. The board, as it's constituted, if it carries out that mission, then we feel it would have accomplished something.

The Chair: Only a very, very brief supplementary.

Mr Duncan: Would you agree that there are worker representatives who have something to contribute in a positive way to the board?

Mr Nykanen: Unquestionably.

Mr Duncan: If we're going to a multistakeholder model where we say in the statute that there ought be labour and management representatives, and it says that, would you not agree that the statute ought to say there should be equal management and labour representation, recognizing the multistakeholder model?

Mr Nykanen: It's quite possible that's the way it would end up being. Certainly there's no denying that the workers are a key stakeholder in this thing, after all, and it is a workplace issue that we're dealing with.

Mr Duncan: If I were to bring forward that amendment to say there would be an equal number of labour and management representatives, would you support that?

Mr Nykanen: On the basis that the qualifications were as defined.

Mr Howcroft: I think merit and the requisite expertise of the individuals have to dictate who gets appointed to the board.

Mr Duncan: That's—

The Chair: Mr Duncan, if I could, Mr Christopherson wanted to get one in.

If I could ask that your question be relatively short, Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: You aren't going to penalize me because he was long, I'm sure.

The Chair: No.

Interjection.

Mr Christopherson: Don't you, though. I'd like to follow up on that but it'll be another time.

You mentioned in your presentation that you'd like to see the government remain at arm's length from the operations of the WCB—I'm paraphrasing—and you're supporting Bill 15. You'll know that Bill 15 also gives the minister and cabinet much greater power to dictate policy to the board, and the board has to accept them. Do you support that concept as it is outlined in Bill 15? If you do, I just wonder how it squares with what you've said in your presentation.

Mr Howcroft: We support the concept of what you've paraphrased. What we don't want to see is the government getting involved on individual claims or the day-to-day management of the Workers' Compensation Board. We feel that the government has a great deal of accountability for the whole system and we do support more of a role to ensure that the board does operate in a more fiscally and financially prudent manner. So we do support the gist of what is in Bill 15. We put the caveat in there because we don't want to see the House dealing with individual claims on a regular basis. We know that can be a result. We still think the Workers' Compensation Board, with the appropriate individuals in place, should be running the system and that the day-to-day operations should not be part of the function of government.

Mr Christopherson: If I can follow up on that just very briefly, I'm a little confused. If the government is now giving itself more power than it's ever had before and it can virtually dictate what the board will or won't do and whether it's related to a direct case—you can easily fudge that issue—the minister will have absolute right to dictate what the policy will be. I find that interesting, given that you don't believe they should be getting as involved as it seems to me they are in Bill 15.

I would ask how you square that, again, with the comment about the valuable contribution that workers have to make and the fact that it affects their lives and their income and your not agreeing that they should have a 50% say in the decision-making. I have trouble understanding exactly where you are, particularly as it relates to Bill 15 and what's in here.

Mr Howcroft: I guess our position is that we feel that workers and employers should be selected to sit on the board because of the skills they bring, not because of the merit that they necessarily represent. It should be on the merit principle in who gets the job and who brings the requisite expertise to that board.

With regard to the control of the board, we would like to see the government have more of a role to prevent the crisis from continuing and to deal with the problems that exist today. What we don't want to see is the minister getting involved in individual cases or the government being involved or embroiled in the day-to-day operations of the Workers' Compensation Board.

Mr Christopherson: So all the prior members weren't qualified?

Mr Howcroft: We didn't say that.

The Chair: Again, my apologies that we have to put the time limitation on, but thank you both, Mr Nykanen and Mr Howcroft, for your presentation. We appreciate your leaving this information for us.

UNITED FOOD AND COMMERCIAL WORKERS
INTERNATIONAL UNION, LOCAL 1000A

The Chair: We'll now hear from our second group of presenters, the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local 1000A. Good afternoon. As we just saw in the last presentation, perhaps if you want time for questions you might consider allowing, say, five minutes or six minutes for that. Welcome to the committee. Please introduce yourself.

Ms Pearl MacKay: I'm Pearl MacKay with the United Food and Commercial Workers, Local 1000A. With me today as well is Herb MacDonald from UFCW, Locals 175 and 633.

The United Food and Commercial Workers, Local 1000A, is UFCW's second-largest local in Ontario and represents just over 14,000 members who work predominantly in the food retail and food processing industries throughout Ontario. Some of the employers we have collective agreements with include Kretschmar, Brandt G Meat Packers, Cambridge Canadian Foods, Loblaw Supermarkets Ltd, franchised No Frills, SuperCentres and many others.

Many of our members suffer from workplace injuries such as carpal tunnel syndrome, bursitis, frozen shoulder, trigger finger, low back strains and herniated discs. These injuries are often caused by the repetitive type of work and often permanent damage has occurred to their bodies by the time they are diagnosed and a WCB claim has been filed.

Throughout our representation of our members before the Workers' Compensation Board, we have had a firsthand opportunity to experience the problems in the workers' compensation system on a daily basis as we service our members who have been injured on the job. We believe the bipartite board of directors at the WCB could assist in making a profound difference in improving the system for its stakeholders and looked to the royal commission on WCB to investigate longer-term issues as it relates to workers' compensation in Ontario, including an investigation into a public universal disability system.

I had the privilege of being one of the members of the bipartite board of directors of the WCB for the last six-month period, up until November 1 of this year. All of the directors on that board, I believe, brought with them a true commitment to improve the WCB system in this province. Part of that improvement included ensuring financial accountability in the system through ensuring that the two stakeholders in the system, workers and employers, had input into the appropriate funding in the system.

The unfunded liability is not a new problem. It began in the late 1970s when the government and multistakeholder board of directors kept assessment rates artificially low. In fact, in 1985 the WCB had on hand only 31.8% of money it owes to injured workers. Today, however, it is more than 37% of that money. So there has been a small turnaround at the board in the last few years.

This turnaround has occurred in most-recent years, when workers of this province had a vice-chair at the WCB, as did the employers. Most recently, through Bill 165 amendments, a true bipartite board of directors was enshrined in the Workers' Compensation Act.

This government would have the people of this province believe that the bipartite structure, representative of the two stakeholders in this system, did not and does not work. The Minister of Labour would have the people of this province believe that a bipartite structure is one of an adversarial nature rather than one of consensus.

Well, I am here to tell this government and to tell this committee that that is simply not true. The bipartite board of directors gave workers an equal say in how the board was run. In fact, the bipartite board made some incredible progress by bringing new claims' costs down dramatically, reducing the board's overhead and returning more injured workers with disabilities to the workplace than ever before. It enjoyed its first operating surplus in 10 years and reduced the unfunded liability for the first time in its history. The worker members of the WCB board of directors endorsed the administration's financial improvements package, called FIP, which would have paid off the unfunded liability by the year 2014.

However, the worker directors supported this package in a complete package because we didn't agree with a lot of the things that were in FIP, and the employer community didn't agree with a lot. But when we looked at the whole thing, there was the give and take on both parts, so we felt that it was the fairest solution to reach in terms of eliminating the unfunded liability. It would have saved the board over $400 million in cash flow annually.

The FIP would not just result in paper saving, like reducing the unfunded liability, but real cash. Had the FIP been passed, it is our opinion that Cam Jackson, Minister without Portfolio for workers' compensation reform, could sit back and rest assured that there would be no incentive for him to look at imposing a three-day unpaid waiting period on injured workers' claims on benefits; there would be no incentive for him to reduce the benefits paid to injured workers by 5%.

Mr Jackson could also rest assured that he would have no incentive to review lifetime pensions awarded before 1990, which could possibly include their elimination, and put at ease these most vulnerable of workers, more reliant on our social safety nets than ever before—if in fact by the time this government is through with its agenda there are any social safety nets left—nor would he have had any incentive to consider the reduction of future economic loss awards to workers with permanent injuries who are not employed in their pre-accident job or a comparable job by up to 40%, often because their employer has sidestepped its obligations under the Workers' Compensation Act or the Human Rights Code of Ontario.

There are a number of other things that you probably wouldn't need to look at either if FIP had been agreed to, but unfortunately the employer directors had blocked the adoption of FIP. One can only suspect that once this government was elected on June 8, they felt that perhaps they could get more out of this government than they could get out of FIP.

However, I want you to note that we, the worker and employer directors at the Workers' Compensation Board, were able to reach consensus on a number of issues, and one of the crucial ones, in my opinion, was around the 1996 assessment rate package. The board of directors, in its summer meeting, passed a motion to not include a 5% assessment rate reduction in the assessment rate discussion paper that goes out to the employers each year regarding the following year's assessment rates.

We were advised by the administration at the compensation board that a 5% assessment rate reduction would remove $140 million from the system in 1996 and that in all likelihood the board would be faced with having to draw moneys from its investment fund in order to operate. As you all know, this would have more of a significant effect on the unfunded liability than a dollar-for-dollar basis.

We and the employer directors reached this decision because we were acting in a fiscally responsible manner, even though at the time there was considerable pressure from the Ministry of Labour's office to have a 5% assessment rate reduction indicated in the paper. Had we had more time on the board of directors together with the employer directors, we might have been able to reach consensus on the FIP. After all, we do have a history of reaching consensus with the employer community, and one only needs to look at the work that was done on the previous government's Premier's Labour—Management Advisory Committee and secretariat on workers' compensation.

However, the Minister of Labour has instead opted for firing the board of directors that had made such tremendous progress. One can only ask why. It is true the Tory Common Sense Revolution did make this commitment in 1994 and it seems the minister is going to carry out this commitment whether it makes sense or not. This is nothing more than an ideological move, just as it was when she fired the bipartite board of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency.

It is the workers of this province who suffer from the carnage of workplace accidents, so one must ask, why has their voice been stifled in the very system that was set in place back in 1915 to ensure they were fairly compensated and for which they gave up their right to sue their employer for workplace accidents they might suffer?

It seems to us that the Harris government intends on giving the Workers' Compensation Board over to its employer buddies. Presumably, we'll have a board with the numbers that ensure the unfunded liability will resume its climb at the expense of workers, because although they criticize the unfunded liability in public, privately employers enjoy the ability to offload their current liabilities on the future employers of this province. How else can this be explained?

UFCW Local 1000A wishes to go on record opposing Bill 15 and all that it stands for. On behalf of UFCW Local 1000A, I do thank the committee for the opportunity to present our views and hope that it does not fall on deaf ears. I would now turn over for Herb MacDonald to continue with the presentation.

Mr Herb MacDonald: Good afternoon. I will keep my remarks short. I'm sure you have some questions for the fired board of directors. My name is Herb MacDonald and I am the benefits coordinator for the United Food and Commercial Workers, Locals 175 and 633. Locals 175 and 633 represent some 40,000 members in the province of Ontario. These members work in 20 different sectors, from industrial, manufacturing, retail, service and health care, among many others. Some of our major employers we have under agreement include the A&P company, the Oshawa Group, Cuddy Foods and Maple Lodge Farms. We also represent approximately 4,500 members in health care.

My comments this afternoon will be on the issue of fraud and the real abuse of the workers' compensation system in Ontario.

Bill 15 provides for a penalty of a $25,000 fine or up to six months' imprisonment for workers who do not notify the board within 10 days of a material change in circumstances in connection with his or her entitlement to benefits. What does this mean? What happens if a worker receives a severance package, an inheritance, a gift from a family member or wins a lottery?

How can a worker be assured that a change-in-circumstances message left on a voice mail at the Workers' Compensation Board will be recorded? We all know that it takes 14 days within the workers' compensation system for a letter to get distributed, and not all injured workers in this province have fax machines in their homes.

This amendment creates a false impression of workers defrauding the system. There is absolutely no support for massive worker fraud.

The Workers' Compensation Board has recently put sufficient funding into beefing up its special investigation branch in order to detect fraud and has recently passed anti-fraud policies. Has this government investigated those policies? Is there something wrong with these new policies?

What does this language, "material change in circumstances," mean? It certainly is not clear and will, we suggest, create nothing more than confusion and a threatening climate in an already adversarial system.

The Labour minister is blaming injured workers for the problems of the WCB and has stated that the board is on the brink of a financial crisis. Attacking injured workers for fraud might perhaps result in minimal savings to the board, but it will do little by way of dealing with the unfunded liability or the general operating costs.

Now, let's talk about the real abuse and fraud in the system. First, 55,000 employers owe the WCB $430,000 in outstanding assessments and penalties. Second, $200,000-plus per year is lost in revenue annually for NEER, CAD-7 and SIEF schemes. Employers such as banks are currently exempt from the system: 700,000 Ontario workers are denied WCB coverage because the employers have been successful in lobbying governments to exempt them from the system.

Employers and their consultants, with a simple letter requesting SIEF relief, receive a minimum of 50% relief on a claim. Over the past years, our local has reviewed thousands of files where SIEF relief was granted simply by a letter of request.

We suggest this is not only an abuse of the system but out and out fraud and has created a significant draw on the finances of the Workers' Compensation Board. Why has this government not addressed this serious issue? These same employers have been rewarded for their health and safety practices when in fact many of these employers are not in compliance with the health and safety act and some have not done health and safety training at all.

As a trustee of one of our local unions' benefit plans, we have discussed the government's proposed changes to the Workers' Compensation Act, and let me tell you, we are concerned. Unloading the cost of workplace accidents to sickness and accident plans where there is a union and such plans are in place will result in many plans going under and more and more injured workers will end up on social services in this province.

What happens to the unorganized? They will have nowhere to go but social services, at a cost to the taxpayer.

Bill 15 and the changes proposed for the spring in 1996 will have a devastating effect on injured workers, social services and benefit plans in this province. Locals 175 and 633 strongly oppose the changes introduced in Bill 15.

We thank you for the opportunity to make this presentation.

The Chair: Thank you both. Regrettably, that's actually about 17 minutes, but I appreciate the comments you've brought and I understand you'll be sending us a copy of your presentation.

Ms MacKay: Yes, within the next couple of days.

Interjection.

The Chair: We don't have time, not if we're going to keep on schedule. Thank you very much.

Our third group of presenters—

Mr Christopherson: Point of order, if I can: I realize your ruling under the rules we had already set for ourselves, but we did have a discussion about whether or not 15, if kept that tight, would be sufficient. I'm just raising a concern that on the first day, the second group up, there is no chance for any questions or comments at all. I see a bit of a problem. If you will refer it to the subcommittee—but I have some concern.

The Chair: Perhaps it should be referred to subcommittee, Mr Christopherson, but you will recall we also discussed that each group is free to make their entire presentation questions and answers or alternatively to make it a presentation to the committee. So to some extent I think it's responsible for us to leave it up to the groups to decide how best to use their 15 minutes.

RETAIL COUNCIL OF CANADA

The Chair: With that, we invite our third group, from the Retail Council of Canada, to come forward. Good afternoon. I remind any latecomers that we are committed to a 15-minute deadline for presentations, and how you choose to make up that time is certainly your choice. If you want to allow for any questions, it will be taken out of the 15 minutes. So welcome to the committee, and if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves to the committee and to Hansard, that would be great.

Ms Elizabeth Mills: My name's Elizabeth Mills. I'm the director of government relations for the Retail Council of Canada, and I will allow the two gentlemen with me to introduce themselves.

Mr Brian Cassidy: Hello. My name is Brian Cassidy and I'm the manager of occupational health and safety for the Hudson's Bay Co.

Mr Max Roytenberg: My name is Max Roytenberg. I'm a vice-president with the Canadian Council of Grocery Distributors.

Ms Mills: You have a copy of our remarks and I will not actually go through it in its entirety, but all of our detail is provided there. We'd like to thank you for the opportunity to speak with you this afternoon to express on behalf of the retail community our views on workers' compensation reform. As you may know, the retail sector is a very employment-intensive sector, and as a result, in retailing there's a great deal of interest in workers' compensation.

The retail council has direct members representative in every sector of retailing and together account for over 65% of Canada's retail store volume. Within Ontario, we have a representative volume of sales of $75 billion. In Ontario, we employ 532,000 workers, or one in eight workers in the province. Affiliated with the council are approximately 100 sectoral-specific and regional associations whose members among them account for a substantial additional percentage of retail volume. And, as you've noted, our sister association, the Canadian Council of Grocery Distributors, counts within its membership all the major wholesale and retail food distributors, and they support the views presented within this submission.

The retail council has participated in the initiatives of reform in the WCB in the past two years as a member of the Business Steering Council. The Business Steering Council was established to advise the management representatives of the Premier's Labour-Management Advisory Committee set up by the previous government. The Ontario Federation of Labour represented labour's interest on the PLMAC.

In a recent submission to the minister, the business steering committee made clear again its position on governance, accountability and fiscal responsibility, among other items. The Retail Council of Canada fully supports the views expressed in that submission. I'll be happy to send the committee a copy of that if you would like it.

The business steering committee members have continued their dialogue on structural change since the collapse of PLMAC earlier this year. This committee's opinions on the WCB reforms proposed in Bill 15 proceed organically from the report that committee submitted over two years ago to the Ministry of Labour. The issue of importance remains consistent: In our view, the Ontario WCB system is in crisis, broken financially and structurally. The unfunded liability stands now at a staggering $11.4 billion, which puts the future viability of the WCB in jeopardy and, importantly, threatens its ability to pay benefits to injured workers.

The extent and nature of the problem has been recognized by all parties. It was the previous NDP government which asked the PLMAC to take on WCB reform based on concerns about the same issues. The Liberal Party, both in its election red book and in the WCB review undertaken by Steve Mahoney, called for major structural and operational reforms. By action and by word, there is an all-party consensus that recognizes this system is in crisis.

There has been a tremendous amount of repetitive time and resources spent examining and developing solutions. What is needed is swift action. This government's action to initiate real change at the WCB is therefore welcome news. The Ontario retail industry applauds these first steps taken by the government to frame a rescue for Ontario's WCB system. It is equally important, however, to retailers that Minister Jackson's review leads to a second wave of sweeping change to an organization in real peril.

This submission will focus now on two areas of announced reform: structural reform and economic reform. In essence, we support this two-staged process of reform because it puts in place an essential framework through which substantive change can take place next year.

The new board of directors is a key element, in our view. The retail industry supports the announced move away from the bipartite structure, a structure and model which led to confrontation, paralysis in decision-making and a staggering unfunded liability. These changes in governance are important if we are to move the WCB away from being a strand of the social welfare safety net and restore the true balance of the system which was established in 1915, that in exchange for giving up the right to sue an employer, employees can expect to receive fair compensation. As well, the return of the WCB to a workplace accident insurance organization also demands a corporate model of governance.

The retail council supports the proposed multi-stakeholder board whose responsibility will be the long-term health of the system. We recognize that this means a shift for the business community in giving up its ability to have representatives who will speak to its interests at board meetings, but we believe it will be better for all interested parties if the board is responsible first to the system's long-term viability.

This model also promises to give the WCB meaningful and responsive leadership necessary to make the hard decisions and the professional resources required to turn around a system in crisis. A reduction in the size of the board to nine members also creates a more effective decision-making body.

The retail council also supports the inclusion of a clear policy direction role for the government through the revised memorandum of understanding. As outlined, we support the requirement to have a five-year annual strategic plan, an annual statement of priorities and an annual statement of the board's investment policies and goals. This enhanced role for the government makes clear that this crown corporation is an element of the provincial government which must serve the public's interests as set out by the government.

The establishment of a new requirement for each director to act in a clearly defined, financially responsible and accountable manner helps to restore confidence in the leadership and the administration and direction of the WCB. It will also help to keep the directors focused on their responsibility to correct the financial management problems of the WCB.

The retail council is pleased with the amendments to the purpose clause. In particular, the opening phrase, "The purpose of this act is to accomplish the following in a financially responsible and accountable manner," in our view correctly focuses the activities of the board in securing the long-term financial health of the corporation.

We also fully endorse the six elements of the purpose clause and the order in which they are set out. They represent a clear set of directions and priorities for the board. These are priorities that all participants within the system can support.

The retail council is particularly supportive of the two new objectives within the purpose clause: "To prevent or reduce the occurrence of injuries and occupational diseases at work," and, "To promote health and safety in workplaces." We believe that this integrated approach brings a new focus and role for the WCB in putting efforts into prevention and proactive programs in our workplaces. In this connection, we support the return of the responsibility for health and safety to the WCB.

In the summer of 1995 the retail council began a project to develop health and safety training which we feel will enable us to act on this integrated approach. Designed by health and safety professionals and industry partners, the program will provide certified health and safety training as a tool to improve the conditions in the retail workplace, if approved.

The results of this project and the commitment to train will lead to a retail workforce that is better educated in occupational health and safety and reduced compensation costs. Both health and safety and reduced costs are important to the Ontario retailer in a growing, internationally competitive retail marketplace.

The retail council applauds and fully endorses the direction that the government has set out in governance and accountability, including the extension of the purpose clause to cover the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal.

The retail council makes one final observation on good business practices: Retailers, large and small, have long had to use common sense to reduce revenue leakage, to identify areas of fraud and to implement preventive measures to eliminate these concerns. The retail trade is extremely pleased that this approach is now part of the business processes of the WCB.

Substantive economic reform: The amendments announced on November 1 act only on the first half of this government's commitments. The retail council remains intent on the reforms that will be undertaken by Minister Cam Jackson in the coming months. In some ways, Minister Jackson's review is more substantive than

Bill 15. However, we do believe that the fundamental reforms introduced in Bill 15 make it possible for those reforms by Minister Jackson's process to proceed with due diligence and speed.

The next few pages actually outline some of our specific interests in the reform process, but I won't go through them. I'll leave those to you.

In conclusion, Bill 15 is essential to the success of the future of economic and operational changes expected by retailers at the WCB. This organization will remain in financial peril until swift and decisive action is taken by this new board to retire the unfunded liability. The retail council applauds the government's announced amendments but remains intensively focused on the substantive economic reform to come in 1996.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Mills. We have about five minutes. First we'll go to a government member.

Mr Ted Chudleigh (Halton North): Hello. Given that Ontario has the second-highest assessment levels in Canada, what kind of effect does this have on your members' ability to invest and create jobs in Ontario, given that most of the competitive areas have access to border states?

Ms Mills: Actually, we have a representative from the Hudson's Bay Co here. Perhaps he would like to speak to that.

Mr Cassidy: I think the increasing amount of assessment that employers are required to pay definitely has an impact on the fiscal health of an organization, and as we become more internationally competitive, this comes more and more into play.

I would like to reiterate my support for Elizabeth Mills's comments pertaining to the financial accountability that the board members will now have to take. I think it's very important that future policy decisions will have to be looked at with regard to the impact they're going to have on the unfunded liability at the board. There's definitely a correlation there between the rates that employers are paying and the policy decisions that the board makes, particularly in 1995, where these days the work-relatedness of a disability increasingly becomes tenuous in nature.

Mr Chudleigh: We hear that Wal-Mart's coming into Ontario big-time.

Mr Cassidy: Oh, they're here.

Mr Chudleigh: There are rumours in the financial press that K mart isn't doing as well as it used to be doing or it's not getting a satisfactory return to its corporate offices. Given the picture that these retailers require a large amount of employees in their companies, what kind of effect does that have when they're deciding on which side of the border to locate their retail operations?

Ms Mills: I don't think it's a question of locating here or there. In fact, the penetration that we will see of American-style retail formats is not going to change. We have adopted several, whether it's big-box or power-shopping centres, but what does become clear is that when you're making a business decision, the tax elements, like a WCB assessment rate, make it that much more difficult for a company that is here and paying rates to compete with an introduced new format.

Small business generally finds it more difficult to compete against a large new format that's just opened up in the parking lot down the road. It would be a competitive advantage for them to at least be able to sustain a more reasonable level of assessment rates. Given that we have the second-highest ones in the country, it really speaks to the fact that while we have a volume of employees here, we simply aren't operating a system that reflects the true cost.

Mr Roytenberg: Mr Chudleigh, if I could just respond, we had a cross-border shopping study very recently, and the area that you identified was one of those pinpointed by the consultants as an area where we have a disadvantage, relative to our competition across the border, in areas of overhead and of costs related to these kinds of services and taxes. The tax area and the overhead area were two that were pinpointed as placing Canadian distributors in a particularly difficult position relative to their competition across the border.

Mr Duncan: Ms Mills, you favourably referenced our red book in here, and it's so seldom that happens that I felt I had to ask a question. Two issues: One, could you define for me how you see the new purpose section differing from the old purpose section and what substantive weight you see with that? Secondly, since you did reference our Back to the Future document, would you agree that an amendment stipulating equal representation on the part of labour and management, as well as who the other stakeholders are, would be supportable to your organization?

Ms Mills: I'll answer the first part first. In fact, the indication that we made both in referring to your Liberal red book and the Back to the Future document, from our point of view, simply means that the Liberal Party, as well as the other two parties around this table, has already itself initiated a dialogue about a system that is in crisis.

The patterns of reform that have been indicated in your Back to the Future document—I wouldn't necessarily proceed along all lines. I think that what Steve Mahoney had intended for that document to do was to highlight a series of recommendations that he felt would put the system a further step ahead. I wouldn't support an amendment to have equal representation of I believe you said employees and—

Mr Duncan: The bill calls for labour and management reps in a multistakeholder model.

Ms Mills: Right.

Mr Duncan: What we said, and you referenced our document in yours, is that we would have equal labour and management reps among a broader multistakeholder model. Would you support that kind of an inclusion?

Ms Mills: No.

Mr Duncan: Secondly, could you define for me how the purpose act now differs from the existing purpose act and what weight in law you see it having?

Ms Mills: I think in fact for us it is the addition of prevention and health and safety within the purpose statement, and the way it's now been highlighted. For us, what we anticipate in addition to support that, though, is the agency moving within the WCB. Structurally, then, you're actually integrating two systems which currently are duplicated, and we feel that there ought to be a relationship with the performance that industries are able to achieve. Their accident rates should also be related to how they are proceeding with health and safety training.

Mr Duncan: If I can, though, your document addressed financial accountability in the purpose clause.

Ms Mills: Yes.

Mr Duncan: The question relates to financial accountability, and I just wondered how you see the new clause differing from the old legislation. The subsections on health and safety aren't addressed in your document. In your document you address financial accountability, and I wondered how you see it differently, just basically rearranging the purpose clause.

Ms Mills: I don't think that the last purpose clause in fact gave the correct amount of emphasis to a financially responsible and accountable system. There has been a reorientation of the purpose clause which makes it much more clear that the entire system and the WCAT are to be held financially and fiscally responsible and that the directors of the board themselves will have to act in that way.

The Chair: I'll have to cut you off at that point.

Ms Shelley Martel (Sudbury East): I'm very curious. I wasn't too surprised by most of the contents of what you had, but there was one comment and one point of view that I find quite bizarre, and that is with respect to moving away from the bipartite model, which you said was one that led to confrontation, paralysis in decision-making etc.

The reason I was curious is that I note your friend from Hudson's Bay who is here also had a colleague, a Mr David Crisp, vice-president of human resources from Hudson's Bay Co, who sat as one of the management representatives on the bipartite board. The reason I am curious about this is that I wonder why you would move from that model and I wonder if you can answer for me whether or not you thought Mr Crisp was qualified to be selected from his peers in business to participate. Secondly, if it was such a problem, why did he continue to participate right up to the point that he and all the other members were fired?

Ms Mills: I'll speak to that. I think the appointment of David Crisp to the board was a very wise decision. Within the economic makeup of Ontario, retailing is a significant portion of the economy. It only makes sense that under the previous bipartite structure you would have a representative model that would have included many different varieties. I think also Mr Crisp is well qualified as a VP of human resources of a large corporation that represents a large number of employees in a sector that has a low-risk level. That that perspective would be under that structure under the previous government would be an important element to add. I don't think Mr Crisp's qualifications were ever questioned.

The participation of the board of directors was a long-standing, frustrating and at times almost antagonistic process for both sides. I think the design of a bipartite structure, as has been highlighted in other agency assessments, like the agency one, has been well documented, particularly the way in which it was run in Ontario, as being very fruitless in terms of being able to move forward.

If Mr Crisp was fired, I don't think that Mr Crisp would view that as necessarily a negative comment on his abilities.

Ms Martel: Oh, I think he was quite capable, along with every other board member who was there. The experience that you relate with respect to the board of directors' experience is quite different from a labour member who we just heard from previously, Ms MacKay, who said that a number of important changes that were very positive took place and that her experience, as quoted by the minister, one of confrontation etc, was just not the case.

I guess why I raise the question again is, if it was such a problem, if the bipartite group was such a problem, why did the management members in particular continue to participate in this particular mechanism? This is a very important board of directors. I would think everyone who was appointed was qualified. If it was such a problem, if there was such confrontation, why did they continue to participate up till the point that the minister fired them all?

Ms Mills: To use your own words, I think that because it's such an important system and a vital part of any business decision, it's not always productive to stomp out of any committee meeting or process and not participate. Once inside the tent, to continue the dialogue is often more productive, at least in terms of providing information to the rest of the employer community, and certainly that was the well-intended role of a lot of the board of directors who did find it frustrating, and probably, had they had a personal choice, might have left earlier.

The Chair: Thank you very much for your presentations and your answers. I appreciate your taking the time to come and see us today.

BUILDING TRADES WCB SERVICES

The Chair: We'll now hear from our next group, the Building Trades WCB Services. Good afternoon. You have 15 minutes at your disposal.

Ms Julie Nielsen: Good afternoon. My name is Julie Nielsen. I am a WCB specialist with the Building Trades WCB Services. WCB services is a project of the Toronto-Central Ontario Building and Construction Trades Council, which has over 30 affiliates within its jurisdiction. Ten of those affiliates participate with this project, and the concept of the project was created because injured workers within the construction trades needed assistance with their compensation claims.

I represent a variety of construction trades from bricklayers to painters, drywallers, boiler-makers, asbestos workers, electricians and iron workers. All these trades have several commonalities. Their members work in fields that are of heavy physical, demanding labour. Work opportunities may be cyclical in nature, of short duration, with several different employers during any given year and at temporary work sites and conditions that differ from many other sectors. All of these factors make construction a unique industry and one that requires specific regulations to address the needs of its injured workers.

It is interesting to note that the Occupational Health and Safety Act has regulations specific to construction, yet if health and safety practices fail within that workplace, there are no sector-specific regulations or guidelines to address the needs of injured workers within this unique industry.

The government introduced Bill 15 on November 1 with two ideas in mind: to change the governance and the accountability structure of the board and, secondly, to put the system back on a sound financial footing to protect the future needs of injured workers.

It is our position that, again, the government is creating a crisis. The WCB is not on the brink of bankruptcy. The unfunded liability is not a debt. The unfunded liability represents the present cost of future payments owed to injured workers in this province by their employers for their present claims. The WCB, again I repeat, is not bankrupt. It has more than $6 billion in assets. In fact, in the past, employers have opposed a fully funded system on the basis that they did not want a fund of billions of dollars in the control of the board, but instead wanted access to that money for current investment under their own control. Now they complain about a crisis, and this government is using this false understanding of financing of a compensation system to attack workers.

Subsections 103(4) to (9) address the merit systems that are currently practised by the Workers' Compensation Board. The concept of surcharges and refunds had been minimally used since the early 1950s, but we have seen an increase in the amount of surcharges and refunds since the early 1980s. These increases are a result of the NEER and the CAD-7 programs. NEER stands for the new experimental experience rating program, which is applicable to all sectors, and CAD-7 means the council amendments to draft 7, which is specific to construction. The CAD-7 program was established on a trial basis in 1984, and unfortunately it is still with us.

These programs have encouraged employers to engage in undesirable practices in an attempt to hide compensation claims, to minimize severity of accidents and contest established claims. Practices that we encounter are inappropriate reporting of accidents, incorrect reportings of earnings basis, improper reporting of lost-time claims as no-lost-time claims by leaving the injured worker on full payroll doing meaningless work or no work at all in some cases, and utilizing the appeal system to obstruct claims.

These programs have enticed employers to hire expensive consultants on a contract basis to monitor and contest claims involving benefits and services, in that they get a percentage of the savings realized by the construction company. Within the CAD-7 program, construction employers are encouraged to offer vocational rehabilitation programs, like modified work, in order to reduce their accident costs and collect credits or rebates. In essence there is an abuse of the light-duty modified work program. Employers are also encouraged to report no-lost-times accidents, as this too reduces their accident frequency history and again provides them with rebates.

Bill 15, as you know, was introduced on November 1 and it is the opinion of the council that Bill 15 be withdrawn. It is not in the best interests of either injured workers or the employers in this province.

The fraud section that has been raised is not clear. We need definitions as to what "change in circumstances" is. It's a situation today that the system that we have isn't perfect, but I believe it's a system worth keeping. With the presentations that we're seeing in the first stage of changes, it does not bode well, and I speak both for the workers I represent and the employers who are on the other side of the table when I'm going to hearings.

The whole question of refunds and rebates is one which pits the worker community against the employer community. Employers have a responsibility mandated by the Occupational Health and Safety Act. If they fail to provide what is required of them by the act, then it is our opinion that they should be assessed penalties and have their assessment rates increased to reflect their true accident history. But are those assessments being collected? It is our position that they're not.

I hear too much about the fraud committed by injured workers in this province, and I suggest to you today that there is more fraud being committed by the employers of this province than by the workers. Some of that is on the part of the compensation board itself. Their fraud squad is very keen on looking at injured workers, but I can tell you, in preparing for a hearing I had a corporate search done on a numbered construction company. I found 16 different companies related to that numbered company, and basically what they had done was opened doors and closed doors to escape their assessment costs. That is not being checked upon.

As I said earlier, I do believe the system that we have is worthwhile keeping, but when I see a government coming in with the plans that I'm seeing within Bill 15, I have to come in front of you and tell you to withdraw it.

Given the short notice for this appearance and due to my heavy schedule of hearings and caseload work, the brief that is being worked on is not prepared; it will be ready in the morning. It's being printed at this time and it will be sent to the committee. Thank you for the opportunity to address you.

The Chair: Thank you very much. The first question will go to the government side. Mr Baird.

Mr Baird: I want to thank you for your time in appearing before us today. It's appreciated.

I have two questions. The first discusses the issue or whether or not the unfunded liability at the board, currently at $11.4 billion, is a problem. Certainly there seems to be broad opinion, far from unanimous but broad opinion, that there is a crisis at the WCB, financially speaking, but everyone I've spoken to and talked with admits that real action must be taken on the $11.4-billion unfunded liability. I guess I'd like first to get your thoughts on it. Does your union believe this is a problem or it isn't a problem?

Ms Nielsen: The unfunded liability is of concern if it continues to grow. But if you were able to recapture the funds that are owed to the board, then the unfunded liability would not be the problem it is today.

If you go back on the annual report from 1994, in 1985 the unfunded liability was at $5 billion, I believe; it's now at $11 billion. If you take a look at the true dollar figure and the dollar value in 1985, I'm not too sure there's that much of a difference between what the board had as an unfunded liability in 1985, as opposed to what it is in 1994-95. But again, I think it's something that we have to look at inside the board in collecting the money that is being owed to the board.

Mr Baird: Obviously there'd be a big disagreement on that issue, but I certainly respect your opinion.

With respect, you brought up the issue of fraud. This bill of course contains both measures to go after fraud with $100,000 fines to employers who fail to register; as an addition, on the other side of the coin, to employees who fail to register. The issue of the definition of "material change in circumstances" could come up. What would your definition of that be and what are your thoughts on the employer fraud measures in the bill?

Ms Nielsen: I have no opinion on "material change in circumstances." It's the government that brought it in and I think the government should be defining it for us. As far as the second part of your question, yes, fraud is identified, but again I'm only going to go on past experience, that even though there are in the present act as it stands penalties and assessments against employers, it's not being collected. So if it's not been collected in 1990 or 1994, then what's to say with the new amendments, with Bill 15, that we're going to see it collected in 1995?

Mr Baird: Your administration of the act is very important and I'll certainly take that—

The Chair: Any questions from the opposition?

Mr Duncan: I want to come back to this question of the unfunded liability, because quite frankly, before I came to this place, I bought into the argument that it was a huge problem. A number of groups have made this argument for me. I always viewed the unfunded liability and the size of the unfunded liability as representative of the board's ability to pay workers in the future and, as such, should be taken very seriously. I would like to hear you expound a little bit more on that whole issue, because I'm very intrigued by this line of thinking that while it's a problem, we ought not to blow it out of proportion. I'd just like to hear you say a bit more about that.

Ms Nielsen: I agree with you that we've heard many stories. Working in the compensation system, I'm more on the hands-on as far as caseload goes. When we came into Bill 165 and we heard this great horror story about what the unfunded liability was, we had it explained to us in the sense—

Mr Duncan: Bill 165, that was last year?

Ms Nielsen: That was in January. What we had explained to us was that it's the money the employers are to be paying into. Now, it's going to grow if they're not paying into it. If I have an injured worker who was injured back in 1987 and he's collecting a pension and that company's gone out of business, then how is that money to pay that worker going to be there?

Mr Duncan: Yes, I understand the principle of it. Again, as I say, you're not the first group that has expressed this notion that while it's a problem, it's not a crisis. I'm wrestling with that legitimately myself. But I view it, frankly, as a measure of the board's ability to compensate injured workers in the future and therefore should be viewed very seriously.

Ms Nielsen: I'm not taking away from the seriousness of it; I'm saying if the board had the ability and did their job in the present state, the way they're there, to collect the money from the employers that is owed to the board.

Mr Duncan: The other issue that's been brought up in this light is the notion that we've been digging into the accident fund, I guess, to the tune of $400 million a year—correct me if I'm wrong—the last three years, four years, to subsidize current operations. Again, I'm troubled by that in terms of what it means. If you reference the annual report, this is the first year we saw an actual decline in the accident fund; it was down 1.7%, at least the return on the accident fund was. Would you agree that we do need to take steps, at least some steps, to address the unfunded liability?

Ms Nielsen: Most definitely, and one of the areas that I think should be looked at very seriously is that the assessments the employers have been paying have been going down. They've been going down on a yearly basis, and if it continues to go down and the number of accidents continues to go up or that payments are still going out to injured workers, then the amount of money that's required becomes higher, and if the assessment rates are coming down it's not going to meet—

Mr Duncan: Now, employers argue—just one?

The Chair: No, sorry. We're going to have to proceed. Mr Christopherson promised a very short one.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Mr Chair, I appreciate the opportunity. The government's been talking a lot about fiscal accountability and fiscal responsibility. Both the government and the Liberals have advocated a 5% cut in the assessment rate. Given your expert knowledge of the WCB and the unfunded liability, can I ask you how much sense you think that makes in terms of fiscal accountability and responsibility to be advocating a 5% cut in assessment rates, given the circumstances that we have?

Ms Nielsen: Absolutely none, none whatsoever. They're talking about cutting benefits to the workers. My understanding was that they had frozen the assessment rates. But to cut assessment rates is absolutely ludicrous in the eyes of injured workers and to the representatives out here.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Nielsen. I appreciate your coming to make your presentation. We'll look forward to receiving your written comments.

INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT VICTIMS GROUP OF ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next group up: the Industrial Accident Victims Group of Ontario. If they could come forward and introduce themselves to the committee and Hansard.

Just a reminder again, if you were late coming, we have a 15-minute time limit, including questions, so please govern yourself accordingly. Thank you for joining us today.

Ms Airissa Gemma: Can we take half a second for some water?

The Chair: Certainly.

Ms Gemma: First of all, I'd like to thank you for the opportunity to hear us out. My name is Airissa Gemma and I work at the Industrial Accident Victims Group of Ontario, which is a legal aid clinic that's funded by the legal aid plan. Our clinic represents injured workers who can't afford the services of a lawyer. We're talking about financial crisis—you should come to our clinic for a couple of weeks and you'll see financial crisis there.

I'd like to start by introducing the people from my clinic who will be speaking on some of the issues in Bill 15. With me is Sebastian Spano, community legal worker; Alberto Lalli, also community legal worker; and David Wilken, who is a student at law.

First of all, I'd just like to start off by mentioning that we are here but it took us a lot of scrambling to get here. We were notified very late Thursday and we haven't got a prepared submission or brief written. Hopefully we'll be prepared. We're a clinic of eight people and so it wasn't possible to prepare for a written submission.

We would like to remind the members here that the process doesn't give enough time for everybody who is interested in making submissions to the committee to have the opportunity to do so, and also we didn't get enough notice, and organizations that are outside of Toronto—I'm not aware of, but I don't believe have gotten notice. So I would kindly remind the members that we understand there's going to be a new bill in the spring, according to the Minister of Labour, and we would like the opportunity to remind them that we'd like enough notice so that everybody who's interested in making submissions will do so. Thank you very much.

I would like to turn it over to Alberto Lalli.

Mr Alberto Lalli: I will be referring to the bill itself. What can be said is that unfortunately it offers nothing to injured workers but more hardship. We know that this is just a preamble. As Airissa mentioned, the real bill is still being cooked in secrecy and behind closed doors. We have no idea. We can smell the cooking stuff and it's not to our liking, unfortunately.

Even in this bill, what seems to be positive at first glance, it turned out to be a mirage. For example, workers have now the possibility to get reimbursed for money which has been wrongfully deducted from their wages to pay for the workers' compensation assessment. But, and this is a big but, they will receive this money only if the employer is successfully prosecuted for a provincial offence and the board is able to collect the court order restitution moneys from the delinquent employer. If these conditions, both of them, are not met, the board will simply keep the stolen money and the workers are out of luck.

Unfortunately, this is the general tenor of the bill. Workers are supposed to pay up front for whatever it is that they owe money—overpayments or whatever—while the employers will pay when the board gets around to enforcing the statutory provisions regarding penalties and employers' obligation. And we who have been working in the area of workers' compensation helping injured workers know what the attitude of the board has been in regard to our recovering moneys, whether for penalties or whatever, from the employer.

The Minister of Labour has mentioned in Hansard that this bill will bring hope and optimism, and we also believe that and agree wholeheartedly. It's going to bring hope and optimism to employers. Employees have to be given the control of the board of directors and workers will be faced with the criminalization of the compensation system. Although it's always been possible to prosecute fraud artists under the Criminal Code, this bill will put workers now facing an unfamiliar system in danger of prosecution for failing to disclose a material change in circumstances. This is a term so vague that not even lawyers can be able to agree on what it really means, and I realize that was one of the questions here by one of the members. And it's true, there is no definition and nobody knows what "material change of circumstances" will mean.

Likewise, workers, their family representatives, health care providers, anybody who will call to the board on behalf of the worker, will be subject to a police interrogation regarding the statement with some bureaucrats at the board and he could be accused of misleading or giving some false information. We don't know how they, the bureaucrats at the board, are going to determine that. It could be said that this bill, the people who brought this bill, the government, will dismiss these scenarios, that they are unrealistic and will never happen. We don't think so. We have been dealing with the board for quite some time. It will be certainly no easier to secure a conviction under these provisions than under the fraud provisions of the Criminal Code.

So the question is, why no offences are created in the act? Why give employers and bureaucrats even more tools to threaten and intimidate honest injured workers, their families or friends in the absence of any evidence of significant worker fraud? When I say that, I don't mention that because we are representing injured workers; I'm just basing on the annual report, 1994, from the board that is so full of figures and graphs and numbers in every section, but with the section dealing with fraud there is nothing. On the contrary, the only thing that it says is they won an award for innovation in the public sector. So once again, we're seeing that the fraud crisis as one of the reasons why the compensation system is going bankrupt is bogus. It's a big lie. And we believe that this will be used, once again, against injured workers.

We see that always, too often, injured workers who spend years of hard work and loyalty to companies all of a sudden suffer an accident and they're then accused of being liars by their employers and by the board. Now they can also be prosecuted by this situation.

People will say that it is also mentioned in the bill about employers' fraud. While it's true it's there, I would like to remind people of the words by our Premier, Mike Harris, which he mentioned. There are two kinds of fraud: one that is irresponsible and should be prosecuted to the extent of the law; and the other one that is reasonable or understandable. He mentioned, on the one hand, the so-called welfare fraud as being the one that we should step on and eliminate; and the other one, in regard to employers cheating on taxes, considering that they are being taxed to death, it's understandable that they cheat.

If we transfer that to the situation with compensation, we think that will also happen, because everybody's mentioning that the assessments are high, the second highest in Canada. So it would be understandable that some cheating will go on, or it would be reasonable.

So why is this fraud crisis created? We think that, besides being the government's idea, creating crisis to put forward policies and legislation, this is just a part of a larger strategy pursued by extreme elements of the employment community. By creating the artificial financial crisis, it will justify the destruction of the workers' compensation system and the reduction of injured workers to charity cases. This artificial crisis has been propagated in a number of ways. Mr Spano will deal with those ways.

Mr Sebastian Spano: I'd like to talk a little bit about the so-called invented funding crisis, financial crisis in workers' compensation. I know you've heard this from other groups, and I think you should hear it time and time again, because that's all it is. It's simply a myth; it's a crisis that's being invented.

What exactly is the unfunded liability? Is it a debt? Well, it's not a debt. You've heard this before. The WCB has never been in debt, it's never borrowed a penny. Have you ever heard of a WCB debenture bond? There aren't any.

So what exactly does the WCB have? The WCB has, as of March 31, 1994, $6.8 billion in assets. That's almost $7 billion. What it represents really is $7 billion that is not in the hands of the employers to generate jobs and to generate income and profits for themselves. It's a pool of capital that the board is investing, in fact, all over the world; it is not investing it in the jobs. Certainly it is not in the hands of Ontario businesses to be invested in their companies.

So what is the unfunded liability? Well, I think the proper way to characterize it—there are a number of ways to characterize it, and one of them is that it's simply an accounting of how much employers owe workers of Ontario. It's also an accounting of how much employers are keeping in their businesses and not paying up front.

Employers have a choice. When a worker gets hurt and there are damages and he's injured, there's going to be loss of income in the future, there are damages for loss of use of their body, they have a choice: They can pay it all up front or they can pay it a little bit at a time. They can pay a little bit this year to meet this year's costs. They'll pay a little bit next year to meet next year's costs and so forth. It's a sensible system, it's an economical system and it works best. To characterize it as a debt is really irresponsible.

There are other mythical debts that are being created here. I read in Hansard Cam Jackson, the minister responsible for the WCB, indicating that the board in fact did not have an operating surplus of $130 million last year; that it was sham accounting by the WCB. Well, I'm sorry, I think either he needs a lesson in arithmetic or he should check the annual report. In fact, there was a $130-million surplus. They did not draw into the investment fund. He simply didn't count the amount from investments. He simply said yes, there was so much from employers, but he didn't count the amount that the board earned on its investments, and that's how the surplus was created. But this is typical.

Now, is it true that the employer assessments are skyrocketing? Not at all. Actual assessment rates, once the experience rating off balance has been taken into account, are at their lowest level in 10 years, and I should mention how much employers received as bonuses through experience ratings: $359 million. This is net. This is after the surcharges were taken out. That's $359 million that leaked out of the system. For what? Simply as a reward for employers to obey the laws of the province. I'd like to be rewarded for legally conducting my affairs.

There's also the problem of the accounting of the unfunded liability. It's based on really unreasonable actuarial assumptions. Most important is that the inflation rate will never rise above 4%. This is of course absurd. Certainly we can expect that over a number of years into the future it will exceed 4%, and whenever it does, any difference in that will mean a huge windfall for the fund. So this is another example of cooking the books, if you will.

If there is a crisis at all, the crisis is that the board is not enforcing what it should be enforcing; namely, employers who don't pay assessments, employers who don't register, employers who falsify or underreport their assessable payroll. This is the crisis in compensation, not the worker benefits.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you. I think if truth be known, unless Mr O'Toole can pose his question in about 30 seconds—

Mr O'Toole: Just a quick question. How do you explain that? If I may, through the Chair, how do you explain the Provincial Auditor's report that makes a very important point about this unfunded liability? I would expect as a true auditor and an objective auditor that his statement of the real future cost of existing claims is real, and expanding at an alarming rate. How do you explain that?

Mr Spano: My colleague Dave Wilken will answer that.

Mr David Wilken: I'm not sure which report you're exactly referring to.

Mr O'Toole: It's the Provincial Auditor's report.

Mr Wilken: From what year?

Mr O'Toole: For 1995. Just published a couple of weeks ago.

Mr Wilken: I'm not familiar with the details of that report.

Mr O'Toole: It's been the subject of the last two auditor's reports. Not only that, I take that as being an objective, sound financial statement that the province should have some concern with, and most of your argument or presentation today has indicated—it's liberally dismissed this as not a real number.

Mr Wilken: There are several concerns with respect to this. The last one that Sebastian was speaking about, the actuarial assumptions, I don't know whether or not the auditor went behind those in making those determinations, because while it should be said that a 4% annual inflation rate is a good historical benchmark, using that to calculate the amount of the unfunded liability ignores the fact of the cap and the partial indexing formula. If you didn't have that cap there, that would be a fine way of calculating the unfunded liability. But given the cap, in years when inflation goes over six and two thirds per cent, there will be an incredible windfall to the accident fund and that windfall will continue to grow over subsequent years as workers fall farther behind in inflation indexing.

This is a problem that, as far as I know, has not been addressed anywhere. The only costing that was given to us by the Ministry of Labour on the savings from de-indexing used this assumption of 4% inflation each and every year as the maximum, so that that cap would never come into play.

The Chair: Thank you, and with that, I'm afraid we're out of time.

Just to comment or respond to Ms Gemma's comments at the start of your presentation, we certainly do appreciate those who were able to find the time to come out the first day. We know it was on short notice. If you do have an opportunity to prepare a written brief, however, we have till December 6 to assimilate that.

I should note that only two speakers after you we have a group that's come all the way from Ottawa, so we will have many deputations, I'm sure, that will be from outside Toronto, but thank you again for this group taking the time to come and see us today.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS

The Chair: Our next group up is the Canadian Auto Workers, national office. Good afternoon. If you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves to the committee. We have 15 minutes to be divided as you see fit between presentation and questions.

Ms Cathy Walker: Thank you very much. My name is Cathy Walker. I'm the national health and safety director of the Canadian Auto Workers. With me is my colleague Nick De Carlo, who works in the health and safety department with me, who has prepared the brief that we'll present to you this evening.

We want to begin our presentation by strongly protesting the manner in which these hearings have been organized. First of all, there's been little notice. We were informed only last week that these hearings were taking place. Only on Thursday of last week were we informed of the hearing schedule. As it stands now, the committee has scheduled only three days of hearings on this most important bill, all of which are to take place in Toronto. This makes it almost impossible for a true cross-section of unions, injured workers, advocates and community organizations to make presentations to this committee. Most will not be able to travel to Toronto or to make presentations. Let me emphasize that our CAW local unions in communities throughout Ontario have their own points of view, their own experiences with the WCB, and must be heard.

It's apparent that there is no real intention to consult with working people in Ontario, those who are most affected by this legislation. This is not democracy. Moreover, the government of Ontario, which has a responsibility to protect the interests of the people of Ontario, has consistently acted in an undemocratic manner. From the moment of taking office in June until convening the Legislature at the end of September, the government cut spending and reduced social programs in this province like never before, without opportunity for a response from or a debate with the opposition. This is not in the democratic tradition.

Upon convening the Legislature, Bill 7 was forced through without debate or public hearings. This was an unprecedented disruption of the democratic process. Now we're having public hearings on Bill 15 that allow for only token public input. Moreover, Bill 15 is, in its very content, in full disrespect of the laws of Ontario and the rights of its citizens.

Previous to Bill 15, the Occupational Health and Safety Act and the Workers' Compensation Act defined the structure and the makeup of the board of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency and of the Workers' Compensation Board. Without changing the law, and in direct contradiction to it, the government of Ontario fired both boards. Now, after the fact, Bill 15 proposes to outlaw any lawsuit or civil proceedings against the government for these violations of the law. You have them in quote there.

Never have we seen in Ontario a government that has acted so unilaterally, with so little regard for the traditions of parliamentary democracy in this province. This is not what the people of Ontario voted for.

Safety is deteriorating; workers are being killed and injured. In the last number of years, workplaces across the province have been speeding up production and scheduling more and more overtime. Profits have been soaring in private industry. But health and safety enforcement has been deteriorating, and health and safety for workers has declined. According to statistics from the Ontario Ministry of Labour, critical accidents have increased almost 80% from 1991-92 to 1994-95. Complaints are up 37% in the same time period. Workplace inspections are down 55%. Orders issued have decreased almost 50% in the same time period.

The situation is already unacceptable, yet by reducing health and safety inspection and limiting the right of workers to refuse unsafe work, a measure already under active consideration by your government, the government of Ontario will be acting to reduce enforcement of safety standards, worker training in health and safety, and the workers' ability to protect themselves. By reducing the right to compensation, the government of Ontario will drastically reduce the protection for workers injured on the job.

This action by government, based on the CSR agenda, will increase the number of workplace injuries. Government legislation will remove basic rights to safety and security at work: security for the workers themselves and for their families. This is not what the people of Ontario voted for.

The introduction of Bill 15 and the announcement of plans to reduce the budget, staff and resources of the Ministry of Labour inspectorate signify the fundamental transformation of health and safety enforcement in Ontario. Health and safety enforcement is necessary to protect the safety, health and livelihood of Ontario workers, but we are going from a recognition of the need for the government to enforce health and safety standards in the workplace to a system of voluntary compliance. This has never worked and it will never work. The truth is that employers are, as a whole, pushing to make greater profits at lower costs in wages and benefits to workers. This has always meant increased injuries in the workplace. The statistics above show that is exactly what is happening today. Enforcement of health and safety in the workplace has been deteriorating and injuries are rising.

The Workers' Compensation Board recognized 233 work-related deaths in 1994, nearly one for every working day of the year. The reality is a figure much higher. Several years ago it was estimated in a study by Dr Analee Yassi, commissioned by the former Conservative government, that 6,000 workers die every year in Ontario from occupational diseases. Nothing indicates that this number has been reduced.

Bill 15 enshrines in law the dismissal of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency. Workers will no longer be represented at any level in the application of health and safety in Ontario. The board will be replaced by a single executive director. Democracy with input from the workers and their representatives is eliminated in favour of the old boys' club.

Health and safety training for workers has been severely reduced and even eliminated in non-union workplaces as a result of the curtailment of certification training. Funding has been reduced for the Workers' Health and Safety Centre, while funding for employer groups has gone untouched. It is clear that the government is intent on removing workers from a position of influencing health and safety while employers are gaining more freedom to disregard safety violations.

Continuing on the CSR path will cost workers' lives. We have no choice but to resist. We submit and indeed demand that Bill 15 be withdrawn, that funding be maintained for the Workers' Health and Safety Centre, that the health and safety inspectorate and resources allocated to it be expanded, that the enforcement of health and safety laws be strengthened.

The basic concept of workers' compensation has always been that a worker injured at work in the service of his or her employer is entitled to compensation for the injury and the right to return to gainful employment. The responsibility rests with the employer to pay the cost of compensation. In return, workers gave up the right to sue the employer. These are the fundamentals of the Workers' Compensation Act, first proclaimed in 1914 under a Conservative government. The act was based on a report by Chief Justice of Ontario Sir William Ralph Meredith.

Meredith rejected the concept of contributory premiums paid by workers and/or financing from government revenues. Why should this be so? Because the injured worker has given his or her health in the service of the employer for the benefit of the employer. Because the employer is ultimately in control of the safety of the workplace and therefore responsible for injuries that occur.

The crux of Bill 15 and of the planned changes to workers' compensation announced by the Minister of Labour is to reverse this concept and replace it with a vision of workers' compensation as a form of insurance. No longer will workers be able to expect full employer-funded compensation for their work-related injuries. Instead, they'll have little protection.

The Ontario government is laying the basis for this by emphasizing the unfunded liability of the board of $11.4 billion. They say that the workers' compensation system is "on the brink of financial crisis." They imply that workers are responsible for its financial shortfalls due to fraud. The government is manufacturing a crisis in order to influence public opinion to justify dismantling the compensation system as we know it, in order to justify instituting draconian measures against workers.

The unfortunate truth is that the Ontario government is deceiving the people of Ontario. The workers' compensation system is not in crisis. Last year, the board made a declared surplus of $130 million after paying $359 million in rebates to employers. Far from being broke, the board has over $6 billion in investments.

The bottom line, however, is that the unfunded liability is not a debt or a deficit: it is a cost to employers to cover workplace injuries, a cost that is rising because of the increase in injuries. It represents the cost the employers will have to pay in premiums for current and future injuries. Rather than addressing this cost by moving to reduce workplace accidents and toxic exposures, the Harris CSR agenda chooses to reduce workers' security and protection from accidents while allowing employers more freedom to work unsafely.

Is that what the Harris government means by more democracy in the workplace? This is a cruel and vicious ruse on the people of Ontario designed purely to increase profits to business. Why the drive to increase profits? The issue here is not the competitiveness of Ontario businesses. In 1994, there was an $8.8-billion investment in the manufacturing sector of Ontario, the most for any single year in Ontario's history. Executive salaries are up 18% over last year. The average wage of a chief executive was $632,000 last year.

No, the real issue here is greed, pure and simple. Business wants more profits and the government is going to give them to it. How? By reducing employer costs for health and safety and workers' compensation. Thanks to the high level of unemployment, there are plenty of unemployed to replace workers injured on the job. The Harris agenda is a sham.

What are the changes to workers' compensation, both promised and being considered, by Minister Witmer? You know them very well, and we are opposed to these proposed changes. All of these proposals would take place while premiums for employers would be reduced by 5%. Employers' costs would be further reduced by cutting off thousands of workers from benefits.

Bill 15 sets the stage for the fundamental restructuring of workers' compensation in Ontario. It removes the input of workers' representatives, formerly half the board, from the board's system. No longer will workers have a say in the compensation of injured workers.

Instead, government will add representatives of the private insurance companies, both at the board and management levels. This will happen despite the fact that private insurance companies are not stakeholders. They're not covered by workers' compensation in Ontario. They don't pay any premiums to the board. Employees who work for private insurance companies are not covered. The real agenda here is to eliminate the influence of workers, the real stakeholders in workers' compensation.

Ultimately, there is the real threat of the introduction of a law to privatize workers' compensation in Ontario, and we are completely opposed to this.

Bill 15 criminalizes workers. While companies are defrauding the workers' compensation system—more than 55,000 employers owe the board $430 million in outstanding assessments and penalties—the government is targeting workers. Among other things, a worker who fails to inform the board of a "material change" in connection with his or her entitlement is guilty of an offence. We are opposed to this proposed change. The definition of "offence" is wide open to interpretation. It's completely unclear what such a material change will mean.

Finally, the new purpose clause makes "financial accountability," contained in the first sentence of the clause, the overriding principle of the act rather than full compensation for injuries. This is entirely unnecessary.

Eliminating worker input, criminalizing workers, manufacturing a financial crisis and importing private insurance companies into the WCB system are the key pieces to the new direction in workers' compensation under the Harris agenda. These changes, combined with the cut-backs outlined above, make for a compensation system that penalizes workers for being injured. These changes, like others, attack the most vulnerable in our society.

We demand that workers' compensation remain an employer-funded, publicly administered system and that it be designed to fully compensate workers for injuries caused by or related to the workplace, or to provide a return to work at the pre-injury job or its equivalent.

We demand that costs of compensation be reduced by preventing injuries, not by penalizing workers.

Finally, we demand that the Harris government live up to its responsibilities to the workers of Ontario to ensure safety and security in the workplace.

The Chair: Thank you both. Your timing was excellent. Actually, you went about 16 minutes, but we appreciate the presentation and your taking the time to come and see us on short notice.

FEDERAL EMPLOYERS TRANSPORTATION AND COMMUNICATIONS ORGANIZATION

The Chair: If we can proceed to our next group, the Federal Employers Transportation and Communications Organization, we are grateful you've made it all the way down from Ottawa to see us this afternoon.

Interjection.

The Chair: Let's see if we can get as much in as possible. If anything, we'll grant a couple of minutes' consideration. We should just note that there is going to be a vote in the House at 6 o'clock and all committee work must cease for the time of the vote, but hopefully it's only a five-minute bell. So with your indulgence, if we could get at least partway, if you don't see that as a major dislocation, we'd like to get as much of your presentation in and then we can reconvene as soon as the vote's over. Could you introduce yourself to the committee and for Hansard.

Dr Roger Rickwood: Good afternoon. I'm Dr Roger Rickwood. I'm chair of the Federal Employers Transportation and Communications Organization, and with me is Madeleine Meilleur, the manager of WCB liaison with Canada Post Corp. We're both based in Ottawa.

Good afternoon, Chairman and members of the committee. The federally regulated transportation organization, FETCO, is pleased to appear before you this afternoon to support the Bill 15 amendments to the Workers' Compensation Act and Occupational Health and Safety Act.

FETCO represents 19 major transportation and communication firms across Canada; that is, Canadian Pacific, Canadian National, Bell Canada, Canadian Airlines International, the CBC, the Canadian Trucking Association and Canada Post Corp.

FETCO has established a standing committee on workers' compensation matters to monitor legislative and adjudicative developments and to make constructive representations to responsible decision-makers such as yourselves. FETCO firms are mainly members of schedule 2, but some of our subsidiaries are located in schedule 1 in Ontario. Some of our members are treated as if they were members of schedule 2 but in fact fall under the provisions of the federal Government Employees Compensation Act, GECA, whereby Labour Canada contracts with the WCBs for adjudication and administration of claims by injured workers in the public service and crown corporations. Canada Post Corp and the CBC fall into that category.

FETCO has been a strong and continuous supporter of WCB reform in Ontario, as the current Ontario system is not financially sustainable and is fractured by conflicting lines of accountability. Past failure to institute strong corrective measures has compromised Ontario industries' ability to compete in the North American marketplace. We understand that many of these corrective measures will be canvassed in the phase 2 review to be undertaken by the Honourable Cam Jackson, minister responsible for workers' compensation reform. These measures are the appeal, adjudication, restructuring, ban on chronic stress, benefit adjustments and assessment rate reductions. FETCO will make appropriate submissions on these matters at that time. Some of the necessary corrective measures, however, have been incorporated by the Minister of Labour, the Honourable Elizabeth Witmer, into Bill 15, and we would like to speak to them today.

With regard to the purpose clause, the list of the purposes is the same as in Bill 165, passed by the previous government. However, there are two new objectives: "To prevent or reduce the occurrence of injuries and occupational diseases at work," and, "To promote health and safety in workplaces." Although FETCO firms fall under federal health and safety jurisdiction, FETCO supports the broadening of the act to include these matters, as the current provincial jurisdiction needs to be more legislatively integrated if it is to be effective.

FETCO also submits that the purpose clause applies equally to the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal, WCAT, as to the Workers' Compensation Board. If this is not the intention of the Legislature, FETCO submits that it should be the case. The requirement that the WCB board of directors act in a financially responsible and accountable manner is now found in subsection 58(2) of the act by virtue of section 7 of Bill 15. We believe this kind of financially accountable statement should also apply to WCAT, and we're a bit concerned that, by making an inclusion and by repealing a section, people understand that this clearly does apply to WCAT.

The governance structure: Because of the financial crisis at the WCB and the breakdown of the bipartisan governing process under Bill 165, FETCO supports the emergency governance amendments of Bill 15, allowing a WCB president appointed by the Lieutenant Governor to exercise the powers and duties of the WCB board, chair and president until a multi-stakeholder board of directors is in place. FETCO recognizes the complexity of finding just the right person to discharge these duties and hopes the government can recruit a qualified person, whether he or she, before the end of 1995. In the meantime, FETCO will fully cooperate with the interim WCB president, Mr Ken Copeland.

FETCO supports the composition of the new WCB board of directors as set out in Bill 15 at subsections 6(2) and 9(1) and (2). The new board would consist of a chair, president and three to seven other members who are representative of workers, employers and others, as the Lieutenant Governor considers appropriate. FETCO does not have strong views on just what professional backgrounds the others should have, except that they should be persons qualified with good governance skills and experience, with a strong sense of the public interest and with no conflicts of interest. As for the employer members, FETCO submits that at least one member be either from or have significant knowledge of the schedule 2 deposit account community. We don't want all the members just to come from or have knowledge of schedule 1.

FETCO recognizes that the positions of partisan vice-chairs are no longer serving a useful purpose, but it is not certain that a functional vice-chair to oversee the complex area of occupational disease policy development is not in order. This is, however, a matter that should be more properly reviewed by Minister Jackson, and we will take up the matter there.

FETCO notes that, by the new Bill 15 configuration of the WCB board of directors, the chair of the WCAT will no longer be a non-voting member. The presence of the WCAT chair on the WCB board probably served a useful purpose in the mid-1980s in facilitating coordination between the newly organized corporate board and the nascent tribunal, but this presence has come to be seen by the employer community as an impediment to full review of controversial WCAT decisions by the board. Accordingly, FETCO sees deletion of the WCAT chair as a step towards a more searching WCB review of WCAT decisions. The future of WCAT as an independent agency external to the WCB will be canvassed by Minister Jackson, and FETCO will be able to give him the benefit of our experience with more streamlined appeal procedures in other provincial jurisdictions such as New Brunswick and Alberta.

With respect to policy directions from the minister, the statutory power of a minister to give direction to a WCB is a very rare institutional arrangement in Canada, with its long tradition of corporate autonomy. Our one experience with such a device has been in Saskatchewan, where the Minister of Labour may give direction on a new matter not previously determined by the WCB. The previous government imported this device into Ontario as a temporary measure. The present government plans to continue it, presumably as an emergency power to facilitate a fundamental re-engineering of the WCB in the face of unwarranted resistance or bureaucratic impasse. FETCO has confidence in the Minister of Labour to use this power sparingly, but submits the provision should continue to be time-limited by a predetermined expiry date, eg, two years. A newly revitalized board of directors, committed to financial sustainability and management culture change, as contemplated by the minister, will make the use of this provision, however, largely theoretical.

I will turn to my colleague Madeleine Meilleur to handle the rest of the presentation.

Ms Madeleine Meilleur: Value-for-money audit, section 16 of Bill 15: FETCO endorses the proposed amendment in Bill 15 to require the WCB board of directors to review at least one board program annually for its cost, efficiency and effectiveness under the direction of the Provincial Auditor. FETCO agrees that the Minister of Labour should have the power to choose which program gets the value-for-money audit. FETCO acknowledges that the WCB has done value-for-money audits before, but applauds the government's determination to make it a regular and consistent practice.

Dr Rickwood: Bill 15 requires the WCB and the minister to enter into a memorandum of understanding every five years, in terms directed by the minister. The MOU will require a strategic plan for the next five years, an annual statement setting out proposed priorities for administering the act and regulations, and an annual statement of investment policies and goals. FETCO supports these MOU requirements as a means to impose strict, businesslike discipline on the board's management and to prevent internal negotiations dragging on for years between MOL officials and various factions within the board.

Ms Meilleur: Fraud prevention: FETCO strongly supports the anti-fraud provisions contained in Bill 15, which the Minister of Labour hopes will counteract current losses estimated at over $150 million a year. FETCO has promoted such provisions for years but the reception, prior to this government's initiative, was at best lukewarm, if not arctic cold, at the ministry and the board.

FETCO believes the compulsory employer registration provision within 10 days will be strictly enforced and the situation of registered employers having to cover unregistered employers will be quickly eliminated.

FETCO supports the requirement for workers or other benefits recipients to notify the board of material changes in circumstances in connection with his or her entitlement to benefits within 10 days of the material change.

Overpayment and collection of debts: FETCO supports the new provisions to recover benefit overpayments and collection of debts. These provisions bring WCB practice in line with normal business overpayment and collection practices.

Offences: FETCO notes Bill 15 introduces penalties for those who get money or benefits from the WCB by deliberately providing false and misleading information and makes it an offence for an employer not to register with the board. Abusers could thus face jail terms and stiff fines under these new rules. This would be a change from the present practice under the Criminal Code, where enforcement was infrequent because the system was lengthy, expensive and convictions rare. FETCO believes the new enforcement measures are necessary to serve as a deterrent to abuse, although resorting to them will likely be rare, due to the better management and monitoring of claims files and outreach communications.

FETCO thanks you for listening to our comments on Bill 15, and we hope we can answer any questions you may have about the presentation.

The Chair: Extraordinarily good timing, as the bells start. With the indulgence of the committee, if it meets with everyone's approval, I would like to suggest we adjourn for the vote and return to allow—

Interjection.

The Chair: Oh, there is no vote. Okay, so much for that. We can proceed with questions now. It was a false alarm. This time it would be Mr Duncan, the opposition parties.

Mr Duncan: In terms of the governance structure, you've presented a case around your support of what the government hopes to achieve. Would you support amendments that further refine the bill to read that the number of representatives from labour and management in their totality be equal inside of the multi-stakeholder model?

Dr Rickwood: I think the government has crafted a very useful number of people here on the board of directors. I could see there being two employers and two employee representatives on the board of directors, but with three other representatives. What this will force the—

Mr Duncan: Well, it's between three and seven.

Dr Rickwood: There's a seven-person board and two extra members; it could be nine members in total. That's my understanding of it.

Mr Duncan: That's correct, so between three and seven appointments over and above the chairman and the president.

Dr Rickwood: We see the full seven being appointed: two employees, two employers, plus three other members.

Mr Duncan: So then you would support an amendment saying two and two?

Dr Rickwood: With the balance being controlled by these three other members.

Mr Duncan: But a multi-stakeholder model envisions that. All I'm saying is that under the present circumstance, you could have a situation where you could appoint one employee representative and six employer representatives and still be acting within the confines of the act. What I am suggesting is, would you agree with a refinement to that that would say the number of employee and employer representatives must be equal?

Dr Rickwood: I think two is adequate to accomplish the purposes of the act. There's a question of balance here. You have to have at least two employers or employees to be present, because it could be a situation where none would be at the table, and yet they're subject to the impact of regulations and decisions being made. So there has to be provision so that one can always be there.

The next thing is, I think that by having only four and three others, it means the employers and the worker members have got to cooperate together to make sure that things are done right. They're being compelled to negotiate and work together so that the power doesn't fall into the hands of the other independent public interest members.

Mr Duncan: One other question, if I might: Over the years, various employer groups, and it depends again on the government that's in power, but employer groups in the past have had a real concern with the minister having a direct ability to influence the day-to-day workings of the WCB. I'm really curious about the business community's present-day support for this, in light of the business community's concerns in the past about government interference with the operations of the board.

Dr Rickwood: I think the concern in the past was hidden interference. We didn't know when it was happening but we did know it was happening. The structure, by having the minister give direction to the board, makes it an open-ended process so that we're aware that this direction is being offered.

We recognize that this is an unusual procedure, and we only know of one other act in the country that allows that, which is in Saskatchewan, but we think the impasse, the difficulties that we've got into in Ontario, needs some means to kickstart the process and get things moving along. Therefore we're prepared to have the minister perform this function at this time, and we have confidence in the minister to act in a credible manner.

The Chair: With that, I'm concerned that we get our last deputation in today. I appreciate very much the specifics you've brought to us, Doctor, and Madame Meilleur. Thank you for taking the time from your council duties to come down to us today. We appreciate the comments you've brought.

Dr Rickwood: We appreciate the opportunity to be down here out of the snow and into the beautiful rainy weather of Toronto.

Ms Meilleur: And back in the storm.

The Chair: Hope the roads were well cleared.

ONTARIO PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYEES UNION

The Chair: Our last presenters today are the Ontario Public Service Employees Union. We certainly apologize for the slight delay in having you come forward and I appreciate the committee's indulgence.

Ms Diana Clarke: And it's just raining now.

We welcome the opportunity to address the committee, frankly on pretty short notice, so we have provided you with a brief of basically the summary of what we feel is our position around Bill 15.

Earlier this fall, the Minister of Labour requested by letter submissions from employers and workers and other interested groups around certain issues. It's with great interest to us that the board only chose to address the dismantling of the bipartite board of directors and the financial viability areas. We're making the assumption that a lot of these bigger issues—and we believe these are huge issues—should have been left with the Workers' Compensation Secretariat as now established to look at these issues.

From OPSEU's perspective, the bill does very little in improving service delivery in the workers' compensation system for workplace parties and other service providers. In lieu of the current work of the Workers' Compensation Secretariat, it would appear to be unnecessary and cumbersome legislation in a time when the whole system is being studied.

It is our intention to focus on four significant areas proposed in Bill 15: the financial viability; governance; offences and penalties; and overpayments.

With respect to financial viability, the government has expressed an interest in improving the financial viability of the board and proposed several sections of the bill to address the question. However, we believe that the financial concerns at the board have rested with the chronic underassessment set each year to employers since 1984 and the lack of assessment collections from employers. There are significant financial concerns about income collection from employers and reallocation of revenues to employers.

Some significant figures, and I'm sure you've heard some of them earlier, are: In 1994, the board paid out $280 million more in unplanned rebates back to employers than it imposed in penalties. There were 55,000 employers owing about $400 million in unpaid assessments and penalties, and as many as 20,000 employers have not legally registered their businesses with the board and thus are not contributing to the accident fund at all.

Average assessments for employers are continuing to decline, and yet the board in 1994 showed a $130-million operating surplus, for the first time in 14 years. This improvement is well before what was predicted in the board's original 20-year financial plan, put out in 1985. Frankly, the board's in a better position than what was predicted.

The board's funding ratio has improved to 37.4% in 1994 from 31.8% in 1985. Compared to private insurance schemes, that's a pretty healthy margin, and in the next few years the ratio is expected to really increase on a steady basis.

What we want to note here is it means that if you put all your moneys in reserve to pay for everything in future, there's not as much money left to use for business purposes. The reserve is there and you've still got $6 billion and we're showing an operating surplus. The board's in a better position than it's ever been before.

The current legislation gives the board significant power to collect outstanding employers' debts to the system, yet the board has not focused its energy on these collections. The government has declared that it's open for business. However, good business practices dictate that any business meet its legal requirements. If bad employers are not paying their share, deal with it appropriately and responsibly.

As to other sections of the bill with respect to financial viability, the proposed amendments have little impact.

Section 1: Well, since as far as we're concerned it's already dictated to the board of directors to show responsibility to do with financial viability, it doesn't seem appropriate to put it in the purpose clause as well. The purpose clause in the current act does nothing to change, improve, address further, financial accountability. Basically, any purpose clause is to address the purpose of the legislation and not the method for implementing it or administering it.

Section 13, with respect to the memorandum of understanding clause, will require the board to enter into a new agreement with the Minister of Labour every five years and shall contain "only such terms as may be" dictated "by the minister." The board is responsible for the day-to-day operations of the Workers' Compensation Board. The Workers' Compensation Act sets out the memorandum of understanding for the board to administer the system and benefits and services entitlement. By changing it, you're establishing unprecedented political control over a government agency.

Section 16, to do with the value-for-money audits amendment, we believe is unnecessary. The board has been conducting regular value-for-money audits on several different programs for years, with emphasis particularly on new programming. Why is it necessary to place in the act the need to conduct one audit of one program a year as determined by the government each year? The selection of one program audit a year, as ordered by the government, appears to be due to political pressure and not necessarily a true value. If the board of directors is responsible for the financial and administrative activities of the Workers' Compensation Board, we would submit that the board be allowed to do its job, working with workplace parties and in consultation with government.

In fact, we would probably submit that the secretariat is doing the largest value-for-money audit right now, which is the entire program. So why would you need to only have one a year? You might have more. Why build it into legislation?

Governance: Financially, as well as from an administrative point of view, the board was improving under the joint governance model. Strong emphasis has been put on early return-to-work efforts, better and workable policy development, financial review and preventive occupational health and safety initiatives.

This government did announce that it had established a WCB secretariat to review the entire system by next year. In the meantime, the bipartite board of directors was to continue to perform its duties with its responsibility and accountability. Instead of waiting for the outcome of the WCB secretariat's report, which should have included the review of the merits of the current governance model, it chose to fire the existing board before the passage of this bill and replace it with an interim board structure again.

As noted under the financial viability section, the board has continued to improve financially in spite of collection problems under the interim and bipartite board of directors in the past three years.

What the workers' compensation system required was stability during this time of rapid board changes under Bill 165 and external review, and not an interim board structure with appointments of people not experienced in the workers' compensation system.

With respect to offences and penalties, we just believe that section 27 will not work. It's an administrative nightmare and redirects the efforts of the board staff from administering the benefits and services that the board offers, to becoming assessment and benefit cops. This system is already burdened with a very complicated workers' compensation legislation.

All workers, employers, representatives and service providers will be subject to possible prosecutions for each offence, up to $25,000 and possibly up to six months in jail, if they know and do not inform the board of a possible material change in circumstances and/or knowingly make a false or misleading statement or representation which might affect benefits within 10 days.

Frankly, what is a material change?

Secondly, it's very difficult to prove that the individual or corporation charged knowingly made the statements. Beyond evidence concerns, this is a very high legal test and thus the board would have to prove such a high legal standard. It would be easier simply to proceed to a fraud charge under the existing Criminal Code as it stands today. The board's current policy on fraud is sufficient to cover the extreme circumstances of fraud situations.

How does anyone inform the board of a material change in circumstances? Frequently the board is difficult to reach, and even if you fax something to the board today, it would take 10 days before it got to someone to look at it, rather than to acknowledge that they even received it. There are many people, both employers and workers, who call and it takes three weeks for them to contact someone at the board to even acknowledge the phone call.

Perhaps the most significant negative feature of this section is that it makes the system even more litigious. Every representative, corporation and service provider will have to take out liability insurance to protect themselves from possible court actions. Workplace parties will be very wary of dealing with board officials and each other. This only further burdens communication problems and it will slow down the adjudication and return-to-work efforts.

The act already contains a number of offence sections which have never been fully used because they are not efficient. They were unenforceable and, if attempted to be enforced, only put a heavy burden on the provincial courts, which can't handle what they've got now.

The board also has expended further costs in administering this system, and yet the return of investment is very poor. It's our position that basically you're going to put a lot more staff in to spend a lot more time policing the system. If you look at the types of costs we're looking at, for instance, the total amount of temporary total benefits that were paid to workers last year, the weekly amount, was $217 million, somewhere around there in the annual report, and yet employers got more in rebates than the workers ever received in weekly benefits last year. All this effort, and for what?

We would submit that the better use of the board's resources would be to direct its efforts to the collection of outstanding employers' penalties and assessments and improving service delivery to workplace parties.

Thus, we recommend the deletion of that section in the bill.

With respect to overpayments, the board already cuts off workers' benefits immediately if it believes the worker owes an overpayment and will take action to collect first from the worker's other WCB entitlements if the worker does not dispute the overpayment creation. Collection of outstanding debts follows any other government agency or civil law system, as it stands now. What this section does introduce is an unnecessary and cumbersome clause and condition to an overpayment process that is working now. By adding this section, it would only make it more cumbersome.

So we recommend the deletion of sections 3 and 14.

In conclusion, we believe that the introduction of any bill was too premature and should have waited for the outcome of the WCB secretariat's recommendations. We are greatly concerned at the way the government is proceeding on this bill.

It is our position that in light of the cancellation of the Royal Commission on Workers' Compensation and the mandate of the WCB secretariat, the bill should be withdrawn at this time.

Our workers want real input into any proposed changes to the workers' compensation system and want the right to public hearings before the WCB secretariat. The government has kept the secretariat's intent and work behind closed doors. Injured workers want the right to real input to a system that was set up to allow full benefits and services to injured workers in exchange for giving up their litigation rights.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Clarke. The first question goes to the third party.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. I'd like to focus on your section dealing with financial viability. Both employee and employer representatives here today have spent a great deal of time talking about this, and I've asked other groups the same question.

The government, at the same time that it's making financial viability a cornerstone of its rhetoric, is also proposing a 5% cut in the assessment rates that employers pay. For some of us, we have some difficulty finding the common sense in that. Can I ask what your thoughts are as to the appropriateness of a 5% cut in assessment rates. If you're not satisfied that this is where they ought to be looking, what would you make the priority in terms of financial viability?

Ms Clarke: With respect to the 5% cut in assessment rates, if you look at how assessment rates are determined, you look at what costs are going to have to be put out during that year, including your legislated costs, which is the Office of the Worker Advisor, WCAT, all those different costs, you look at what it costs to administer the act and actually the financial amount of money that you have to pay out to administer the act, everything that you have to pay out. That's how the assessment rates are normally set, and then they just take a look across the board and they figure out according to class how much you're supposed to pay.

If you cut at 5%—if you set your assessment rates on what you have to pay out, why would you cut them 5%? Then you're only putting yourself at 5% more debt. I don't understand that logic—

Mr Christopherson: We don't either.

Ms Clarke: —if you really, really look at the assessment. I'm going to say too that many employers in this province received a 300% increase, and 5% is not going to satisfy those employers. Those were employers who often had very, very high accident rates and they were the ones who have been pushing for this decrease in amount.

In fact our position is that what you do is, you pay for what the debt is. Now, the debt is going down and the cutbacks that took place with respect to Bill 165 and other initiatives are going to bring it down a lot more. What you're finding is that every year from now on, the board will make more and more money, and it already has $6 billion sitting there if it needs to call on it. Why would you cut 5%? I don't think that's financially viable and I don't think it's financially responsible. So my priority isn't that; my priority would be to endorse good health and safety, to endorse good return-to-work practices for both parties and ask them to participate.

Thirdly, for the people who should have paid the bill all the way along, because the bad employers are the one that hold it up for the good employers, they should pay the debt, like they should have all the way along.

The Chair: Do you have a supplementary?

Mr Christopherson: Yes. Thank you for the opportunity. Also a lot of discussion around the governance model, and we've heard—I wish I'd had a chance to ask one of the other presenters a question because they talked about it—the new legislation will force employers and employee representatives to work together and to find compromise and to work their way through problems. I would have thought that was the best argument there was for a bipartite board. Perhaps you can give us your views on the potential effectiveness of a bipartite board and also what it means for workers when they have their numbers reduced to what Bill 15 proposes.

Ms Clarke: What I'm surprised at, frankly, is that the board has been bipartite and operating as a bipartite board for the last three years, and the return-to-work policies in particular that came out and the efforts around Bill 165 to get workers back to work and to work out compromises at the workplaces are happening right now. A lot of the financial improvement packages were agreed to by both sides and were seen as necessary to stabilize what was going on out there.

I don't understand the need to remove the bipartite board when it actually was doing what it was supposed to do, and had done for three years. I think people should realize that in fact it was functioning and it was working in consultation with the government in trying to move the board further and forward, because a lot of what the board is about is policy setting, and that's where it happens. It happens on how you get people back to work fast so the costs go down for everybody and that people are working as fast as they can. Only 5% of workers who claim comp are on comp a year later. In fact, 80% or more are off workers' compensation within three months of a claim, and that's all costs. To me, it was doing its job.

Mrs Barbara Fisher (Bruce): I do, first of all, agree with many of the comments you've made in your presentation today in that you have taken into consideration some of the same concerns and weaknesses within the system that we have also been sharing. However, some of our intent is obviously to move ahead to help with those areas the weaknesses exist in.

One of the things that you do address in here relates to offences and penalties. Our concern is that there continues to be, from whatever perspective you might share, either an offence because the employer is not paying the premiums or an offence by a worker who's maybe not claiming as should be done. How would you do it?

Ms Clarke: How would I do it?

Mrs Fisher: Yes.

Ms Clarke: I've been practising workers' compensation for 17 years, so this isn't new to me. I think the problem with offences as drafted out now in terms of employers is that the idea was that we were supposed to have a no-litigation system. It was supposed to be, you paid and then benefits were paid, and there was a third group, a board, that administrated it fairly. That was the way it was supposed to be done.

If you're going to ask employers who are already not paying, or violating the act as it is, the board could simply collect off them now, and should have a long time ago. Now we're also hitting them for up to $25,000 each time. We can't even get them to pay the debts that they owe. I hate to say this, but this is a really unnecessary additional burden into the system that isn't needed to be there.

For service providers, I find it surprising that doctors and all the medical care—they rely heavily on the board, so why would they suddenly try and rip the board off? I hate to say this, but the board will cut you off, and it doesn't pay for the services until after the services are completed. So in a sense, the offences don't really work.

As to workers, the board has a very aggressive overpayment policy now. It basically says that if they declare an overpayment, you have to challenge the merit of that overpayment if you disagree with it. If not, the board immediately assumes to collect money where it can from the existing benefits that you have. Secondly, if they can't, they go like any other collection agency and say, "What can we do to work out a reasonable overpayment that doesn't put the person into bankruptcy?" They do that now, and if there really were a large amount, they would go to the courts, sue and pick it up like anyone else.

The offences only add another layer to what's there already. To me, I wouldn't add anything, because all you've got to do is implement what you have. They do it very well and they've been very aggressive in the last year.

Mrs Fisher: I guess the question would be then, it seems to us like that's been in place, bipartite's been in place; it's not recovering what you're saying. The increase in accidents—the NDP was encouraging us to keep the Workplace Health and Safety Agency. What happens is, numbers go up. We're trying to correct the system. So I'm not saying that we're too far apart in terms of critiquing the system in where it's not working. I'm suggesting, however, the proposals we have before us are a new approach on how we can make it happen. Would you comment on that?

Ms Clarke: I don't think it would make a difference. I think a lot of times the board has been quite frankly intimidated by employers' lobbies and very intimidated by the process in the sense that if you went after an employer, the employer would cry foul and the board would back off. I've seen it again and again and again where they don't pay. A lot of employers just simply shut down and open up under another number. So my problem is, how do you deal with that situation? It's not going to be one that you can easily answer by saying that this is going to do it, because this isn't going to do it; what does it get aggressive about collecting what you've got. If you could get that, we'd be well into correcting the system that we now have. Unfortunately, in the last 10 years people have been really soft on it to try and deal with it.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Clarke. I appreciate your patience and the committee's patience. Thank you for your indulgence on this, our first day of hearings. If there's nothing else for the committee, we stand adjourned until 3:30, December 4.

The committee adjourned at 1823.

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA
LOCAL 9042 AND PEEL-HALTON AREA COUNCIL

The Chair: Good morning. My apologies to the United Steelworkers of America, Local 9042 and Peel-Halton Area Council. Is Mr Collie here? Good morning, Mr Collie, my apologies for the delay. We have a copy of your submission, thank you, and just a reminder, as we will be reminding all the groups today, that we're under a time constraint and we will be cutting off any discussions or questions and answers at 15 minutes. You're free to take as much time for your presentation as you wish or to allow it for questions and answers.

Mr Ron Collie: I'm here representing the Peel-Halton area Steelworkers. We represent approximately 5,000 members in the Peel-Halton area, and I'd just like to make a submission to the committee based on our concerns with Bill 15.

On November 1 of this year, the government gave first reading to Bill 15, an act which, in effect, gets rid of the bipartite board of directors at the Workers' Compensation Board and basically criminalizes the workers' compensation system.

This bill, from what we can see, is strictly an ideological way of the way this government views working people. Bill 15 does absolutely nothing to improve the financial situation of the WCB or the services provided to injured workers or employers. It is little more than a move to create a crisis in the workers' compensation system so the government can justify cutting benefits for injured workers this coming spring.

The government will replace the bipartite board of directors with a multi-stakeholder board, even though it was a multi-stakeholder board which drove the compensation system to its lowest funding position ever in the early 1980s. In fact, in 1985 the WCB had on hand only 31.8% of the money it owed to injured workers. Today it has more than 37% of that money.

The bipartite board of directors gave workers an equal say in how the board was run. In fact, the bipartite board had made some incredible progress, bringing new claims costs down dramatically, reducing the board's overhead and returning more disabled injured workers to the workplace than ever before. It enjoyed its first operating surplus in 10 years and reduced the unfunded liability for the first time in its history, and the working members of the WCB board of directors endorsed an internal financial reform package which would have paid off the unfunded liability by the year 2014.

Although the bipartite structure may at times not work, it has been proven by the health and safety agency, where over 300 decisions were reached using a bipartite structure and only once did an issue ever go to a vote.

We believe that the way a bipartite structure can work is when there is a neutral third party who is a good strong facilitator who can bring the parties to a consensus in times of deadlock.

The main reason for a bipartite structure is that it is fair. In the workers' compensation system, there are only two true stakeholders, the workers and the employers, and only those two groups should be on a board of directors.

So the question is, why fire the bipartite board? The Minister of Labour has fired a board of directors that has made tremendous progress. She probably doesn't know about the board's progress. The Common Sense Revolution made a commitment in 1994 and she's going to carry it out whether it makes sense or not: once again an ideological move, just as it was when she fired the bipartite board of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency.

I don't think this government believes in giving workers an equal share of the responsibility, yet it is workers who suffer the carnage of workplace accidents. Neither will give the Workers' Compensation Board over to the employer community. Presumably it will have more Conservatives on the WCB and the unfunded liability will again resume its climb at the expense of workers, because, although they criticize the unfunded liability in public, privately I believe employers enjoy their ability to offload their current liabilities to future employers.

In August 1995, the minister wrote a letter describing her government's proposals for WCB change. Basically, she described the WCB components of the Common Sense Revolution. Only about half of the changes proposed in her letter ended up in Bill 15. The other items, however, are gone but not forgotten, and I suppose we'll have to wait until the spring to find out what other havoc this government is going to wreak on workers in this province.

The second reason for Bill 15 that we can see is the government's contention that the WCB is being defrauded by injured workers in this province. From my own experience in dealing with workers' claims that resulted in overpayments, the overpayments were either reimbursed to the board or the overpayment decision was reversed. All the overpayments were created due to errors by board staff. None were because workers deliberately tried to defraud the board.

Again this government is creating a crisis in an attempt to mask the real fraud and abuse at the WCB, that being the fraud perpetrated by employers. The following is a short list of some of the financial facts that I believe this government should look at.

First of all, there are more than 55,000 employers who owe the WCB $430 million in outstanding assessments and penalties.

The NEER and CAD-7 programs were originally intended to promote workplace health and safety. However, these programs have loopholes which have been manipulated by employers to such an extent that they drain the WCB of more than $200 million annually.

The second injury and enhancement fund is another program being constantly abused. In over 90% of the workers' claims I handle, I see employers applying for relief under the second injury and enhancement fund, and in the majority of claims, the reasons behind the applications are frivolous and have no factual evidence. There is simply a supposition that something must be prolonging the claim, and in a great number of cases the board automatically grants 50% relief.

In 1994, more money was paid out in NEER rebates to employers than was paid to injured workers in short-term disability claims. In that year, $337 million was paid to workers in short-term disability claims while employers received $359 million in rebates.

There are an estimated 20,000 employers who legally should be registered with the WCB and contributing to the system who continue to go undetected.

Some 700,000 Ontario workers are denied WCB coverage because their employers have been successful in lobbying governments to exempt them from the system.

It is a fact that employer WCB premiums have steadily declined from a target of $3.34 per $100 of payroll in 1993 to $3 per $100 in 1995.

Now, with regard to possible future privatization of the WCB, the WCB spends approximately 17% of its expenses on overhead, while a private insurance company like Sun Life of Canada spends over 30%. This is a big difference in administrative costs.

Given the dramatic turnaround in the board's financial situation and the hundreds of millions of dollars being sucked from the system through employer fraud and abuse, how can this government justify its drive in this bill to fire a board of directors that was working and replace it with a multi-stakeholder board that has been proven in the past not to work, and to create the impression that injured workers in this province are nothing but a bunch of criminals?

To sum up, this bill is just another attempt by this government to attack the most vulnerable members of society in this province so as to pay back the employee contributors for the financial support received during the recent election campaign. There is no justification for what this bill does to the board and the act.

The board is in the best financial position it has ever been in, with $6.8 billion in the bank. It is nearly twice as efficient as private insurance companies. It is enjoying an operating surplus. Employer premiums have decreased dramatically. Hundreds of millions of dollars in employee abuse and fraud could be ended simply. Overhead costs have been slashed, and the implementation of internal financial reforms could eliminate the unfunded liability. The bipartite board of directors had the financial situation at the board in hand and was beginning to turn the ship around. This could not be done overnight by the bipartite board and will not be done overnight by this government and a multi-stakeholder board. To blame injured workers for the board's financial problems is the government's way of hiding from the public the true criminals of this province, that being those employers who are defrauding and abusing the workers' compensation system.

There's one important history lesson that needs to be remembered here: Injured workers in this province gave up the right to sue their employers for workplace injuries in order to get a fair compensation system that does not treat them like criminals. By giving up this right, many smaller businesses may have been saved from possible financial ruin.

I think this government should reconsider the path it is following before workers and organized labour are forced into actions that would be detrimental to labour relations in this province.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Collie. Questioning will begin with the opposition.

Mr Duncan: I noted you were talking about the performance of private insurers versus publicly owned insurers. I guess you're concerned that the government is going to eventually try to privatize the Workers' Compensation Board. I wonder if you'd take a moment to elaborate on your findings. I found them very interesting. You were talking about overhead costs and so forth.

Mr Collie: There have been studies done by the Ontario Federation of Labour which have looked at administrative costs of the board and also of private insurance companies like the one I mentioned, Sun Life, and the administrative costs seem to be greater for private insurance companies.

Another thing that needs to be remembered is that private insurance companies, their sole interest is based on profit, while a publicly run Workers' Compensation Board, its interest should be in compensating workers for their injuries. I don't believe private insurers would have that same interest in mind.

Mr Duncan: You noted some of your concerns about the offences sections of the bill. The offences sections, as you know, deal both with employers and employees in separate parts, and in your text you advocate not going forward with all of the offences sections, all of part V of the bill?

Mr Collie: I think the act as it is right now has sufficient provisions for offences. I don't think there's any need for changes.

Mr Duncan: Either on the employer or employee side?

Mr Collie: Yes, both.

Mr Duncan: So you would just advocate not going forward with part V of Bill 15?

Mr Collie: That's correct.

Ms Shelley Martel (Sudbury East): Mr Collie, I want to focus a little bit on the crisis you talked about early on in your brief where you said in this case the crisis of the unfunded liability, that is, the crisis that the government is trying to promote. In relation to that, you talked about the assessment rate for employers and you have said that this has been decreasing steadily since 1991 and "the 1995 average rate is at 1988 levels." Given that assessment rate and given the state of the unfunded liability right now and the crisis the government is trying to promote, what do you think about the government's action to decrease employers' assessment rates by another 5%?

Mr Collie: I believe that it's only going to add to the board's costs, in particular if you take into account the possible decrease in workers' benefits by 5%. Decreasing the employers' assessment by 5% I believe will only add to the costs at the WCB board.

Ms Martel: So how serious do you think the crisis is that the government is claiming is behind this bill?

Mr Collie: I don't think it's as serious as they're claiming. The unfunded liability is not—it is, in a sense, a dollar figure, but it's based on payments that the board has to make over the next how many years, I don't know. There's lifetime pensions taken into account as well. I don't think it's a crisis in as great a proportion as the government has created.

Ms Martel: Do you think the fact that for the first time under the bipartite board the unfunded liability actually came down would have been reason enough to believe that the folks who were doing the work that they were supposed to, and had they been allowed to continue, would have gotten the situation under control?

Mr Collie: Yes. I believe in the bipartite system. I believe it's fair and, like I said, there's two true stakeholders at the board, that being employers and workers, and those are the ones who should be on a board of directors.

The Chair: We have time for one quick question from the government side.

Mr Bart Maves (Niagara Falls): I'll try to be quick. You were talking about fraud by injured workers and said that in your experience it never happens, and when there's problems it's usually WCB's fault because of poor paperwork and so on and so forth. You then went on with a long list of fraud by employees and employers who are skipping out and not paying premiums that they should be paying to the WCB system. Then your conclusion is that the current board works, and I'm kind of puzzled by that.

Mr Collie: I think the act works, or it should work if it was implemented properly. There are provisions in the act whereby employers can be fined and whereby workers can be fined, and I believe that if the act was administered properly it would work for both workers and employers and covering penalties as well.

Mr Maves: It's not being administered properly now then?

Mr Collie: I don't believe so.

Mr Maves: But you're in favour of maintaining the current board?

Mr Collie: I believe in maintaining the current board of directors and I believe in maintaining the current act, but I believe it should be administered more fairly.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Collie. I appreciate you taking the time to come before us and appreciate your very detailed submission as well.

DURHAM REGION LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Durham Region Labour Council, Tim Eye. Good morning. Again, just a reminder that we're under a time constraint here today to try to get all 72 groups in during the two days, so we'll be limiting discussion.

Mr Tim Eye: Well, I understand that this government does have a mandate to rush things through and sometimes, in my opinion, I believe in haste there's waste.

My name's Tim Eye and I'm president of the labour council in the region of Durham. I represent 51 local unions whose approximate population is about 40,000 unionized workers. I would like to bring to your attention that due to the short notice I was not able to prepare a presentation. However, I do have some notes from the federation of labour and the CAW national union; I am a member of both.

I would like to restrain my comments to the fact that presently there are 55,000 employers that currently owe around $400 million in unpaid assessments and penalties, and as many as 20,000 employers across Ontario haven't even bothered to register with the WCB in spite of their legal obligation to do so. I'd also like to point out that in its report to the royal commission, the office of the worker adviser estimated that the WCB can save money or increase revenues by $500 million without any reduction in benefits to injured workers.

I would also like to make a notation that I am an injured worker. I've been hauled out of the General Motors assembly plants twice on stretchers and I'm left with a permanent disability. I can't even play catch with my son or my daughter. So I speak from personal experience, and if you want to ask some questions later and have some comments as to a little history of how I got involved in the trade union movement, I'd be happy to discuss it.

The WCB system is not in crisis. The unfunded liability is not a debt. The unfunded liability represents the present cost of future payments owed to injured workers by their employers for present claims. The WCB is not bankrupt; it has more than $6 billion in assets. In fact, in the past employers have opposed a fully funded system on the basis that they did not want a fund of billions of dollars in the control of the board, but instead wanted access to that money for current investment under their own control. Now they complain about a crisis and this government is using this false understanding of the financing of the compensation system to attack workers by reducing their benefits.

The purpose clause, section 0.1 amending the act: labour's position is there's no need for further financial accountability language in the act. The present language is adequate and it should be enforced and thus this change should be opposed. The focus of the act should be on providing benefits and services for injured workers, and money should be saved by means of worker-employer cooperation on health and safety and return-to-work programs. Proactive health and safety committees work.

I would refer you to a submission that I made on Bill 165, through the Hansard. In there, I referred to the health and safety committees in the General Motors workplace. I'm a carpenter at General Motors and we just had a massive retooling in General Motors' car plants without any lost-time accident to the skilled trades workforce in the workplace, but that's only because of vigorous and proactive health and safety committees in the plants working with the workers and the employers to make it a safe place to work. They do work if there's cooperation.

The labour position: WCB already has the tools at its disposal to deal with the small number of worker fraud cases. There is no need for a whole new set of offences targeting workers. WCB should put its resources into pursuing employers who are ripping off the system.

The new board of directors: The labour's position there is the bipartite board of directors gave workers an equal say in the governance of the Workers' Compensation Board. It recognized the primary role of the two workplace parties. It was a structure that would have allowed for solving the system's problems without reducing worker benefits or services. We should oppose the idea of a multipartite board and call for the restoration of the bipartite board, including injured worker representation.

If you want to ask somebody what it's like going through the circus of red tape that's through—in the board policy and how it's enacted from a worker's perspective, maybe you should ask an injured worker.

Interim governance of the board: The labour position is that we should strongly opposed the dismantling of the bipartite board of directors, and the position of labour in the region of Durham is such. We should also oppose the illegal firing of the board members and oppose the unprecedented use of legislation to legalize illegal acts after the fact.

Memorandum of understanding, section 13, replacing subsections 65.2(1) and (2) of the act: The labour position—we should oppose the use of a memorandum of understanding to dictate the government's agenda to the Workers' Compensation Board. It's a separate agency, set at arm's length from government, and I'm sick and tired of having to come down here and advocate on behalf of people who are getting maimed, mangled and murdered in their workplace just for the sake of one government of the day making a political football out of this issue. We should have fairness and respect to the workers whom I represent in Durham.

I demand that we should have the royal commission fully reinstated with all its participants to carry on the work that it was initially legislated to do by the previous government of Ontario so that the people of Ontario can be heard, and not just the board of trade, the chamber of commerce and labour unions. We should allow the opportunity for full public debate and disclosure on this issue. It is a very contentious issue, it is very complex and it's important that everybody get an opportunity to participate in it and to allow for three days of hearings for organizations that are used to making depositions to government. It's important that we speak to the people, that you ask the people what they think. To simply say, "Well, we have a mandate because of our election of six months ago"—when you start rifling through all the dotted i's and crossed t's and commas and parentheses in the legislation and how it actually affects them, it's insane. It isn't just. It isn't democracy. How can you call it just and democratic government when you ram something through in a matter of days or hours or less than several weeks? I just can't understand it.

The labour position on the memorandum of understanding is that we should oppose it for the very reasons I just gave. While we support ordinary audits that ensure the Workers' Compensation Board is accountable for its spending, we should oppose the idea of government-ordered, value-for-money audits. Any review of the Workers' Compensation Board should be done by bipartite review teams who will thus be accountable to the workplace parties, people who are directly involved.

Part V, Offences and Penalties: labour position—we should oppose the new offences provisions. We should say the Workers' Compensation Board already has the tools to deal with fraud and should be focusing on pursuing employers who rip off the system.

As amendments to the Occupational Health and Safety Act, in addition to amending the Workers' Compensation Act, Bill 15 also proposes to amend the Occupational Health and Safety Act. Those amendments deal specifically with the government's move to disband the Workplace Health and Safety Agency. The amendments bar any litigation commenced or to be commenced challenging the government's actions in revoking the workers' health and safety agency appointments and appointing an executive director. The Ontario Federation of Labour and Paul Forder challenged the terminations in court but were unsuccessful. The court in that case based its decision primarily upon a provision in the Occupational Health and Safety Act which allowed the minister to step in and effectively take control of the operations. The courts did not address whether it is appropriate for any government to engage in a course of action and then legitimate the course of action after the fact through legislation.

Labour position is, with the firing of the Workers' Compensation board of directors, we should oppose Bill 15's attempt to retroactively legalize illegal acts. The restitution orders in section 27 adding new section 153 to the act, the amendment which specifically allows the board to pursue an order for restriction for any sum deducted by an employer for an employee's wages for compensation costs and pay the sum outlined in the order to the worker is a welcome addition to the act. This is a helpful provision for workers who have wages deducted, as in the past the board refused to pay these sums back to workers.

Labour position: This is one amendment we can support.

I would also like to point out some highlights that I picked up through the national union CAW's brief that Sister Cathy Walker and Brother Nick De Carlo of the health and safety department will be presenting. Safety is deteriorating; workers are being killed and injured. In the last number of years, workplaces across the province have been speeding up production and scheduling more and more overtime.

Mr Ouelette, I would address that you pay particular attention to this, because if you take a tour through those GM plants in Oshawa and you count heads, people who are wearing tensor bandages on their wrists, forearms and elbows, you'd know they were working in pain; and if you asked any of them, eight out of 10 of those workers would tell you they're working in pain and it's because of the increased productivity levels. General Motors has basically doubled its productivity levels in the Oshawa plants since 1995 and out of that, because of a thing called synchronism, manufacturing and the implementation of all this tooling that I was telling you about and the changeover that the construction gangs put in, the workers also have to work longer hours at a higher rate of production and their bodies cannot lubricate the joints in their musculoskeletal system fast enough to prevent the wear and tear on those bodies.

Now the business community is going to come in here and they're going to demand a limit to entitlement on repetitive strain injuries, because they see through their own internal accident rates, which used to be about one in five, then it was one in four, now it's one in three in the Oshawa car plants—I got that from the health and safety committee member in the car plant, one Brother

Paul Gogan. Please refer to him in the CAW, Local 222 for any specific information coming out of the union.

I also understand that the employer community feels that it's important that we cover the cost of this unfunded liability, but I believe that the unfunded liability is just a financial burden that employers owe to the Workers' Compensation Board to pay those benefits out to workers who've been maimed and injured and worn out in their workplace.

I also would like to bring to your attention the fact that, because proactive joint health and safety committees in the workplaces work, to deny the education and the training for those committees so they can prevent accidents in the workplace, which is a tremendous financial burden to the board—I think you will find that unforeseen chance events have been greatly reduced although the repetitive strain injury is a major issue specifically dealing with the Canadian auto workers; and General Motors, where I'm from, it is a big issue.

I would like to close my comments by thanking you for allowing me the opportunity to come in here and say what needs to be said, although I don't believe it's enough to deal with all the issues. I highlighted some of the issues I feel very strongly about and if there's anybody who has any questions, feel free to ask. Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you. We have about two, two and a half minutes; Ms Martel.

Ms Martel: I'd like to ask you to comment about the firing of the board being an illegal act. You mentioned, and I should just reinforce, that not only did that contravene legislation that was put in place under Bill 165, the bipartite board, but the government has with this legislation not only justified that firing but also said, "You can't take this to court." What do you think about a government that not only operates in contravention of a law that was passed less than about 10 months ago, but also puts into legislation right now the fact that no one can challenge that in court?

Mr Eye: I would like to bring to your attention the teachings of a carpenter of nearly 2000 years ago who preached "Love thy neighbour as thyself," and to turn your back on the worship of Mammon, okay? As far as I can see, loving thy neighbour as thyself by reducing those who are less fortunate than ourselves, who are on subsistence living, who are in bad situations, and putting them into desperate ones, and throwing tens of thousands of workers on to the unemployment rolls and to allow for room for these people to be collecting welfare benefits by reducing the benefit rate 21%, which allows for the growth of people receiving welfare—I believe the teachings of the good Lord, saying, "Love thy neighbour as thyself." I would like to remind all of you that when he went into the temple and he upset the tables of the moneychangers—and the moneychangers of those days are the predecessors of today's modern banking system.

To be a worker who has put his work out on to the free and open market, the labour market, to be exploited by those who profit from the work and the sweat of my brow is a system that has been in place for thousands of years. However, to base a government policy only on the interests of Mammon, the worship of money and those who control it, is anti-Christian and it's anti-democratic, because when you take a look at how many people control the big financial levers in this country, it is a very small minority of people. I would remind those of you in government and in opposition that they carry very little votes even though they may influence the media and the information that is getting out in today's society. They may control the levers, but when the wheels decide to stop turning, they will stop turning.

I think it is reprehensible that a government would even consider saying, "Well, we're going to have to invoke a retroactive law because the action that we did wasn't legal and violated a pre-existing law," and thumb their noses at a system that's been in place for a couple of hundred years. I think it's insane.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Eye. We're out of our time here now but I appreciate your taking the time to come and make presentations before us today.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS, LOCAL 1986

The Chair: Our next group up is the Canadian Auto Workers, Local 1986. Good morning, Mr Rooke. Again, I saw you in the room here, but just in the interests of fairness we're telling all the deputations we have 15 minutes per presentation and it's up to you what amount of that time you wish to take for presentation and how much for question and answer.

Mr Tom Rooke: I'd like to take the opportunity to thank you for the opportunity to be here this morning. I find it very difficult to prepare a brief on two days' notice. I was called Thursday afternoon to be here this morning at 10:30, and it's awful difficult when you're a full-time local union president and 50% of your time is spent on workers' compensation.

Also, I'd just like to bring to the government's attention that I have a WCB hearing at 10 o'clock next Monday morning. Usually we used to get the claim files six weeks in advance so you could prepare a hearing for the injured worker. I received that claim file Friday afternoon. So I'd just like to take the opportunity to thank the government for rushing this through and allowing me not to do my job properly for the injured worker I'll be representing. If there are any hiccups in that file and I have to get any information from doctors, I will not have the opportunity now.

I want to begin our presentation today by demanding the Royal Commission on Workers' Compensation be reactivated and that the Cam Jackson, minister for workers' compensation, report rumoured to be tabled December 20, 1995, be subject to public consultation and debate before it goes to the Legislature.

Bill 15, in our opinion, is the next step of the Harris government's attack on the working people of Ontario. We are demanding the bipartite board of directors be reinstated, as this board gave workers an equal say in how the board was run. In fact, the bipartite board had made some tremendous progress in bringing new claims costs down dramatically, reducing the board's overhead, and returning more disabled and injured workers to the workplace than ever before.

We just have to check last year's annual report to see that the board is not in debt and has never borrowed money. According to last year's report, the WCB has $6 billion in savings. Employers' premiums are decreasing and now below 1989 rates. In 1993 they were $3.34; in 1995 they're $3. The board has paid more to employers in rebates, $359 million, than to injured workers in short-term disability benefits, $337 million. The WCB wrote off $173 million in unpaid debts by employers. In spite of all this, the WCB reported a surplus of $130 million.

We just have to review what's expected in the Jackson report.

A three-day unpaid waiting period: The ludicrousness of this is outstanding. I'm out of a heavy metal stampings plant. We have 500-ton presses. If something in the presses fails, if the clutch goes and a worker's got his hand in there and that press comes down, the hand's gone. And now to expect that individual to wait three days because of malfunctioning equipment is just ludicrous. Workers go to work to earn a living. They don't go to work to be injured, and a lot of times the injuries aren't the worker's fault. It's because the employer hasn't maintained his equipment as he should.

The reduction of benefits by 5% or more: It's tough enough to live on 90% of your net, let alone another reduction. In some cases you get letters from the board stating that it's all right to wait up to 12 weeks for a new claim to be initiated, another point that is just ludicrous.

The reduction of employers' premiums by 5%: They're talking about this unfunded liability, and now they're going to give the employers another 5% back so the debt grows.

A review of lifetime pensions awarded before 1990: As you heard from the brother before you who has a permanent disability, he didn't ask for that injury to happen to him. He's lost a lot of his quality time that he can spend with his children. He can't play catch with them any longer, as you heard him speak. We have injured workers who face that daily and injured workers who also can't do a lot of recreational things they used to do.

There's the reduction of future economic loss awards by up to 40%, and the reduction of entitlement to compensation benefits such as back and repetitive strains, chronic pain and stress.

The government refuses to address the real fraud and abuse in the WCB system and is attempting to create a phoney crisis to make the following: More than 55,000 employers owe the WCB $430 million in outstanding assessments and penalties; an estimated 20,000 employers which legally should be registered with the WCB and contributing to the system continue to go undetected; some 700,000 Ontario workers are denied WCB coverage because their employers have been successful in lobbying governments to exempt them from the system.

With the above points taken into account and the hundreds of millions of dollars being sucked from the system by employers, how can Harris and his government justify their drive to slash benefits and attack disabled workers?

During the period of 1990-94, there were 25% less claims coming into the board, but the denials of initial entitlement were increased by 40%. With the proposed changes such as material change, we can see the denials increase even further. We are concerned with the definition of "material change." As of this point we haven't seen any definition, so are we to take this definition to be wide open to interpretation?

To follow along with this, a worker who fails to inform the board of a material change in connection with his or her entitlement within 10 days is guilty of an offence. A worker who is guilty of an offence under the act could receive a fine of up to $25,000 or a jail sentence of up to six months.

Presently an employer who fails to submit a form 7 in three days is liable for a $250 fine that is rarely enforced by the board, but with the new material change clause, the board is now intimidating injured workers not to file a claim because of this "material change" definition.

With the definition change of injury to disability, and now that you must have your accident witnessed or prove it was a direct result of your work, this is further going to tie up the adjudication process. Our question now is, if I'm on my way back to my workstation and slip on oil on the floor, falling and injuring myself, will this be covered by the board?

WCAT has traditionally been an independent body of the board. Now under the proposed changes they want to bring it back under the umbrella of the board, removing the impartial aspect of the tribunal.

We compare the unfunded liabilities as a cost the employers will have to pay in premiums for current and future injuries, such as we all do with our present home mortgages. Our mortgages are also unfunded liabilities, something that we have to take out now and pay later, so it's similar to the unfunded liabilities now facing the employers of this province.

Bill 15 on the Workplace Health and Safety Agency: Why was the Workplace Health and Safety Agency created? The agency was created to develop and deliver health and safety training programs. The creation of the agency recognized that workers and employees working together as equals is the most effective way for achieving a healthier and safer workplace.

Does cooperation in health and safety work? The agency was governed by an equal number of worker and employer representatives. The spirit of solving health and safety problems jointly resulted in the certification of close to 32,000 members of the joint health and safety committees. According to the latest WCB statistics, this training contributed to a $630-million reduction in accident claims and a 30% reduction in the number of fatalities.

Why was the agency board of directors disbanded? Labour minister Elizabeth Witmer cited two reasons: the agency's $300-million expenditure for certification training and the fact that only half the joint committee members who required certification training were trained. As a result, she revoked the appointment of the board of directors. Thirty thousand committee members have not been certified. The employers' refusal to comply with the certification training was supported by Ms Witmer when she extended the certification training deadline.

Despite Labour minister Elizabeth Witmer's commitment to occupational health and safety, documents from the Ministry of Labour reveal the government plans to make deep cuts to the ministry's operation. A leaked ministry document contains some of the following: cut the Ministry of Labour's total budget by 46.4% over the next two years; reduce inspections of larger companies with joint health and safety committees and certified members and set up preventive inspections of so-called high-risk workplaces with less than 20 employees; reduce the ministry's mediation services with respect to appeals and health and safety committees; introduce user fees to lodge appeals with the office of adjudication.

There are only 215 health and safety inspectors working in the field to protect 4.5 million workers and 300,000 workplaces. Less than 10% of industrial workplaces are inspected by a health and safety inspector. Scientific evidence shows that declines in workplace fatality and injury rates are correlated with the number of inspectors, the frequency of inspections and the frequency of penalties.

Harris's health and safety: no right to know; no right to participate; no right to refuse unsafe work.

Prevention must be at the heart of the Ministry of Labour's occupational health and safety policy. Intervention and enforcement must increase. We must remember that all workers are an accident away from an injury.

We demand that Bill 15 be withdrawn, that funding be maintained for the Workers' Health and Safety Centre, and that the enforcement of health and safety laws be strengthened.

In closing, government and employers have cut back on workplace health and safety. Serious injuries have gone up. If benefits are reduced, employers may pay lower premiums, but taxpayers pay more to cover social assistance and health care costs for injured workers.

We demand that workers' compensation remain employer-funded and be designed to compensate workers for injuries caused by or related to the workplace. We also demand that the Harris government provide the workers of this province with safety and security in the workplace, which is the right of every worker in Ontario.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Rooke. The questioning this round will begin with the government benches.

Mr Jack Carroll (Chatham-Kent): Thank you very much for your presentation. Did I pick you up right in the beginning when you said that as a union local president you spend about half your time on WCB issues?

Mr Rooke: Over half my time.

Mr Carroll: Previous presenters have said that the red-tape burden has a tremendous impact on workers. You've suggested a reappointment of the royal commission. Some 55 employers owe over $430 million; 20,000 employers are not even signed up; 700,000 workers aren't represented; we have an $11.8-billion unfunded liability and the second-highest premiums in the country. And we don't have a crisis?

Mr Rooke: The crisis was developed by the employers. The reason I spend so much time on workers' compensation is because the majority of the employers I deal with don't send in their form 7s. Until the form 7s are sent in, the board can't act. So the injured worker's reports are in, the doctors' reports are in, and then you spend your time chasing around the employers. You call the board and you get hold of the adjudicator and they say, "Well, we're missing the form 7." You call the employer and they say, "Well, we'll get it in right away."

I've started to ask adjudication to fine the employers where I represent the members, and it's, "Well, we'll give them another week." So then you have the injured worker sitting out there for 12 weeks with no money. In some of our larger plants in our collective agreements, we've been able to negotiate clauses where if a WCB claim is held up or in dispute, they receive the equivalent of our weekly indemnity programs. So that allows them to get some money in. They sign a waiver. Then if we're successful, it comes back in.

Most of the time it takes us two years to get to a hearing, and the reason we're there is because of what's put on the forms by the employers and because of the fact that the employers don't fill out their forms.

Mr Carroll: I think the system is busted, and I think we have to fix it. Obviously, based on the things you say, it doesn't work for the workers very well either. So we think it needs to be improved and that's what we're trying to do.

Mr Rooke: I think if you lived up to the present act, the system would work fine for the workers. Under the present act, it seems that you pick and choose.

Mr Duncan: Mr Rooke, on page 6 of your statement you indicated that WCAT has traditionally been an independent body of the board and under the proposed changes they want to bring it under the umbrella of the board. How does that happen? I didn't find that in the act.

Mr Rooke: I got this information from the workers' adviser.

Mr Duncan: I think they're wrong. Bill 15 doesn't deal, to my understanding, with WCAT, except to reaffirm that the chair of WCAT will continue to sit as an ex officio member of the multi-stakeholder model.

Mr Rooke: The information we received was that they were looking at bringing the tribunal back under the umbrella of the board. That would take away their independence. They would then fall under all the policies of the board. That's the information we got from the workers' adviser; it could be wrong.

Mr Duncan: One other supplementary: Has your local or have you individually been asked to make a submission to Mr Jackson?

Mr Rooke: No.

Ms Martel: You were asked earlier, if I might, Mr Rooke, as to what your thoughts were with respect to all of the things that are happening at the board: workers' payments being delayed, a number of employers who, for whatever reason, refuse to register, refuse to send in form

7 etc. You were asked whether or not, if the system isn't broken, we shouldn't fix it. Do you see anything in this legislation, frankly, that deals with the concerns you have as a union rep who spends 50% of your time dealing with WCB cases?

Mr Rooke: Not at all. If anything, I can see increasing my time.

Ms Martel: If it were left to you, then, to take a look at Bill 15 and revise Bill 15 and deal with some of the things you see as a rep are causing a problem to the workers you represent, what would some of those changes be?

Mr Rooke: I think I'd put the royal commission back in and let the stakeholders tell you where the problems are. It's great until you face it. The penalties to the employers have to be increased and enforced. A lot of the problems we have are the fact that the forms aren't sent in; it causes a delay. We get to adjudication and there's pressure put on because of the unfunded liability, because of the threats of cutbacks at the board. So a lot of things are being denied. We're led to believe that they're being told to deny a lot of initial claims just to move it on.

The new system that's come in since October 2 on taking one step of the appeal level out is just going to clog up the system. If you had claims in prior to October 2 that you were waiting for a hearing for, like the one I alluded to before—that claim's been waiting for a hearing for about a year and a half. Now we get a week, but we're getting all kinds of the 9,000 that were backlogged at decision review sent out to us right away and we've got 45 days to go through the file and make a decision whether we go (a) or (b). That's clogging up the system as well.

The Chair: That, I think, runs out our time, Mr Rooke. I appreciate you taking the time to come before us today and I appreciate your answering the questions as well.

ONTARIO AND TORONTO AUTOMOBILE DEALERS ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Ontario Automobile Dealers Association. Good morning, Mr Davis.

Mr Bill Davis: Good morning. I'm Bill Davis and I'm the director of government relations for Ontario and Toronto Automobile Dealers Association. Our association represents some 1,000 new-car franchise dealers located in every major city and town across Ontario. In aggregate, we employ approximately 55,000 people. The average dealership in Ontario employs 55 to 65 individuals, and our members are indicative of the small, entrepreneurial businesses that play a major role in powering the economic engine of this province.

In 1993, under rate group 657, automobile and truck dealers, our members contributed some $16 million to the WCB; and under rate group 630, vehicle service and repairs, our industry, along with other employers of that classification, contributed $48 million to the WCB.

The auto industry retail sales and services contributed in excess of $60 million to the WCB in 1993, and they're the latest figures we have. Our members do indeed have a stake in any reform to the WCB.

The business community was not alone in pointing out the obvious reality that the workers' compensation is a system in crisis, broken both financially and structurally. The unfunded liability, as you know, stands at a staggering $11 billion and continues to grow at $2 million per day. This liability threatens both the competitiveness of the Ontario business and the long-term viability of workers' compensation itself.

The heart of the problem has been government's failure to make the organizational and regulated changes needed to foster accountability and operational efficiency in the workers' compensation system. All political parties in Ontario have recognized the extent and the nature of the problem of the WCB. It was the previous NDP government which asked the PLMAC to undertake WCB reform based on economic viability and the governance structure.

The Liberal Party, both in its election red book and its reviews of the WCB under former Labour critic Steve Mahoney, called for major structural and operational reforms. All parties recognized that the WCB was in crisis financially and structurally.

Our members commend the Minister of Labour and the Harris government for assuming decisive and corrective action as outlined in Bill 15. These reforms will address financial and governance issues and ensure that the WCB conforms to the original concepts as a vision by Sir William Meredith as that of a workplace accident insurance plan.

Our association supports the government's recommendation to replace the bipartite board with a more effective and accountable multistakeholder board of directors.

The bipartite model of labour versus management approach resulted in confrontation and paralysed effective decision-making on crucial administrative policy and financial issues. This form of government simply did not work and was aptly demonstrated at the Workplace Health and Safety Agency.

It's also interesting to note that the NDP government of British Columbia arrived at the same conclusion recently. They found it necessary to remove the WCB bipartite board of governors and replace it with a panel of administrators.

It is our contention that the new multistakeholder board comprised of representations from employers, workers, members from the insurance, medical and rehabilitation communities and others will bring a different and renewed perspective to the WCB. This will result in better and more responsive management and decision-making, as now in the cases of Alberta and Manitoba.

In our submission on Bill 165 to the standing committee on resources development, our association petitioned for fiscal responsibility and accountability at the WCB and the elimination of the unfunded liability by the year 2014.

Our members and the business community at large committed themselves to a funding strategy of increases of 15% and 10% of assessment over a six-year period that would have retired the unfunded liability by the year 2014.

Employers of the province have reduced both the number and total costs of new claims, but assessment rates have spiralled. Since 1984, the cost of new claims has decreased by 19%; overhead charges of the WCB have increased by 19%; cost of old claims, the unfunded liability, has increased by 76%; employer premiums have increased by 170%; and Bill 165's $200 supplement increased the unfunded liability by a further $1.5 billion.

Our association supports the Minister of Labour's initiative to incorporate a financial responsibility framework in the new purpose clause for the WCB. This action, in concert with the new measures requiring the WCB to provide a five-year strategic plan, a statement of priorities and their investment policies to the Minister of Labour and a legislative directive to perform value-for-money audits, will ensure fiscal accountability and sound financial management practices at the WCB.

We endorse the six principles set out in the purpose clause and are pleased to see the inclusion of the two new objectives: to "prevent or reduce the occurrence of injuries and occupational disease at work" and to "promote health and safety in the workplace."

These objectives are encouraging because they clearly indicate that the responsibility for health and safety is being returned to the WCB where our members believe it rightfully belongs.

The amendments announced on November 1, 1995, only carry out the first half of the government's commitment to reform the WCB. Our association looks forward to and will cooperate with the Honourable Cam Jackson's pursuit of economic reforms that will address the issues of benefit levels, entitlement, assessment rates and the unfunded liability.

Our members expect the government to fulfil its commitments to:

Reduce the assessment rates by 5% for schedule 1 employers as soon as possible. This action would remove present inequities in the system, enhance competitiveness and encourage investment.

Introduce a waiting period for benefits. This action will reduce substantially the number of frivolous claims, as the experience in New Brunswick has demonstrated.

Reduce benefit levels to 85% of net average earnings for new and previous claims. This action will address the issue of overcompensation. It will reduce pressure on the WCB and WCAT to give privileged treatment to groups of claimants and claims.

Apply the Friedland formula to all WCB claimants.

Ensure the WCB new claims performance drives the price of the system. Improved new claims performance should result in reduced WCB assessment rates. The WCB and the government must then take action to reduce and control overhead expenditures and the cost of old claims.

Our association strongly disagreed with the provisions of Bill 165 that granted a $200 supplement for life to workers receiving a permanent disability pension and who were in receipt of a section 147(a) supplement. This act increased the unfunded liability by $1.5 billion and was a classic example of the WCB's failure to exercise fiscal accountability.

In our opinion, the supplement should be means-tested, payable to age 65 and applicable only where an earning loss was caused by a work-related disability.

As well, compensation for stress-related claims should be limited to those cases where stress arises as a result of an acute reaction to a traumatic workplace incident.

Finally, the experience rating program, NEER, needs to be supported and developed. This program, in our opinion, is one of the most accurate and effective ways to reward the positive achievements in the health and safety and return-to-work practices while at the same time discouraging negative behaviour and practices.

Bill 15, An Act to amend the Workers' Compensation Act and the Occupational Health and Safety Act, is an essential first step to restoring financial viability of the WCB and making the system serve stakeholders in a more efficient, cost-effective and responsible manner. However, the WCB will continue to be a fiscal risk until decisive action is taken to retire the unfunded liability. We therefore commend the government's initial action but look forward to the economic reforms promised for 1996.

The Chair: Thank you. The questioning will begin with the official opposition.

Mr Pat Hoy (Essex-Kent): Mr Davis, on page 3 you speak about the members and business community at large committing themselves to increases of 15% and 10% over a six-year period to help the unfunded liability by the year—

Mr Davis: To remove it by the year 2014. The first three years was a 15% increase in the assessment rate; the next three years was a 10% increase in the assessment rate. The employer community undertook that obligation—in fact, accomplished that obligation—but the unfunded liability wasn't reduced because of the increases.

Mr Hoy: Then could you help me in how you reconcile, on page 5, to "reduce the assessment rates by 5% for schedule 1 employers as soon as possible"?

Mr Davis: That was a commitment made by the provincial government. It's a commitment we endorse and we're now asking them to enact that. They were unable to do it at this time because of some technical errors in their computation. We believe it can be done and we believe it will not provide any difficulties in still meeting the obligations of the employer and the workers' compensation obligations financially.

Part of that has to do with the fact that they did, about three or four years ago, a reassessment, and attempted to bring all the assessments into line. So, for example, in our industry, the top assessment rate will be about $3.90. Some of our members are already at that, some are under that, and it really goes back to the WCB's inefficiencies in arriving at that. There are rate groups out there right now that are paying more money than they should and there are rate groups that are paying less money than they should. We're asking for that balance, and that 5% will be part of that balance.

Mr Duncan: We were trying to reconcile your first position, that your employers or the people you represent would support or have supported a 15% and then a 10% increase in assessments, and later in your document, you go on to urge the government to fulfil its commitment. You just don't restate it, you urge them to fulfil it.

Mr Davis: No, no, you misunderstand. The 10% and 15% were actions that have already occurred—I believe they occurred in the mid-1980s—taken by the employers' community to reduce the unfunded liability. It wasn't accomplished. It wasn't accomplished because the WCB was inefficient. So now we're telling the government, from the business community's perspective and also from the PLMAC perspective, that there are steps they can take now that will reduce that unfunded liability, and we expect them to take those steps.

Mr Duncan: So your employers actually experienced those increases already?

Mr Davis: We certainly did.

Ms Martel: Let me follow up from that, because if that was during the mid-1980s, we were dealing with a multi-stakeholder board of directors. At the same time that we had that multi-stakeholder board, in a single year, 1984, we saw the biggest single increase in the unfunded liability in the history of the province, from about $2.4 billion up to $5.4 billion in a single year. So, Mr Davis, tell me why I should have any confidence at all that moving back to a multi-stakeholder board of directors is not going to lead us right down the same path that we already were on?

Mr Davis: I can't answer the question in 1984, I'm sorry, because I wasn't around then. But I can tell you that our experience with a bipartite board of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency and the WCB in the present surroundings since 1989—in fact in 1985, 1986, I believe, or 1987, one of those three years—there was no such thing as a bipartite model in the WCB. It just occurred and the governments of those days allowed it to occur without any type of legislation or structure.

But those two agencies and the bipartite boards have shown that they wind up grinding to a halt because they cannot make compromises. They become, I guess, areas in which there are embattlements. We believe that it's better to have multi-stakeholder people on the board. Many of those people have expertise in WCB, and we believe it'll be better.

Ms Martel: Let me just follow up on that. The bipartite board at the WCB, those appointments went into effect in April 1995 and those folks had all of six months to deal with the new system at the board. When you talked about the bipartite form simply not working, you referred to the health and safety agency and you referred to an experience in BC, but the experience that I want to talk about is the six-month experience that the bipartite board at the WCB had.

That experience was (a) the board agreed to a plan to reduce the unfunded liability by the year 2014, which is what the government is trying to bring in with this bill; (b) they had an operating surplus that year for the first time. They also, for the first time in 10 years, had a decline in the unfunded liability. Yes, it was only by $100 million, but it was the first time we had a decline.

This, to me, does not characterize a board that was paralysed or that simply did not work. I wonder if you can give to the committee some very clear and concrete examples of what it was that so paralysed this board.

Mr Davis: Shelley, first of all, there's a rationale for the unfunded liability surplus. It has nothing to do with that board, it has to do with the way some calculations were done.

Second, in the instance of the bipartite board which did operate for six months officially, although it operated unofficially for several years as a bipartite board, they refused to enact a funding strategy developed by the management side—the other side did, by Mr Copeland. They refused to enact that section, which would have gone some way in addressing some of the issues. Those are the realities. The realities were they were stalemated.

Ms Martel: My understanding of the financial improvement package that the staff at the board put together that would have resulted in a $400-million saving was that it was not the worker members of the bipartite board who objected to that, it was the employer members.

Mr Davis: Well, I guess you hear a different story than I do.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Davis. That exhausts our speaking time. I appreciate your coming down.

Mr Duncan: On a point of information, Mr Chair: In a document you submitted to committee members that was based on questions that I had asked last week, there had been in the 1994 fiscal year a $400-million transfer from the WCB accident fund into operations, which would have left a net deficit of some $300 million had it not occurred.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Duncan.

ONTARIO PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYEES UNION

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Ontario Public Service Employees Union, the employee relations committee, Ministry of Labour. Please introduce yourselves for Hansard and the committee.

Mr Robert Rae: Good morning. My name is Robert Rae. I'm chair of the Ministry of Labour employee relations committee, the OPSEU committee. With me today is Wayne Ireson, another member of this committee.

We appreciate the opportunity to present our views on the changes in Bill 15 and the potential impact on the enforcement of health and safety in this province.

We are two of the four elected OPSEU members of the ministry employee relations committee. The committee represents over 1,200 workers in the ministry who belong to the Ontario Public Service Employees Union.

The OPSEU members whom we represent have the primary responsibility for enforcing the Occupational Health and Safety Act. These members include front-line staff such as health and safety inspectors, occupational hygienists, ergonomists and technologists. We also recognize the excellent support provided by the scientists and technologists who work in our laboratories and in the radiation protection service. We also have OPSEU members who work in regulation development and program evaluation.

As front-line deliverers and enforcers of occupational health and safety legislation, we provide the public services that ensure that workplaces are safe and workers are protected. We believe that this service should be cost-effective and efficient. We also believe that these activities should not restrict the economic growth in this province. At the same time the working men and women of Ontario must be protected in the workplace.

For this very reason, our committee has made a submission to the Minister of Labour on Necessary Reforms to Ontario's Health and Safety Enforcement System. We have provided copies for the members of this committee today for your consideration. We sincerely hope our minister will listen to the experience and the suggestions of her front-line workers. We hope the minister will not decimate the enforcement system and the necessary technical and professional support that goes along with that system.

The issues of workers' compensation before this committee are serious issues that must be addressed. The increasing cost of human suffering experienced by the workers in this province concerns us. Both our daily experience in the workplaces of Ontario and general statistical trends show that health and safety conditions in these workplaces are deteriorating.

Between 1991-92 and 1994-95, critical injuries have increased by 80% and occupational diseases and illnesses have increased by 102%. Over roughly the same time, the Ministry of Labour budget allocations for health and safety have decreased by almost 18%, from approximately $51 million to $42 million. These facts and trends we have just noted clearly show us that the costs of workers' compensation will not decrease until the workplaces of this province are safe and healthy.

If one considers that it is primarily through interventions in the workplace that health and safety programs will have an impact, then the ministry must immediately reverse the trend it has established. A larger portion of the available resources should be dedicated to and support front-line enforcement activities.

We firmly believe that strict enforcement of the Occupational Health and Safety Act is essential in achieving safe and healthy workplaces for the workers and the employers of this province.

The bill under consideration by this committee proposes to change the purpose clause to include the prevention of injuries and occupational diseases and the promotion of health and safety as one of the major purposes. We understand that this highlights the importance of accident prevention in the workplace. We cannot disagree with the overall concepts. However, placing the emphasis in this act and within the jurisdiction of the WCB greatly concerns us. We believe that this will serve to dilute and likely signal the demise of the enforcement function of the Ministry of Labour. We are also wary of seeing another bureaucracy set up with overlapping goals and activities. This kind of action does not make sense.

There is, and probably will continue to be, some controversy over the dividing line between the activities that describe prevention and those that describe enforcement. There has been a lot of debate over the method and tools of enforcement. We know some of our own members have differing views on this subject. The great difficulty lies in finding the right balance of tools one can use to bring about compliance. However, the bottom line is that employers must comply with the legislation. The penalties for non-compliance must be a sufficient deterrent to discourage breaking the law.

Broadly speaking, we believe that an effective and efficient health and safety system must include at least the following components: adequate regulations, worker and employer training, and strict enforcement.

The Occupational Health and Safety Act, as well as the Workers' Compensation Act and the associated regulations, must be adequate to protect the health and safety of all workers and to compensate workers when unfortunate injuries occur on the job. These regulations need to be clearly defined, understandable, adaptable to change and, above all, enforceable.

Both the worker and employer communities need to be educated and trained to recognize the hazards associated with their work and the techniques to reduce and eliminate these hazards. Both groups must be able to receive the training in the manner that best promotes learning, retention and acceptance of the course materials. We believe that this education must begin at an early age. We also believe that health and safety training should be a necessary part of the high school curriculum.

We believe that consistent enforcement of the Occupational Health and Safety Act is essential to ensuring a safe workplace. A strong presence or the threat of the presence of an inspector in the workplace must drive enforcement. There needs to be technical and professional support that makes workplace investigations meaningful. An administrative penalty system must be initiated with progressive penalties to deter repeat violations and ensure that the cost of complying is substantially less than violating the law. This will allow some immediate enforcement action to be initiated at the time of the violation.

Where workers, employers and respective bargaining agents work cooperatively to advance health and safety, the parties should carry on with a minimum of interference. There should be some reward for compliance. Conscientious employers should have nothing to fear from enforcement under either the Occupational Health and Safety Act or the WCB act. On the other hand, there should be a significantly heavier penalty for non-compliance. The magnitude of the penalties must make it more economical to comply with health and safety legislation.

Safe and healthy workplaces make good economic sense and are cost-effective.

This bill proposes an explicit requirement for employers who must register with the board to do so within 10 days. We suggest that this cannot be done in isolation from other registration systems. We also hope this will not present an opportunity to develop a completely separate system.

We have heard claims, and again today we've heard them here, that there are as many as 20,000 employers who have not registered with the board and should be registered. We urge consideration and implementation of a one-source company registration with the Ontario government. This should take care of all the legislated requirements for all ministries, agencies, boards and commissions. We shudder at the thought of how many databases there might be within this government today having various bits and pieces of information.

Our own ministry has a merged information system database developed over the last six years at a cost of tens of millions of dollars. There is much information on many workplaces in this system. The WCB has a system as well. We expect that the board has more detail on some aspects of individual companies and more companies registered than our own ministry. We are aware there are databases in other ministries—the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations, Finance, etc.—yet we are not aware of any direct links between these databases within government such that the common data identifying a workplace are shared and not duplicated.

The Ministry of Labour needs to direct its efforts to workplaces that are not safe and not healthy. To be more effective in identifying these workplaces, the ministry must make better use of the information that could be made available to it. Some of this information could come from the board. This will help to manage the relationship between enforcement and targeting of repeat violators.

In conclusion, we'd like to reiterate that all the initiatives in this bill will have little impact unless workplaces in this province are safe and healthy.

The Chair: Thank you. The questioning will begin with the third party.

Ms Martel: If I may go to page 3, Mr Rae, I want to focus a little bit more, please, on your concern that if you change the purpose clause in the WCB act to focus more on health and safety, the net result will be actually to signal the demise of the enforcement agents within your ministry. Can you expand a little bit more on that concern, because I think that's a concern for all of us.

Mr Rae: There was a document that became available generally signalling a decline of roughly 46% in the Ministry of Labour. Now we recognize that the minister, in the House, has said that health and safety inspectors will not be decreased. However, the minister hasn't said anything more about the support to the health and safety inspectors, or the rest of the ministry in fact. But as we said in the brief, there's a fine dividing line between enforcement, which people sometimes refer to as reactive work, and proactive prevention. There have been controversies in the past about who's going to do what and I don't think that this province at this time can sustain two bureaucracies fighting over what they should do.

Mr Carroll: Good presentation. I compliment you on the idea of the need for training in schools in health and safety. I think it's right on, and also the idea of ministries sharing databases. On page 3 you talked about that by dismantling the occupational health and safety agency and placing it under the WCB, you fear another bureaucracy being set up. Could you explain exactly what that fear is and how you see another bureaucracy being set up?

Mr Rae: What we fear is that people in some ways—routine inspections of workplaces, depending on whom you're talking to within our ministry or outside the ministry—consider those as preventive activities, whereas we, as front-line enforcers, feel that routine inspections of workplaces are enforcement activities and we're very concerned that the routine inspections or auditing of workplaces, which we see as a necessary function of enforcement, will be taken away from the ministry. I guess this goes back to the discussion about accreditation under the agency before the actions of June.

Mr Carroll: As I see things now, we have two bureaucracies: We have the occupational health and safety agency and we have the Workers' Compensation Board bureaucracy. I would have assumed that we were going to eliminate one and just have one left, and yet you fear the establishment of another one. I'm really having trouble understanding that.

Mr Rae: Right now we inspect workplaces. We're also aware the board also has people who go out to workplaces under the Workwell program, and I'm not totally conversant in it. I'm sorry, I have to apologize, but in terms of that program they go out and they evaluate the paperwork that people have in place: the policies, procedures. Well, to us, it seems like a duplication of effort, and that's the fear, that something along those lines will be developed where we will have two different parties all going to the same workplace asking very similar questions.

Perhaps, if we could, Wayne would like to answer.

Mr Wayne Ireson: Keep in mind, when the workplace health and safety agency was established, it was to take on a definite role of being the proactive body to look after the delivery of the training, to look after providing information to the employers and to the workers in the province. And it looked like, to those of us who were in the profession, that finally we were going to have definitive roles: a definitive role for the Workers' Compensation Board to look after compensation for the worker and to have the agency look after that information source to the workplace parties. And by folding it back into the WCB, we go back to what we were before, which is one agency trying to be all things to all people in the workplaces, and it hasn't worked. In the years that I've been in this profession, it's just not working. That's why the accident rates are so high.

Mr Carroll: So your comment is not that we create another bureaucracy, but that the bureaucracy that would be there wouldn't work as effectively. Is that basically what you're saying?

Mr Ireson: Hasn't in the past, as effectively as it could or should.

Mr Duncan: Mr Rae, if I could, I'd like to pursue it. I spoke in the Legislature about my concerns around the purpose clause and the two additional sections, and you've put forward one of two possible cases. One is that they eliminate or reduce the function of the occupational health and safety division of your ministry and its enforcement provisions, but the more interesting one that I'd like to pursue with you, and I think the government's been very clear on other issues about its desire to cut red tape for business: Are you suggesting that inserting these two purpose clauses, in addition to the purpose clause, could create a parallel or second bureaucracy dealing with health and safety enforcement at the Workers' Compensation Board, say, similar to what local utility authorities do at the same time local building departments do. Is that a concern to you?

Mr Rae: Yes. The short answer is yes.

Mr Duncan: So you think this could lead to a lot of bureaucracy and red tape both for workers and employers?

Mr Rae: We think it could lead to more than one person from the government, in the broad sense, going into a workplace asking very similar questions.

Mr Duncan: So duplication and unnecessary expenditures of funds.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Rae and Mr Ireson. We appreciate your taking the time, and what with midnight sittings, the members of this committee that have House duty tomorrow will have lots of time to digest your other submission here. Thank you.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS, LOCAL 524

The Chair: Our next group up: the Canadian Auto Workers, Local 524. Good morning.

Mr Rick Whatley: Good morning. My name's Rick Whatley. I'm the benefits rep for Local 524 CAW in Peterborough, representing 1,000 workers at the General Electric plant there.

Due to short notice, my summation is short, and I've kept it basically to some of the problems that we have on the shop floor in Peterborough in a heavy industry. There is one typo in the summation I gave you. On page 2, second last paragraph, should be "specialty paints," not "especially paints." I'm not a great typist.

Again, as the earlier CAW rep said, I spend more than 50% of my time coordinating the WCB on the shop floor. I also look after the sickness and accident and the UIC on the shop floor. I'm full-time, and I'm paid by the corporation.

I would like to open my presentation with a strong protest against the short notice given for these hearings. I received my notice on Friday, December 1. This kind of short notice makes it difficult to be prepared, especially on such vital concerns as we are dealing with here today. Another inconvenience is that all the hearings are in Toronto, and this will stop a lot of good people from putting forth their views. It's clear to myself and others that this government is not interested in the democratic process or other people's points of view.

The amendments to Bill 15 are in direct conflict with the laws of Ontario and the rights of the citizens of this province. The Workplace Health and Safety Agency and the Workers' Compensation Board's structure and makeup were defined by law but this government disregarded the law and fired both boards.

Now, after the fact, Bill 15 proposes to outlaw lawsuits or civil proceedings against the government for these violations of the law. The people of Ontario did not vote for a benevolent dictatorship but for a democratic government with open debate. In fact, one of their platforms in the campaign was more law and order. To paraphrase Winston Churchill: some law, some order.

Safety in the workplace: With the new direction of corporations the last few years of lean production, line speedup and scheduling of excessive overtime has become the norm, health and safety enforcement has declined and the health and safety of workers has been jeopardized. Where we are today is already unacceptable, but by limiting the inspection even more, by reducing the right to refuse unsafe work and limiting safety training, you will be placing a large segment of workers at risk on their jobs.

The corporations rate worker health and safety away down on their list of concerns. The only way that we're going to have adherence to the rules is with strong and viable workers' input to the process, along with government inspections.

Workers' compensation: I think many of the presentations being made to you today will lay out to you the economics surrounding workers' compensation and will help to diffuse the big lie about workers' compensation being broke. I would like to address a problem I see in my own workplace arising out of the proposed changes.

I represent workers at GE Peterborough, a plant that is over 100 years old; a workplace that uses and has used over the years many dangerous chemicals and substances to produce large and small motors plus nuclear fuel. Some of the chemicals used were PCBs; epoxy resin, which is still used today; beryllium, which is still used today and one of the most deadly poisons that can be used in the workplace; varnishes; thinners; specialty paints; and asbestos. Asbestos is not used now.

A little sidelight to the asbestos: I started in the plant 33 years ago. I worked in the area where asbestos was used; I didn't work specifically with the asbestos. There is not one of those workers today who is alive who worked on the asbestos, and they were basically my age or younger. They are all deceased, all with lung problems. We were never able to establish a WCB claim until the last one, a gentleman by the name of Wendell Woodcocks. He passed away and through an autopsy we were able to establish asbestosis, and his widow and family are now receiving benefits.

I have the painful task of dealing at this time with five young widows and their families who lost their life partners to cancer. All five of these workers can be tied to the vapours coming from the VPI tanks curing the armatures for large motors. The youngest of these workers was 38; the oldest was 52. It is not a pretty picture to watch your fellow workers cut down in the prime of their life because they were doing their jobs.

A sidelight to this one: In last December's round of negotiations we managed to negotiate a cancer study for the plant in Peterborough. We're a year into it. We've had some people from WCB involved; we've had people from occupational health and safety involved. Five deaths doesn't sound like much. Those five deaths are five out of one small area, young people, basically the same type of cancer, all contacted the same type of vapours, worked with the same type of chemicals. We have 134 so far that we've tracked and we think that we will probably hit about 40% of our workforce either has or is dying of cancer or has died of cancer.

Repetitive motion strain is a byproduct of certain jobs in our workplace. We are a senior workforce with an average age of 47 years, with an average seniority greater than 25 years. Years of winding electric motors day after day takes its toll on wrists, elbows and shoulders. We have a high number of female members with carpal tunnel syndrome, tennis elbows and frozen shoulders. To say that RMS injuries shouldn't be compensable is criminal. Most of these workers will be in constant pain for the rest of their lives. Activities that they would normally do away from work are greatly curtailed. The pressures of speedup and more overtime have compounded these problems.

We are an industry that at this time of year, I am lucky that I am here. If I wasn't paid full-time—no worker off the shop floor is allowed off the shop floor. At this time they have been working now 19 straight weeks without a day off to get the year-end profit out of that company.

To reduce payments to injured workers, to put in a three-day waiting period for benefits lends credence to the lie that workers are at fault, not the corporations that are making increased profits on the backs of the workers.

With large pools of unemployed workers in Ontario, it is much easier to throw injured workers on to the scrap pile and replace them. The worker who lost most of one hand in a machine that the company said would never double trip—surprise; it did and took off most of his hand—will never again have the same quality of life. Neither will the worker who fell 15 feet from a scaffold and crushed two vertebrae in his back, or the 53-year-old female worker who had both arms operated on for tennis elbow and must wear supports every day.

I would urge you out of common decency and common sense not to weaken workplace health and safety but to strengthen the legislation to protect the workers of Ontario and their families, and at the same time I would beseech you not to take away the financial protection provided workers by workers' compensation. I thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Whatley. The questioning will begin with the government members. Mr Carroll.

Mr Carroll: Thank you very much, Mr Whatley. We members of the government agree with you totally about safety in the workplace. We have no intentions of making the workplace a less safe place. Our objectives are to make it safer. Our approach maybe is a little bit different than yours, but that certainly is our objective.

But you're the second person now, and maybe the third even, who has made reference to the impact of overtime on this whole issue. Are you and your union and your members in favour of eliminating that overtime component to make the workplace safer?

Mr Whatley: You ask me a loaded question. Am I in favour of doing away with workplace overtime? Not all overtime. I believe businesses do have sometimes an emergency where overtime may crop up.

Am I against the type of overtime that they're doing now because they've laid off so many of the workers? I had 3,500 members in my bargaining unit; I now have 1,000. We're putting out, moneywise, more than we put out when we had 3,500 people. The way they're doing it is working the people every weekend. My collective agreement does not say "voluntary overtime," so they can use what's known in the Employment Standards Act as the 48-hour week, six eight-hour days. They come to the people on the shop floor and say, "Jeez, if you don't work Sunday, we're going to lose the business; you're not going to have a job." So that's pressure. The law is not on their side to do it, but it's pressure.

Are my workers in favour? I've got some workers who'd move their bed in there and work 24 hours a day, seven days a week; I'm not going to kid you on that. But I also have other people who are very upset that they're forced to work every Saturday of every weekend, and then the company wants them to work every Sunday to go along with it, and then it wants them to work two or three hours after every shift during the week.

Mr Carroll: Obviously overtime is a component of workplace safety. Would you suppose that in a new round of negotiations unions like yours and other unions would in fact negotiate that overtime be eliminated?

Mr Whatley: I have tried in the past three rounds of negotiations to make overtime voluntary in the collective agreement. The company has told us it will never, ever give up the right to mandatory overtime. So it's a sawoff.

Mr Duncan: I'm curious about your views on health and safety, particularly the occupational disease area. You're experiencing a very tragic circumstance obviously in one, I guess, small part of the group that you represent. To come back to the purpose clause that's in this bill that adds purpose sections to the Workers' Compensation Act that would see the board being involved in the administration of health and safety, do you feel that is necessary? The CAW historically has often expressed concern about the Ministry of Labour health and safety division. Would you prefer to see the health and safety enforcement function under the board or remain with the Ministry of Labour?

Mr Whatley: You're asking me a personal question. I may violate my rules with the CAW. I think it should be separate. It should be under the Ministry of Labour.

Mr Duncan: So you feel it should stay with the Ministry of Labour?

Mr Whatley: Excuse me?

Mr Duncan: So then you feel that the inspectorate and the enforcement of the Health and Safety Act should remain with the Ministry of Labour.

Mr Whatley: No, that's not what I said.

Mr Duncan: Oh, I'm sorry; I misunderstood. So you're saying we should move it over to the Workers' Compensation Board?

Mr Whatley: I guess you got me. I guess it should stay with the Ministry of Labour. That's not my expertise; my expertise is looking after my own local client. I talk to our national people, and our national people, I know, are making a presentation. I don't know whether they've already made it or are making it. I know Cathy Walker is making one. That's why I didn't want to go into a whole lot of details. I could fish the numbers out about the board and that, but I didn't want to get into that.

Mr Duncan: In terms of the study you're doing on the cancer deaths and the incidence of cancer, have you had a lot of support from the Ministry of Labour on this?

Mr Whatley: Yes, we have.

Mr Duncan: Okay. Thank you.

Ms Martel: Mr Whatley, you'll know I don't mean this to you when I say that your workplace sounds like a horror show. The number of deaths alone is just unbelievable. What do you think, then, of one of the presentations we heard earlier from the business side which urged the government—and this is the government's own recommendation, so maybe you should tell me what you think about a government that's quite prepared to reduce benefit levels to 85% of net and quite prepared, and I assume this is coming in the spring, to disallow repetitive strain injuries. You've got a workplace where you've got not only people dead from all of the toxins and chemicals and everything else that's been used but a whole bunch of people who are seriously injured because of the repetitive work they do.

Mr Whatley: I think it's absolutely criminal that you would take something like repetitive motion strain out of the act. The people in there were healthy when they came in at 18, 19, 20 years of age. We don't have an early retirement plan. People have to stay there until they're 60 years of age or they don't get a pension. The 53-year-old that I mentioned is on modified work. The company may or may not keep her on modified work till 60 years of age. They are running out of places to put people with repetitive motion strain on modified work. These are legitimate people who have had the carpal tunnel injuries operated on, both wrists in most cases, and both elbows for the bilateral injuries that they get.

In our industry, in a heavy industry where you wind motors and you wind them by hand and you're working in tight spots—they used to put the females on it back in the days when we could have female jobs and male jobs. Before 1971 that was a female job because they had small hands and because they could work on it, but now everybody's on it. We have a lot of senior females, over the age of 50, who have had one, two, maybe three operations over this, and to say it's not work-related—and now they want them to work 56, 60 hours a week doing that type of work, which speeds up the process of them getting there. I have a big concern, because where are those people going to go?

Are we going to send 53-year-olds who have worked 30 years of their lives to the social services? Is that where we're sending them? Or do we pay them and give them an economic loss? Because they'll probably never be able to wind another motor again once they start this, and winding motors is a reasonable rate of pay. You only have so many cleaning jobs within a plant, so where are you going to put people? I think it's criminal to take that type of thing out, just the same as it would be criminal if the person who gets cancer from something in his workplace is not going to get compensated for that. If you're going to go back to just a straight injury, and I can see a broken bone, where are we going to be?

The workers are in jeopardy here and the workers are the ones we should be protecting, not the corporations. The corporations want to make it better? We went after them for years that they could do things to get rid of some of the ergonomic problems that are in that plant, and they wouldn't spend $10 to save themselves $50 down the road. So yes, I have a real problem with where this is going.

The Chair: That's the end of our time, I'm afraid, Mr Whatley, but thank you very much for taking the time to come from Peterborough to speak to us today.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS, LOCAL 707

The Chair: Our next group up is the Canadian Auto Workers, Local 707. Good morning.

Mr Bruce Gay: I apologize for not having a written submission. My notification came in kind of late too, and because of some appointments I had at the board in Hamilton on Friday and some commitments on Saturday and Sunday, I wasn't able to put a presentation together.

Much of what you're going to hear from me has already been said. I'm concerned about the 55,000 employers that owe the WCB $430 million. What's going to be done about that? NEER and CAD claim management schemes drain the WCB of more than $200 million annually. Cash flows from the WCB back to employers because of loopholes in these programs which purport to encourage safer workplaces. Some employers are refunded up to 80% of their WCB premiums. If they manipulate these programs successfully, this is real cash, not just an addition to the unfunded liability's paper debt.

I understand that new claims costs have decreased over 8% in the last four years, from an average of $2 to $1.68 per $100 of payroll. The WCB's overhead has decreased 8% in the past four years, from an average of 49 cents to 44 cents per $100 of payroll.

According to its 1993 annual report, the WCB devoted 17% of its total expenses to pay for overhead; Sun Life of Canada 30%, and the Minnesota privatized workers' compensation system, 29%. I also understand that the board will enjoy this year a cash flow surplus. If indeed this government is thinking of privatization, I would have to ask the question, what justification?

I'm very concerned about the changing of the definition of "accident," which will make it much more difficult for legitimate WCB claimants to access benefits. Once UI benefits or sickness and accident benefits are exhausted, where will these disabled people turn? Employers will offload the responsibilities to Ontario's social assistance programs; property taxes will rise.

A three-day waiting period—there is no justification for that—will not have any impact on reducing the unfunded liability because short-term claims have absolutely no impact on the unfunded liability. It is very seldom when a person is off work for three or four days, a week, 10 days, that they develop a permanent disability which would impact on the unfunded liability.

I'm going to finish by telling you something that happened on Friday. As I said, I was at the regional office in Hamilton. I had a meeting in the morning in the main office and a hearing in the afternoon. When I went to the counter in the Hamilton office, I was asked by the girls on the counter what I was doing in Hamilton. I said I had a meeting and then a hearing. They said, "You don't have a hearing here; we don't have hearings at the Hamilton office on Thursdays and Fridays."

My hearing was indeed over at Commerce Place, across the street and down on the corner of King Street in Hamilton. Meanwhile, two meeting rooms sit vacant and empty in the Hamilton office Thursdays and Fridays, while they're renting space at Commerce Place. I don't know where they rent it in London, I don't know where they rent it in Toronto, I don't know where they rent it in Thunder Bay, but that's some waste that, if you're looking at reducing costs, certainly could and should be looked at.

I thank you for the opportunity to speak.

The Chair: Thank you. The questioning will begin with the official opposition.

Mr Duncan: Mr Gay, could you share with me some of your experiences with the board in terms of wasteful situations that you think could be corrected without penalizing injured workers? You just cited one example. I know you've got considerable experience. I'd be curious to hear some other thoughts in that area.

Mr Gay: I think part of the waste that is created at the board usually ends up at the hearing level. I think if there were sufficient adjudicators to properly adjudicate claims you could cut down on a lot of the subsequent appeals down the road. You could cut down on the backlog, which used to be at decision review and is at the appeals section now, because the right decisions would be made at the time the claims were being adjudicated. I tell you, at least 90% of the claims that I take to hearings we have a favourable response to. The claims are allowed at the hearings level, and if they're not allowed at the hearings level, then chances are you've probably got a pretty good shot at WCAT. This is waste. You do not have enough people at the regional offices to properly adjudicate the claims.

If you choose to talk to some of the adjudicators and some of the people in the regional offices who have just thrown their hands up, they are so overworked, they have so high a caseload volume that they just cannot function properly. I know in the Hamilton office, and it's a standing joke, if the young ladies in the Hamilton office need some time off work, they get pregnant and they take their time off work.

Mr Duncan: Have you been invited to make a presentation to Mr Jackson on his reforms?

Mr Gay: No, sir. I was in Mr Jackson's office a couple of weeks ago and we weren't even invited to come back and see him. The receptionist in his office would not make an appointment for us; we were a labour group.

Mr Duncan: So there's been no opportunity for your local to comment or have input into the reforms that Mr Jackson is contemplating?

Mr Gay: Absolutely none whatsoever.

Ms Martel: Mr Gay, you have some sense, because it's been widely publicized, of the mandate that Mr Jackson is involved with in terms of some of the changes he would like to make. I wonder, since you haven't been invited to talk to him about this or make a presentation, if you can give us some sense today as to whether or not the government's direction, which we expect will be given to us in the spring, is going to do anything to help the workers you're trying to represent or anything to fix the system that the government alleged is so broken.

Mr Gay: No, I can't see anything in the direction the government is going that really is going to enhance the position of injured workers. In fact, I can see by the information that I have that your new compensation bill, Bill 15, will be a detriment to the workers. It really does seem that much consideration is given to the employers and very little consideration is given to the injured workers, and I think that's a shame. I guess the cartoon in the Toronto Star—was it yesterday or Saturday?—where the gravestone, the grave marker, says, "Fairness, Victim of Common Sense," says a lot.

Common sense is fairness. We do have to look after injured workers, as we do have to look after the ill, the poor and all other peoples who cannot look after themselves, and if you want to fix the compensation act, there are a lot of good things contained in Bill 165 that should be held on to.

I said earlier how much the NEER and CAD-7 claims management schemes drain the compensation board of. Once you have that money, why do you give it back? There is another way to do it. If indeed a manufacturer, a business, reduces its claim costs, then in future drop its premiums to reflect that. But to drain $200 million out of the compensation, to me that doesn't make sense. It is a scheme that is manipulated by employers. I know at the Ford Motor Co I saw a memo. The memo stated that this person, this person, this person should be brought back before a certain time or it would be adversely reflected on their NEER. I mean, this is total manipulation, and it should be corrected.

Mr Baird: I didn't get which community you're from.

Mr Gay: I represent 4,500 people at the Ford Motor Co in Oakville.

Mr Baird: Okay, great. You're outside of Toronto. I just wondered.

Mr Gay: I'm sorry?

Mr Baird: I wanted to confirm just where you were from. Being from Ottawa, I always like to see a representative sample from the province, so it's great.

I wanted to just touch on the issue of fraud. You mentioned the 55,000 employers—your figure—that, in your words, are owing hundreds of millions of dollars, and I can certainly share the government's concern with that. Obviously, that's built up over time, and I don't know why the board hasn't taken more successful action in getting that. That'll be something very much that we've heard from a number of witnesses, and we'll certainly relay that concern on, because it's an extremely valid one.

With the issue with respect to the measures contained in Bill 15 dealing with getting tougher with employer fraud, there have been a number of figures used by witnesses: 20,000 employers who have not registered with the WCB. One of the amendments contained in Bill 15 would require employers to register within 10 business days in order to ensure that they're paying their WCB assessment rates. Would you support that measure, and increasing fines to $100,000 for employers who fail to register? That's similar to what they do for the health payroll tax and with the retail sales tax. Would your union support that measure of increasing fines to $100,000 for employer fraud?

Mr Gay: It's an interesting concept. I think my union would be in favour of increasing fines, because I think every worker should be covered by workers' compensation.

Mr Baird: Oh, they're covered. That's the problem. If an employer fails to register, the worker's covered still, so all the other employers are paying for their workers. So the worker's covered already. It's the employer that's getting away with not having to pay, which is the problem.

Mr Gay: Let's make it $200,000 then.

Mr Baird: So you would support those measures then?

Mr Gay: I would support them, sure.

Mr Duncan: In your experience, again, with the Workers' Compensation Board and its treatment of workers versus employers, the bill also contemplates a lot more I think onerous requirements on business as well as employees. Are you nervous that the provisions in the bill around fraud will be directed mostly at workers and not at employers? Is that the position your union is taking?

Mr Gay: I think that historically anything which has been contained within amendments to the Workers' Compensation Act, with the exception of maybe Bill 165, has been directed at the people who stand to lose the most, and I'm talking about injured workers.

Mr Duncan: Has it been your experience that the board has been particularly effective at enforcing its current fines to employers who've—

Mr Gay: Absolutely not. A gentleman just prior to me, perhaps two before me, mentioned the fact that the bureaucracy at the board—I think anyone who has ever dealt with the Workers' Compensation Board, and certainly your assistants in your ridings would be able to tell you this after they've been dealing there for a while, the greatest bureaucracy in the world happens to be at the Workers' Compensation Board, because each department there seems to be an entity unto itself. What I find is there's very little information, very little input from here to here. It's a little empire, and there's very little talkback between the departments down there. I don't know what people are afraid of, losing their dynasty or their empire, whatever it is, but you cannot effectively administer the Workers' Compensation Act unless you can effectively administer your own house.

The Chair: We have time for one more quick question from the third party.

Ms Martel: Mr Gay, let me ask you a little bit about your sense or your feeling about workers' or their representatives' participation at the Workers' Compensation Board. You will know that under Bill 165 one of the major changes we implemented was to have a bipartite structure because we certainly felt that the representation that could be brought by workers, injured workers and their representatives was as important as the other workplace party, that being the employers. What do you think about the government's unilateral move, which this bill is now justifying, to actually take out that bipartite structure and move back to a multi-stakeholder form?

Mr Gay: When the bipartite system was brought in, I had a great deal of faith that if given a half a chance, it very well could have succeeded. I believe at the July 1995 board of directors meeting, the worker members of the WCB supported a proposal called the financial improvement package, or FIP. The FIP would have generated enough annual savings to eliminate the unfunded liability by 2014, and this was blocked by the employer members because it reduced their ability to manipulate, as I said before, NEER, CAD-7 and second injury and enhancement claims.

It's more political ideology than common sense. I think you have a chance. You have a chance to do something if you feel that the Workers' Compensation Act needs to be fixed, needs to be improved. I mean, don't tear the place down. Don't throw the baby out with the bathwater. Improve it. But think of the people on whose back you're going to improve the Workers' Compensation Board.

The employers already have enough loopholes in the Workers' Compensation Act. I could tell you stories. I'm one person against—many of you may know Les Liversidge. Mr Liversidge has eight full-time people working out of the Ford Motor Co in Oakville—eight full-time people. These guys that spend 50% of their time on compensation problems: God, I wish that was the case in my case, because I've got one person working out of Local 707 on workers' compensation claims and that's me. I spend 100% of my day working on compensation claims. At any given time, I've got 200, 250 up to 300 claims at some stage of either inquiry or appeal. I cannot get sufficient hearing dates to get these people justice. It just doesn't work that way.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Gay. We appreciate you coming in to see us this morning to make your presentation.

Ms Martel: Mr Chair, before we go on to the next presentation, I wonder if I could raise a point of order. It's with respect to some comments the parliamentary assistant made that in fact an injured worker, even if the employer doesn't register, would be covered under WCB. I think there's a clarification that is required, and it would be this.

I won't name the employer, but there was a large, celebrated case that was raised in this House by my colleague from Lake Nipigon. It was not recent, I will give you that, but the case was that the employer of the particular 150 employees did not register himself as their employer; he registered each of them as an independent operator.

When one of them did get hurt, it was found that premiums had not been paid, of course, because the worker didn't know anything about being registered as an independent operator, and did not get compensation, and it was only because this case was raised in the Legislature that in fact there were some moves to get the employer to pay and get the people covered.

I just wanted to clarify that a worker is not automatically covered. If the employer doesn't register, there are some ways and means that they can still manipulate that system.

Mr Baird: I'd like to respond on the record. You let her go on—

The Chair: Well, I don't. It wasn't a point of order, but it's in the record now, so that's fine.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES
LOCAL 1996, TORONTO PUBLIC LIBRARY WORKERS

The Chair: I'd like to move on to the next group, if we can, the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 1996, Toronto Public Library Workers. Good afternoon.

Ms Janet Walker: Good afternoon. I'd like to thank the Chair and the members of the committee for the opportunity to appear before you today. I didn't have the privilege of hearing a great deal of the preceding comments. I'm going to try and tailor my remarks a bit.

My name is Janet Walker. I'm president, as you know, of the Toronto Public Library Workers, and I think we could be recipient of the dubious distinction award, because virtually every branch has 50%, or higher, injury rate from repetitive strain injuries. So we have a great deal of concern over the changes that are being proposed not just to the board but to the act. These are real injuries. These are injuries to people and to their lives.

What I want to focus on is the bipartite relationship that we've had for the last four years with the board. It's been the experience of our local that consultation between stakeholders leads to cooperative efforts, which yield a better result than what can be achieved with parties working in isolation. This isolation leads to marginalization, pits the stakeholders against each other and generally causes us to dissipate our energies, and these are energies that I think are better spent in reaching understanding and a resolve of shared concerns.

It's no secret that the current government is pursuing a mandate of cost-cutting and in that course is seeking any number of efficiencies. I certainly respect the current government's mandate to put its own imprimatur and change what it feels should be changed, but I question, as did the previous speaker, throwing out the baby with the bathwater. The concerns that I want to present to you are around the actual savings that will be achieved by returning the board back to a model that we view as adversarial in nature.

As equal partners, labour and management have been working towards their mutually shared goal of reducing injuries as well as costs. I can certainly appreciate that the bipartite approach involved is, if you'll excuse the pun, using a new set of muscles for both parties. But within four years of the board's most recent incarnation, the new claims costs have decreased over 8%, as the previous speaker has said, and the overhead has decreased 8% as well. So there's been a net decrease in costs, even though labour and management still approach their common cause from different viewpoints.

Another example that I want to bring to your attention is that of the corporation of the city of Sault Ste Marie, which in 1991 was hit with a very large pension billing in its WCB costs. A joint committee was formed of representatives of all the unions of the city and management representatives to come up with a solution to lower the costs of workers' compensation. After one year of implementation, the bipartite policy, devised in cooperation, yielded a reduction in cost to the city of $600,000. The city has been able to maintain its WCB costs at approximately $900,000 a year, including the increasing costs of the benefits, so that's a very hefty savings.

I guess the main point I'm trying to make is that of the government leading by example. I think that stakeholders in both the public and private sector benefited from the cooperative model structured by the government of the day. In its press release, the Ministry of Labour stated that "Ontario's experience with bipartism has proven that it is not conducive to effective and responsible decision-making," but I would respectfully suggest that there is a lot of evidence that would indicate otherwise. I think it's clear that costs decrease and accountability increases when labour and management come to the table as equals.

So we're very concerned about the move to a multi-stakeholder board. There appears to be a clear conflict of interest for doctors and insurance specialists to participate in decisions that they could direct to their own benefit.

The restructuring will only serve to pave the way for the privatization of the board. I find it very curious that a government seeking increased accountability would endorse measures that would indeed divest itself of control over the public purse. The same holds true of the measures proposed for the Workplace Health and Safety Agency. We believe it would be disastrous to abolish this agency and move backwards to a time when service delivery organizations such as the Industrial Accident Prevention Association, the IAPA, were given millions of dollars to spend. What savings can be had without direct government control and accountability? I know that the Common Sense Revolution has in its mandate less government, but I never heard the mandate of less responsible government.

We would therefore ask that the standing committee revisit those actions which would lead the Harris government to surrender accountability and responsibility for what may appear to be short-term savings and to give reconsideration to working within the existing bipartite board structure. Labour helped to build our province; surely it deserves equal responsibility for the safety of the workers. As my colleague said to me before I came up, "Make sure you tell them it's the Workers' Compensation Board and Workers' Compensation Act." We have to be players.

The Chair: The questioning this round will begin with Ms Martel.

Ms Martel: I was struck at the beginning of your comments by the number of people within the branches of the library who have repetitive strain injuries. Just given that information—50% I think is what you said—what do you think then of the move that will probably come in Mr Jackson's set of reforms—I use the term loosely—in the spring?

Ms Walker: We're terrified. These are real injuries. These are injuries that are increasing in spite of cooperation between the parties to improve workplace health and safety. Because of the downsizing, the city has been neutron-bombed through restructuring. The work hasn't gone away; it's increasing daily. Our use increase is 500% to 1000% in some locations. No matter how safely you work, if you don't have the staff you're going to continue to be injured. The injuries aren't going to go away. I don't know what will happen to these people. Will they go on welfare? I don't know. I wish I could bring all of them to tell their story to Mr Jackson. I wish he could hear what it's like not to be able to brush your child's hair.

Ms Martel: Let me ask one further question. This is with respect to the bipartite model. The minister was certainly very clear in her remarks that, "The bipartite, labour-versus-management approach has paralysed constructive decision-making on very crucial administrative, policy and financial issues facing the board...." Given that the bipartite board of directors was only in place for six months and given some of the comments that you've already raised with respect to the situation in Sault Ste Marie, do you really think that's a fair characterization of the work that group was trying to do when they'd only been in place six months?

Ms Walker: No, I don't think so. I think you have to run before you can fly. The board was just starting with a new process and I don't think it was given a fair chance. I think that both parties have to adjust to a change in your role. If it's been adversarial for a long time, going into a cooperative structure involves changes on both parts. But all the examples that I've been shown indicate that it was starting to work and I think it could continue to work with modification.

The Chair: I understand that another representative from CUPE would like some portion of your allotted time. We're certainly amenable to that if you see fit. I wonder if you could introduce yourself, sir.

Mr Steve Burdick: I want to thank the previous speaker for sharing her time with me and I want to thank the committee for letting me come on. I'll be quite brief. My name is Steve Burdick. I'm the chair of the library workers' committee in CUPE in this province. We represent therefore, through our committee, about 52 public libraries and about three university and college libraries. We figure that the people we represent directly are about 4,500.

We meet regularly with our committee and with representatives of these various libraries, and one thing that's become very clear to us over the last couple of years is that there is a need in fact to strengthen the workers' protections in the Workers' Compensation Act and not to undercut them. The reason I say that is because we hear throughout the province stories similar to those that Ms Walker laid out before you. The public library system in Ontario is undergoing massive technological change, very significant organizational change and, as I'm sure you're aware, even before Mr Eves's announcements of this past week, budgetary restrictions.

The net result of all that has been an increasing workload placed upon the institutions to provide services and, of course, on the front-line workers to make sure those services happen. Furthermore, with technological change, many of the service adaptations are handled through use of automated techniques. In consequence, the rise of repetitive strain injuries and soft muscle injury claims and problems among our workers has increased, I would be inclined to say, geometrically.

This is not in anybody's interest. Obviously it hurts the individual workers; it hurts the institutions because they have difficulty providing service when workers have to call in sick or go on sick leave or be away for extended periods of time, particularly when these institutions are not in the position to replace these workers in any significant way, shape or fashion; and obviously it hurts the public. It's the public, at the end of the day, that will be hurt if the workers are not protected adequately under workers' compensation. I say that knowing that we represent workers, but I think the reason we represent workers is so that they can do their job with some degree of dignity, but also so that they can provide the public services that the people of Ontario expect and certainly require in this changing economy.

Changes that move in the direction of making it harder for workers to stay on compensation, changes that make it harder for workers to have their claims honoured, changes that move in the direction of diminishing worker input at the management level or the board level of the compensation board are, in our view, shortsighted and will not be helpful to the workers or the people of Ontario.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Burdick. We have time for questions.

Mr Maves: I'm not trying to make light in any way, but I was rather astonished that you had said 50% of library workers have compensation claims or are injured workers.

Ms Walker: In my workplace it's either a new or a recurring injury, and our experience is that the second occurrence is frequently resulting in permanent injuries.

Mr Maves: I would have assumed that it was a rather safe workplace. Could you give me some examples about some of the injuries?

Ms Walker: Sure. What happened at the Toronto Public Library is that it was an unautomated library system for a long period of time. When automation was introduced, what it did was it put library workers on to the assembly line. Without criticizing the employer unduly, I think it's very real to say that very few of us knew exactly what we were doing when we first put automation in. We didn't know that to ask someone to go like this for three hours at a time with a light-pen was going to have disastrous results, or that the height of desks and tables was important.

There was some—I don't know how to phrase it—unintentioned neglect there, but employers are trying to take steps to resolve that. It's difficult, though, when you've got the other pressure of increased need and decreased staffing. Those are the types of injuries. They're fine motor movement, from repeating that type of motion, but also static loading in the shoulders. I can tell you that I know someone who has to run water over her hands to get them to uncurl.

Now, as much as people want lower deficits and budget cuts, I have yet to meet a Tory who wanted to hurt somebody, and people say that's not the kind of accountability they're looking for.

The Chair: Thank you very much, both Ms Walker and Mr Burdick.

Mr Duncan wanted to raise another procedural matter or request for information.

Mr Duncan: I had a request for information of the committee. I wonder if we could be provided with information, in terms of both employer and worker fraud about (a) the investigative processes at the Workers' Compensation Board that are currently in place; and (b) the number of investigations against employers versus workers, let's say, in the last three years; and then, finally, the number of times that current maximum fines have been levelled against employers.

The Chair: Are there any other procedural matters? That being our last submission before recess, I'll call the meeting recessed until 3:30 this afternoon.

The committee recessed from 1216 to 1533.

The Chair: I call the committee back to order. Good afternoon all.

COUNCIL OF ONTARIO CONSTRUCTION ASSOCIATIONS

The Chair: Our first deputation this afternoon will be from the Council of Ontario Construction Associations. We remind everyone that we have 15-minute time slots today, and you can use that time as you see fit for either a presentation or a question-and-answer period, but we will be enforcing the 15 minutes. My apologies for the slight delay in getting started, gentlemen.

Mr David Frame: As you mentioned, we're here representing COCA, the Council of Ontario Construction Associations. My name is David Frame, executive vice-president. To my far left is Don Stewart. Don chairs our committee and he represents the Mechanical Contractors Association of Ontario. Also with me is Bob Brodie of Dewar Insulations; he is vice-president of finance.

COCA comprises 48 associations representing various trade and local mixed associations servicing Ontario's construction industry. These associations include a membership representing 8,000 large, medium and small contractors, a list of which is attached to my presentation.

The changes presented in Bill 15 represent a good start towards comprehensive reform of the WCB system. The bill itself is not a comprehensive change, but it does set the table for badly needed overhaul. Key changes in Bill 15 focus on administration and governance so that the board will be prepared to respond appropriately when a comprehensive overhaul is introduced.

On the issue of the board, we strongly support a move away from the bipartite to a multipartite structure. We have not been well served by bipartite structures in the WCB, the Workplace Health and Safety Agency and OTAB and we must learn from these failures. We must develop a system which is not designed around the labour relations model but rather one which will provide strong corporate governance.

When the former government changed the governance structure it declared the Workers' Compensation Board to be the joint property of the employers and the employees of Ontario. It established a bipartite model in which both would have equal representation based on common ownership. In doing so, the government abdicated its responsibility to ensure that the system was operating in the interests of the citizens of Ontario, and we believe these changes go a long way to move it back to where it should be.

The criteria for identifying the best board members should not be whom they represent, but do they bring the right tools to the table; do they provide a background which will be beneficial to the decision-making process? The board must be able to operate as a team. They must have strong leadership and there must be a common vision shared by all board members. Without this, once again, the system will not be given the type of leadership it desperately needs.

In making these changes, however, we must caution that they alone do not represent comprehensive changes to the system itself. We have worked extensively with senior management and members of the board of directors over many years, and time and time again we have found ourselves frustrated in suggesting positive changes that are not possible because bad legislation requires that it be done differently. A succession of WCB chairmen and vice-chairs has said to us, "I agree with what you are proposing but the legislation does not allow us to consider it." We must realize that even the best board will not solve many of the problems without comprehensive changes to the benefit structure.

Legislative changes, not governance problems, have been the major factor in creating our current financial crisis. Let's just quickly look at the record. In 1984 the unfunded liability doubled when the Legislature indexed the act but provided for no means to pay for it, short of massive rate increases. In 1989 the government brought in the dual award system and promised it would be revenue-neutral. In fact, the cost of this system proved to be roughly double that of the old one. Just last year a number of changes were made, including the application of the Friedland indexing formula, which should have reduced costs. Instead, we found that 70% of the benefits were exempted from the formula and that the new subsection 147(4) supplements finally have been costed at about $1.5 billion instead of the $700 million that the government estimated at the time.

This tinkering by government every four or five years has amounted to over $7 billion of debt added to the system and is a major reason for the financial crisis that the board now faces. We believe this Legislature must accept the responsibility to bring in comprehensive reforms which will provide fair levels of compensation and entitlement but in a manner that the board can manage on a fiscally sustainable basis.

Much of the conflict that exists in the system can be significantly reduced by the legislation being made more specific on key criteria. These will include eligibility, levels of some benefits, terms of payment, requirements for continuation of benefits and termination of benefits. These lack a clear definition in the act, which leads to time-consuming and costly processes of policy development, adjudication and appeals and has produced countless inconsistencies and unfair applications.

We're going to recommend to you today two small but, we believe, very significant amendments to Bill 15. The future economic loss provision, the FEL component of the dual award system, is about to enter its sixth year. It is still to fully mature, in that the earliest recipients have not had their second review. These are due to begin early next year. The legislation is silent on the issue of whether this review will lock in benefits until the recipient reaches age 65. At this time, the board's intention is to lock in benefits. The cost of this is not yet confirmed in the calculations of the unfunded liability or the assessment rates. If they are locked in, we face an enormous increase to some employers' costs and in the unfunded liability.

The Honourable Cam Jackson's review will address the financial sustainability of this award, but we are very concerned that before the next round of reforms are implemented a significant group of recipients will have these benefits locked in at possibly unreasonably high levels.

We recommend an amendment to subsection 41(2), which clarifies that review number two of FEL benefits will not be considered to be locked in. This will simply allow changes to the FEL to be applied equally to all, should that be the decision.

We are concerned that the bill's proposal to amend subsections 108.1(1) to (3) will require registration within 10 days of becoming an employer. We don't feel this is reasonable. The board is preparing to implement a new registration and review system called RESET on January 1 next year. The board worked for years with employers and systems experts to construct an effective and workable system. It's one that allows employers up to 30 days to register upon them becoming an employer. It recognizes that the employer must produce proof of things such as cancelled paycheques to prove that, yes, they are an employer. It is also consistent with the timing of the board's assessment schedule. The vice-president of finance of the board admitted to us just last week that it would not be reasonable or possible for them to enforce the 10-day registration period. We encourage you to amend this requirement so it becomes 30 days, or at least to make it consistent with the registration requirements of Revenue Canada.

I want to take a few minutes to talk to you about the relationship between accident reduction and WCB costs that we faced in the construction industry. Much has been accomplished in the last decade to improve construction safety performance. This includes an extensive development and implementation of regulations under the Occupational Health and Safety Act for our industry; increased resources and education, largely provided through the Construction Safety Association of Ontario; increased labour and management cooperation in the development of workplace procedures; and of course the introduction of construction's own experience rating system, called CAD-7. Our research indicates that of all these processes, experience rating has probably had the most significant impact on reducing the industry's accident level.

Early in the 1980s, our industry made a commitment to reduce the number of lost-time injuries. The industry spent a number of years working with the WCB to develop CAD-7 so that it would reward employers for having fewer accidents and lower costs and also would surcharge those who have more. The message is very simple: Safety is a bottom-line issue. Reduce your accidents, you will reduce your WCB costs, and the company's level of profitability therefore will be enhanced.

Experience rating in construction was introduced in 1985, and in that year the industry sustained 15,440 lost-time accidents. Last year, in 1994, the number of LTIs in the industry was off significantly, to 6,374. This is a tremendous accomplishment. Chart A shows that in the first two years of CAD-7 there was no significant change in the accident frequency level, but from 1988 through to 1993 the accident rate has continued to fall every year regardless of employment levels in the industry. As a result, our accident frequency rate has been reduced 62% over that period. We believe it's a significant accomplishment for all those involved.

While our occupational health and safety performance has produced steady improvements, we have failed dismally to use it to reduce WCB costs. Chart B compares construction lost-time incidence versus benefit costs. In 1982, the benefit payments to injured workers paid out were just over $130 million. By 1992, 10 years later, those benefits had increased to $452 million, despite a significant reduction in the lost-time accident claims.

To consider the magnitude of this growth, we produced a comparison of the costs on page 10, chart C. It shows that the cost per LTI grew from $10,813 in 1982 to a staggering $55,875 by 1992. The board's report on how these costs break down is shown on chart D. It compares the division of costs in the construction sector before Bill 162 was implemented and after it was introduced featuring the dual-award pension provisions.

It illustrates that while most areas of costs, particularly those of short-term compensation, have been reduced, largely because of fewer accidents, the cost of pensions, particularly the future economic loss, and their related supplements have soared from 33% to 53% of total payments. This has convinced us that the key to controlling costs is to revise the future economic loss provision to make it more efficient in delivering its benefits to the workers who are truly in need. The industry's efforts to reduce costs by reducing the number of accidents have failed, in part because of this growth of the FEL benefits.

Future economic loss was designed to compensate workers with work-related permanent disabilities by providing partial compensation for lost income-earning potential related to the accident. Our five years of experience with FEL show the system does not restrict itself to this and, as a result, has caused significant overcompensation in some areas and driven the construction industry's unfunded liability up by over $1 billion so that today it is well over $3 billion.

Very quickly, we believe some of the flaws in this system are:

The law assumes that all full-time workers work a full year. But in construction, seasonal work and high unemployment mean that a 60% FEL award often will pay higher benefits than the average healthy worker will receive in that full year. This is a great disincentive for return to work at a lower level of pay.

The Chair: Excuse me, Mr Frame. I just want to alert you that you've got about 30 seconds to a minute to wrap up, if you could.

Mr Frame: Okay, I'll move through it very quickly.

The Workers's Compensation Act establishes that a worker who has not returned to work one full year after an accident will be assessed for a FEL. This assumes that an impairment caused by the accident has blocked re-employment, but in some industries, such as construction, most are victims of the economic turnaround. FEL has become a lucrative unemployment and retirement fund for thousands of workers, and obviously changes need to occur.

We believe the FEL supplement simply must be overhauled to stop this haemorrhaging, only providing payment for lost-time wages due to the impairment, not for other personal conditions. We understand that the reform of the FEL is not in the intention of Bill 15 but will be a prime focus of the Jackson review. Therefore, we would like you to give a full consideration to the recommendations to change subsection 41(2) so that it's clarified that pensions are not locked in.

Thank you for the opportunity to present on Bill 15, and if there is any time for questions, we would welcome them.

The Chair: I regret that, in the interest of getting all of the 73 groups and people that have requested time to speak, we're strictly enforcing the 15-minute limit. But thank you all for taking the time to make your presentation and offer these suggestions.

52ONTARIO FEDERATION OF LABOUR

The Chair: The next group up will be the Ontario Federation of Labour. Good afternoon, gentlemen. Would you be kind enough to introduce yourselves for the committee and Hansard.

Mr Ken Signoretti: Thank you, Chairperson. My name is Ken Signoretti and I'm the executive vice-president of the Ontario Federation of Labour. On my left is Ross McClellan, the legislative director.

I just want to make a few comments. First of all, I just want to say that we're pleased to be here and I just want to start reminding the committee that in fact the Ontario Federation of Labour has been deeply involved with workers' compensation for a long time. We've done it because we really believe that there are problems with the system and we want to do the best we can to try to fix it up.

We have a workers' training project which is involved and we've trained over 6,000 participants for compensation advocates. We've participated in all levels of the workers' system, from the board of directors to many committees and subcommittees involved in workers' compensation issues. This, as I said, was done for the sole purpose of helping to create a more just, a more effective system of workers' compensation. We want a system that compensates workers fairly and justly for their injuries and gets them back to work as quickly as possible.

We were making real progress towards that goal of a fair, effective workers' compensation system, and here are some facts I hope you would consider when you pass, or hopefully don't pass, Bill 15.

Fact: The board does not have a debt; it has an unfunded liability. We all know there's a difference. The WCB is not bankrupt. It does not borrow a cent. It has more than $6 billion in assets sitting in an accident fund. It has an unfunded liability, which is the present cost of future payments owed to injured workers by the employers for present claims. The reason that there is a $12-billion unfunded liability is because employers have always refused to pay the actual cost of workers' compensation.

Fact: Measured in 1994 dollars, the unfunded liability grew the most during the 1980s when the Progressive Conservatives were in power. In 1980, the unfunded liability was $398 million. In 1985, when the Tories left office, it was $5.4 billion. I just want to remind you here—and I was listening to Mr Frame earlier when he talked about 1984—when Bill 101 was passed and they increased to full indexing, 100%, for workers, one of the things that was necessary to do was to also increase the funding level. There was a great deal of pressure from the business community, and at that point the funding level was not put into place, so consequently you had a misbalance. If that funding level had been put in place as it should have been, we probably wouldn't have the trouble or perceived problems that we have today.

Fact: The WCB is better funded today than it was 10 years ago. In 1985, the ratio of assets to liabilities was 31.8%. In 1994, the ratio was 37.4%.

Fact: New claim costs have decreased over 8% in the past four years, from an average of $2 to $1.68 per $100 of payroll.

Fact: The WCB's overhead has decreased over 8% in the past four years, from an average of 49 cents to 44 cents per $100 of payroll.

Fact: According to its 1993 annual report, WCB devoted 17% of its total expenses to pay for overhead. In comparison, Sun Life of Canada charged 30% and the Minnesota privatized workers' compensation charged 29% against overhead. This year, in 1995, WCB has a cash flow surplus. These are the things you have to think about before talking about privatization.

The fact is that the real abuses at the WCB are abused by employers, and not workers.

Fact: More than 55,000 employers owe the WCB $430 million outstanding.

Fact: An estimated 20,000 employers which should legally be registered with the WCB and paying their fair share are not registered at all.

Fact: Over 700,000 Ontario workers are excluded from WCB coverage because their employers have been successful in lobbying government to exempt them from the system.

Fact: While employers scream about WCB costs, they've been stripping the funds out of the board through the experience rating scam, because it encourages employers to hide and oppose claims. It is supposed to pay out roughly the same amount in rebates to the so-called good employers as it imposes penalties on the so-called bad employers. In fact, in 1994 the WCB paid out $280 million more in rebates than it collected in penalties; in 1993, the figure was $216 million. This is higher than the total amount paid each year for temporary total disability benefits. And it is real cash, not actuarial projections.

Earlier this year, the labour members of the bipartite board of directors, now dismissed, voted to support a financial improvements package which would have eliminated the WCB unfunded liability by the year 2014. It was the employers who opposed it, out of greed to keep the experience rating scam pumping more WCB money into their coffers.

Bill 15 proposes to turn total control of the WCB over to these same business people who have been ripping off the system for 25 years. It is a wrong and foolish policy. It will not work. We urge you to re-establish a genuine partnership of governance for the WCB. Let's get on with the job of creating a fair and effective public insurance plan for the workplace accidents.

I just want to say, I heard Mr Frame earlier when he talked about how we have to restore balance and bring the system back to where it was. If we have to honour the system as it was in 1915—I understand that in 1995 things are not going to work the same, but in terms of the principle of workers' compensation, the whole idea of workers' compensation was a plan which employers paid into and in return for that employees would not sue. It was a no-fault insurance. I think when you do that you get into a bipartite structure because one side is giving to the other in that whole process.

So I would hope, on behalf of the Ontario Federation of Labour and all the affiliates, that you reconsider your position. That's our submission. Ross has given you the whole details. That was just a capsule of what we want.

Mr Ross McClellan: There's an appendix at the second half of the brief which I'd ask members to have a look at. It covers some of the detailed points of the legislation.

The Chair: Thank you. We ended the questioning in the morning session with the third party, so the leadoff will be the government members.

Mr Baird: I'd like to thank you, first, for your presentation today. You've obviously put a lot of time into it, and we all greatly appreciate that and your attendance here today.

Just two or three comments before a question: One of the facts, that the unfunded liability went from $2.8 billion to $5.4 billion in 1984-85, that was of course because of the extending of inflation protection which was supported by all parties. Your point, though, on the funding level to the plan never being raised as well, is very well taken. It obviously should have been.

The second comment: With respect to another one of the facts, the funding ratio was 31.8% in 1985. By 1990 it had improved, under the Liberal government, to over 40%, but then unfortunately it started to go down, to 37.4%, as you indicated. So it was actually getting worse historically.

The question I had was with respect to the provisions in the proposed legislation calling for increased fines to businesses. One of the criticisms you I think very justifiably brought forward is the abuses taking place by employers. Do you support the provisions in the bill which levy $100,000 fines to employers who fail to register within 10 days, as is the case with the retail sales tax and health care payroll tax?

Mr Signorette: Yes, we have no problems with the fines. When we talk about the system, I think you can get around the fines thing. One of the problems that we have when we talk about abuse by employers—and I just want to talk for about a minute, if I can, about the experience rating that Mr Frame talked about, which went down from $12,000 to $6,000, or whatever the figures used; I couldn't quite hear. Part of that problem with the experience rating, as we've been saying all along, is—and if you talk to employees, this is what's happened—the experience rating was being abused because employees are being told that in fact it's better for you to go on S and A benefits than workers' compensation. A lot of people are convinced that's the best way, for a couple of reasons. One is that money's in the pocket of employees quicker, and secondly—just for that reason, I guess, alone, that they want to get the money quicker.

The problem with what the experience rating does is that if a person then has a follow-up injury to that and it's not recorded, so then it doesn't show up as a recurrence, part of the problem, we think, is that if you have a true system where employers and employees work together on the whole problem, because we have just as much at stake as everybody else, that will make it a lot better than trying to use an experience rating.

So you can have $100,000 or you can have $500,000 in fines; the reality of it is they don't pay. A good example was what happened with—the ministry has now backed off with that young man who got killed—

Mr Baird: Mr Kells.

Mr Signorette: Yes, Sean Kells. You backed off, but you backed off after considerable pressure.

Anyway, fines sometimes really don't mean a whole lot. That's the short answer.

Mr McClellan: Could I just say, particularly in the construction field in this city there's a whole army of underground employers who are not registered as employers. They're systematically avoiding compensation benefits. The proof will be in the enforcement, and people are very sceptical about, quite frankly, your willingness to enforce that. You could be enforcing it right now.

Mr Baird: As a newly elected member, I can't speak to why the board has let this problem get out of control over the last number of years. But I guess my final comment would be, your comment with respect to employers not paying the dues that they're supposed to pay is certainly an issue. That's why we think getting tough with fines is important. But your point on enforcement is well taken. These powers have got to be used by the board.

Mr Duncan: The amount in the act and the fine are meaningless; it's enforcement.

Has anybody from Mr Jackson's office asked you for any input on the major changes he's making?

Mr Signorette: Nothing.

Mr Duncan: There's been no consultation at all? None?

Mr Signorette: We've had no consultation with anybody on anything.

Mr Duncan: Written or verbal?

Mr Signorette: As a matter of fact, we tried. Mr Hambley is here. Mr Hambley and I both tried to get a meeting with the minister on this and we were unable to.

Mr Duncan: Ms Castrilli has our supplementary.

Ms Annamarie Castrilli (Downsview): I'd like to turn to another matter which deals with the composition of the new board. As you correctly stated in your brief, it was a bipartite board. That bipartite board came to loggerheads on occasion. This new board, I'm wondering if you have any concerns about how it would be appointed, what input your organization and others would have with respect to that board. Does it concern you?

Mr Signorette: I'm sorry. I didn't hear you. I didn't bring my hearing aid.

Ms Castrilli: Yes, forgive me. I'm suffering from a cold. I'll try and speak more clearly. The government has introduced this new board, the multi-stakeholder board, in order to overcome the difficulty of the bipartite board. I wondered what, if any, concerns you have about how the board would be structured.

Mr Signorette: We like the bipartite structure and we think it worked very well. You made a comment; you said there were some problems and it got into loggerheads sometimes, and it's true. Any time two people with two different views get down, there are going to be differences. But by and large you can work the differences out.

We have been trying to work the differences out. Mr Hambley and the business council are going to be here a little later on, and I've got to tell you, we had a good relationship with these people. We worked hard, they worked hard, and there were times we had disagreements, but by and large we were able to work our problems out.

As I said, when you get two people who have different views, you're going to get into difficulties sometimes, but I think you can work them out, and by and large we did. We did a lot of hard work. That's why from a multi-stakeholder board, if you're asking me would we want to be on one, I don't know. That's something we haven't talked about. We want to see how the whole thing plays out, but at this point I would say no. I think the best thing was a bipartite structure. We know that it worked.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Signoretti. That's the end of our 15 minutes, but I appreciate your taking the time to visit us today and thank you for your submissions.

CANADIAN FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Canadian Federation of Independent Business.

Good afternoon. I wonder if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves for Hansard and the committee.

Ms Catherine Swift: Good afternoon. My name is Catherine Swift. I'm the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. My colleague Judith Andrew, who is the director of provincial policy with special responsibility for Ontario, is with me today.

As we don't have a lot of time, we'll try to be as brief as we can. We certainly, as always, appreciate the opportunity to express the views of small businesses in Ontario today. We are, as you probably know, a national organization. We have about 85,000 members, small and medium-sized business members across Canada, and almost half of them happen to be in Ontario, roughly 40,000.

We've been very active as an organization on workers' compensation issues for a very, very long time. We've done fairly substantive research, I guess we'd like to think, over the years. A study we did back in 1987 in fact was a fairly instructive tome and one that interestingly enough, when we read, we don't find too much of it out of whack in terms of the policy recommendations for today.

We've found the issue of workers' compensation has increased as a concern for our members over the years, and there's no question that this tracks the increase in premiums and certainly the well-founded belief that the system is currently well out of control. Despite the fact that we see a decline in the incidence of workplace accidents, we see ever-increasing premiums, so there's clearly a problem here.

Generally speaking, we view workers' compensation premiums as just one more of that area of taxation we refer to as payroll taxes. It's quite a significant body of research, as you may know, that has shown how payroll taxes, those levied as a percentage of payroll, as workers' comp is, both penalize employees via a reduction in their real wage levels over time and also serve as a deterrent to employment. So we think there's a very good array of evidence to suggest that anything that brings down the level of payroll taxes will be a plus in terms of job creation and also, of course, the overall level of employment in the economy.

We have been very supportive for a long time now of quite comprehensive reform of workers' compensation in Ontario. We support, for example, what this government has already done in terms of terminating the former government's royal commission. We are very supportive, again, of reducing assessment rates by 5%, which has been part of the government's reform plan to date, a reduction in overall benefit levels and the introduction of such things as a three-day waiting period for claims.

This is something that, as you probably know, is working quite well in New Brunswick, and we think the New Brunswick model, as well as others in other jurisdictions across the country, have a lot to guide us, because many of them have been in place for a number of years and have not ended up in any kind of gutting of the system, but have very much enhanced financial accountability and benefits to both workers and employers.

I'd like to now ask Judith to cover some of the nitty-gritty of our recommendations.

Ms Judith Andrew: The next few sections of our brief actually deal with Bill 15. The purpose clause is something we've had a very close look at. We believe that a prerequisite to establishing an enduring board of directors structure is to articulate the vision of the WCB in legislation. Certainly if the board of directors does not understand and agree upon the vision or the purpose of the organization, the differing views of what the WCB is attempting to accomplish will inevitably clash, and this is what we have witnessed over the past few years.

We articulate a vision here in our brief. It contains a concept that is not in Bill 15 and that we suggest be injected into Bill 15, and that is the concept of competitiveness. We believe that element is critical to ensuring that financial accountability is not interpreted by others in the future as the simple exercise of levying sufficient payroll taxes to cover all of the spending, excessive or otherwise, that may be going on. We think it was precisely this kind of thinking, "the spend now, employers will pay later" approach, that resulted in the current situation where Ontario has the dubious distinction of having the largest unfunded liability as well as almost the highest assessment rates in the country. So we would strongly recommend that the notion of competitiveness be injected into the purpose clause of the act.

On the governance model, I just would say briefly that we applaud the move to eliminate bipartism and its structures and replace that with a multi-stakeholder model. We believe that all stakeholders should be represented. Of course small business is one of them but also the non-union employee group as well as the labour interests, big business as schedule 2 employees, and a mix of the different sectors that are affected by workers' compensation.

We believe that professional expertise at the board table will be important so that the right questions are asked of staff before important decisions are made in this very complex area.

We also believe that it would be important to name to the board a senior government official from a key financial ministry. This we propose in conjunction with a change in reporting to the Ministry of Finance.

We also view governance in its broader context in terms of the board of directors being responsible for the management of the entire system, including all of the organizations funded from WCB moneys. It's our view that the system would never be financially sustainable if outside bodies can spend WCB funds without being ultimately accountable to the taxing authority.

On financial accountability, and of course this mixes in with the governance issues, we believe that accountability to small business taxpayers can only happen via the elected representatives of the people of Ontario. For too many years our concerns were buffeted back and forth between the government and the WCB, with each blaming the other for the problems. We believe that the new memorandum of understanding, which in effect is a contract between the WCB and the government, is a good idea. We support the requirement of value-for-money audits, with the minister determining annually which program is to be reviewed. We believe those audits should be made available publicly on a timely basis.

We would also recommend further measures to bolster financial accountability within the system, things like the WCB board of directors referring policy issues of public or major economic importance to the government for legislative or other action, with a certified actuarial evaluation attached.

We also believe the board of directors should file a detailed budget in the autumn with the relevant standing committee of the Legislature, probably this committee, and justify variances to the committee shortly after the year-end. This recommendation is made on the assumption that the MOU plans and statements would not be publicly available.

We think the WCB unfunded liability should be shown as a contingent liability of the province and that at year-end the WCB actuaries should sign both the rates and the liabilities and report the same to the board of directors and also make them public at the same time.

On the issue of fraud and revenue loss, our members are extremely concerned about the extent of this in the system. We have a total of 79% of our members concerned about abuse of the system. In fact, we published a piece to assist our members in dealing with WCB fraud and abuse in order to help them combat this issue. We certainly support further measures to give the WCB the necessary tools to attack the problem evenhandedly and to a much greater extent.

Our analysis on Bill 15 has us concerned that employee fraud is to be treated with more leniency than employer fraud. In subsections 161(1) and 161(2), for example, the words "willfully" and "knowingly" are used in connection with employee misstatements. On the other side of things, the revenue loss section, for example, section 156 makes it an offence for an employer who fails to register, without considering whether or not it was done knowingly or willfully.

Certainly with the government's Clearing the Path project there should be fewer situations where an individual registers a business without being aware that he or she should be signing up with the WCB, but there does remain many such situations where employers are genuinely unaware of the requirement. We would argue that it's very difficult for a business owner to discover some years later that they should have registered, only to be in a quandary as to registering at that point and facing several years of back assessments. Accordingly, we recommend a time-limited amnesty in conjunction with an awareness program in order to get all the businesses properly signed up and paying into the WCB.

We recommend several other fraud prevention measures on the top of page 6, and I just want to briefly draw your attention to the key issues that were held over for phase 2 reform which we have strong member positions on.

On the whole area of benefits, attached to the brief is our mandate 160, which shows 91% of our members in favour of limiting WCB benefits so that the employee's original earnings are not exceeded. Of course, when the original earnings are exceeded, this in effect is overcompensation, when the person ends up taking home more than 100% of pre-injury income. This is financially unsustainable.

We recommend eliminating top-ups, revisiting the Bill 162 retirement pension issue, scaling back the future economic loss awards that have turned out to be far more costly than even the most generous costings that were done before Bill 162 was passed and looking at and dealing with the overcompensation in Bill 165. Catherine mentioned the waiting period. We believe that would be an important part of the reform, and our mandate 168, attached to the brief, shows 81% of our members in favour of such a waiting period.

We also attach some suggested legislative language for limiting entitlement in stress to work-caused events, and that's enclosed at the back of the brief.

I just would say in conclusion that our small and medium-sized firms are looking forward to the promised reforms, both the phase 1 and the phase 2, to follow Mr Jackson's review. Once those take effect, they will certainly provide early positive results for the WCB system and for Ontarians generally.

The Chair: Thank you. The speaking rotation will start with the third party this time. I beg your pardon. The OFL didn't have any questions. I stand corrected. You're up, Mr Duncan.

Mr Duncan: Your members have consistently expressed their concern about paperwork and the paper burden associated with government, specifically section 17 of the bill, section 108.1 of the act. Are you not concerned that that section could possibly create an additional paper burden on your members, that historically you've spoken very strongly against these kinds of things?

Ms Andrew: You're speaking of the notion of registering within 10 days after becoming an employer?

Mr Duncan: Not only the registration, but subsection 108.1(2) of the act, "When registering and at such other times as the board may require, an employer...." It strikes me that if we give legislative effect to these types of changes, your members could be faced with a considerable paper burden that they don't presently have. I'm curious as to why you haven't addressed that issue. You addressed that issue in a number of other forums in the past.

Ms Andrew: Employers are currently required to register when they have employees.

Mr Duncan: No, again, in subsection (2) and also in the offences section—I envision a situation where when the officials at the board get a hold of these legislative changes, the kinds of paper that they could impose on members of your organization could be very onerous. You've been very forthright and candid in the past about your concerns about red tape. Wouldn't you share our concern that possibly the red tape associated with these changes could be more onerous than, say, the corporate filing?

Ms Andrew: I would certainly think that the notion of doing it within 10 days might be impossible, certainly for small businesses, probably for the WCB as well.

Mr Duncan: You would acknowledge, then, that these are a very onerous paper burden?

Ms Andrew: Paper burden issues are always a concern for us. Obviously, in some instances it's a necessary evil, but we are supportive also of the Clearing the Path effort to make sure that registrations kind of happen in a one-window effort.

Mr Duncan: Have you been consulted by Mr Jackson yet on his reforms?

Ms Andrew: Only in a preliminary way. I understand Mr Jackson is going to release a discussion paper.

Mr Duncan: So you have been consulted. What form was that preliminary way?

Ms Andrew: We have requested and had meetings with staff to discuss various issues.

Mr Duncan: So you have had the opportunity meet with his staff.

Ms Andrew: Yes.

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton Centre): I have to confess, there's so much I fundamentally disagree with I wasn't sure which question to ask, because I'm likely to only get one. So we'll just start at maybe the largest piece.

I still have a great deal of difficulty understanding those who disagree with the bipartite system, given that the WCB was originally a pact, if you will, a public social pact between employers and employees in terms of employees receiving compensation for lost wages and benefits if they're hurt on the job through no fault of their own, while employers are saved from any kind of lawsuit.

That was the original pact, and I really would like you to help me with this. Why, if that's the case, would it be so unacceptable to small business people that workers would then have 50% of the say in the decision-making—not more, not less, but 50% of the say in that decision-making—if it was an equal partnership when it was first brought in in 1914?

Ms Andrew: I think if you go back to the Justice Meredith inquiry, the involvement was also on the part of government. This wasn't a deal that employers just made with labour—

Mr Christopherson: But the government provides the legislation.

Ms Andrew: —but government was involved there and, as you notice in our brief, we recommend that the government take an important role and be quite accountable for this system.

We think employees should have good representation at the board table, but that would not be exclusive to organized labour. There's a large non-union contingent out there that has been disfranchised for many years for not having any representation at the board table, and we think the process should be more open than that.

We also believe that professionals should be named to the board, public-minded people who have special expertise, for example, actuarial, medical and so forth, who would be able to help elicit the right kinds of information for the board to make decisions. This is not an area that people can get up to speed on in a short orientation. It is not quite like the normal board that people sit on, and that's why we believe that it should be a multipartite effort.

To get right at your question, the bipartite approach didn't work. We've had a couple of examples of disasters with the bipartite approach, the most notable being the Workplace Health and Safety Agency.

Mr Christopherson: Oh. I fundamentally disagree with that so much. Jeez.

The Chair: You were right in your expectation; you only have one question.

Thank you very much. I'm afraid we've used up the 15 minutes. Thank you for taking the time to make your presentations.

BUSINESS STEERING COMMITTEE

The Chair: Our next group up is the Business Steering Committee. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. I wonder if you would be kind enough to introduce yourself to the committee and to Hansard. Just as a reminder, we're keeping a strict eye on the clock today to try and get all 73 deputations in.

Mr David Hambley: Good afternoon. My name is David Hambley. I'm vice-president of human resources at Noranda and chair of the Business Steering Committee. With me today are Dr Albert Cecutti, vice-president, environmental services at Falconbridge; Laurie Harley, manager, government relations at IBM; Dale Kerry, vice-president of human resources at Jannock Ltd; and Charlie Ryan, manager of government relations at General Motors.

As background, the Business Steering Committee was formed in 1993 to support the business members of the Premier's Labour-Management Advisory Committee or the PLMAC, as you may know it. The business community united behind the issue of workers' compensation reform establishing a process that gathered input from over 200 small and large companies and associations. A well-researched document was prepared and presented to the government. Many of the recommendations contained in that submission form part of Bill 15. Other key issues will be studied by Minister Jackson, and we will be active in that review as well.

We are pleased with the direction the government is taking in reforming the workers' compensation system and encourage them to continue their efforts.

My comments first address the purpose clause. The purpose clause as proposed is a major improvement to the current wording in the act. It will require financial responsibility and accountability on all aspects of the system.

However, it doesn't go far enough to address our long-standing concern about the long-term financial viability of the system. As written, the purpose clause sets out the services the act provides and then requires the accomplishment of those services in a financially responsible and accountable manner. We think we need something stronger if it is to be of assistance to the government in restoring financial sustainability. We suggest a change to the opening clause as follows:

"The purpose of this act is to prevent workplace accident and illness and reduce the overall cost of work-caused injuries and illnesses to workers, employers and the citizens of Ontario, to ensure the long-term viability of a fair, effective and affordable workers' compensation system in Ontario, and, in doing so, accomplish the following in a financially responsible and accountable manner."

We suggest that points 1, 2, 4 and 6 should not be changed, but that point 3 should read:

"To facilitate the provision of rehabilitation programs to restore the workers' condition of employability and programs to facilitate the workers' return to work."

We think it is very important to distinguish between employability versus employment. Rehabilitation should not be a substitute for lack of employment.

We suggest point 5 should read:

"To prevent or reduce the occurrence of injuries and occupational diseases at work," we would add "through financial incentives to employers."

We certainly support the use of experience rating in the act for encouraging and promoting prevention programs.

On governance: We fully support the general direction of a multi-stakeholder board. However, we have several suggestions to ensure the success of this model.

We believe the government controls the system in three ways: setting out the broad parameters of the system; appointing the board of directors and approving hiring of the chair and the president; using a memorandum of understanding which clearly defines the roles of government and the WCB.

Consistent with this control, we have the following comments regarding governance.

On policy direction: While giving the minister the ability to provide policy direction without restrictions is sound policy in the short term, we suggest that with the new governance structure in place the minister should be much less involved in the longer term.

While we have every confidence in Minister Witmer, we are concerned that the minister applying policy directly may undermine the independence that should be in place for the WCB to function effectively. We are also concerned that this may expose policymaking to political pressure in the Legislature in the longer term.

For these reasons we recommend that the minister's ability to issue policy be limited to no more than 12 months—six would be ideal—providing the necessary direction and support for the new board.

On the issue of appointments: We support the multi-stakeholder model. The involvement of very senior stakeholders, including people from workers, employers and the community, committed to achieving the goals of the act, is essential.

Directors should be representative from, rather than of, their respective communities. Directors must be appointed based on skill and not affiliation.

We continue to have concern that appointments will be made more on a representative basis than on skill. It is critical that the directors bring with them the skills inherent in running a multi-billion-dollar organization.

The chair should be part-time, although in the shorter term, until a new CEO or restructuring officer, as we prefer to call him or her, is able to turn the WCB around, it would be appropriate to have a full-time chair. Eventually we think that the chair should be recommended to the government by the board of directors.

It is important that the board have the full authority to monitor the president's performance and take corrective action as required.

On WCAT: Employers continue to be concerned about the role and powers of WCAT. Decisions of WCAT have resulted in a major expansion of entitlement to benefits with almost total disregard for the system's ability to pay. We believe immediate action is necessary.

Although WCAT is part of Minister Jackson's review, it is not likely that we will see any legislation until early 1997. We are concerned about this interval.

Powers of WCAT should be limited through the bill; otherwise it can continue to undermine the effectiveness of the board and its policymaking role. WCAT should rule only on whether the WCB has applied its policy correctly and not on the correctness of the policy.

Restricting WCAT's ability and powers to interpret the law would require a minor change to section 86 of the act, as I understand it, and is consistent with the government's overall objective. For example, what would the government do if WCAT overturned a government-initiated policy directive? WCAT decision-makers in the past have been both independent and creative. That concerns us quite a bit.

I'm also of the view that the chair of WCAT should have responsibility to the chair of the WCB. Also, he or she should attend board meetings only at the invitation of the WCB chair.

On the issues of fraud and abuse: We fully support these measures and the value-for-money audits.

Regarding the registration of employers, government may wish to consider a revenue amnesty for back assessments prior to, say, 1995 and allow a six-month window for firms to come forward before implementing the changes.

Government and WCB also need to consider the critical importance of communication and information with businesses that are newly established. Many firms that do not register with the WCB may be unaware of their obligation.

Workers' compensation fraud and abuse should not have any special immunity from prosecutions.

Bill 165 issues:

On the experience rating: In particular, Bill 165 put in place changes to experience rating in section 103 which changed these programs from results-based to process-based programs. To ensure the continued success of experience rating, and until the longer-term study is complete, we urge the government to rescind subsection 103.1(3) of the act.

On return to work: Requiring the workers' consent for the release of information surrounding return to work has imposed barriers in the return-to-work process. To ensure the effectiveness of return-to-work programs and efforts of employers, we recommend this requirement be removed from section 51 of the act.

On permanent partial disability supplements, or section 147: Bill 165 provided an additional $200 per month to about 40,000 people who were in receipt of the subsection 147(4) supplements. This added $1.5 billion to the unfunded liability.

The purpose of the original supplement was to bridge injured workers who were not likely to benefit from vocational rehabilitation with a monthly benefit equal to the old age security benefit until age 65. Bill 165 gave an additional $200 a month per life, which was not the intent of the supplement.

We are not sure if Minister Jackson will include this issue in his review, but with approximately 40,000 people currently receiving the benefit, the more time passes, the more difficult it will be to amend it.

Also, the WCB interpretation regarding subsection 147(4) awards added $350 million to the unfunded liability in 1994 and should be reviewed immediately.

Some of the options: Review the process to determine individual needs for the $200 per month; cut the $200 per month off at 65 because OAS starts then, and this was supposed to be a bridge up to the commencement of old age security; allow WCB to cease payment of the supplement at times of review, at 24 months and 60 months, where appropriate.

Mr Chairman, thank you for allowing us the time to present our recommendations.

The Chair: Thank you for your comments. Questions will start with the third party.

Mr Christopherson: I was interested in your, and other employers', comments on the experience rating system. All the employer groups are praising it. Given the fact that, as I understand, the policy principle is that it should not be paying out more in rebates than it collects in penalties, and we know that in 1994 they paid out $280 million more in rebates and in 1993 it was $216 million more in rebates than in penalties, and given that clearly your priority is the fiscal status of the WCB, how do you reconcile wanting fiscal accountability to be the top priority and yet continuing to endorse a system that is clearly benefiting employers at the expense of the unfunded liability and other operating costs, given that it's running at a deficit, actually, the way it's been carried out in the last couple of years? Can you explain that to me, please?

Mr Hambley: The only way I can answer that is to say that the employer community has been saying for quite a few years that the rating system needs to be reworked. I don't think I can comment any further on that. We know there are problems with it and it needs to be fixed.

Mr Christopherson: Sorry, but reworked in what way, though? How would you suggest it?

Mr Hambley: We need to study it and find a way to properly put in a rating system that's fair to everyone.

Mr Christopherson: Even if that had the effect of lowering the rebates, even in the formula that employers would receive, you'd support that?

Mr Hambley: Some people will have their premiums increased and some of them decreased, but the way the system is now, it's not fair to everyone.

Mr Christopherson: But if you're going to net this out, then obviously the decrease part would have to be pretty substantial, if now you're saying some people may even get more money in a rejigged formula than exists now. So you're still supporting the idea, though, that this needs to be brought in line and that some employers are not going to receive nearly as much money as they now do. Is that correct?

Mr Hambley: You mean, not pay as much money as they now do.

Mr Christopherson: No, receive—in terms of rebates.

Dr Albert Cecutti: The only thing is that we believe that it should be balanced. We've said for some time that the intention is that this should equal out, and if it's not equalling out, then there has to be a system that would do that. It's very simple, and the employers have been saying this for some time. They believe that experience rating does work, period, and that it just shows that it has been an effective method of improving their accident statistics. Therefore, it has to be there in some way. We believe this. If there's an imbalance, then it has to be looked at by some other method. I know that some business communities have put in several suggestions on how this could be rejigged—the actuaries have spoken to them—to make it more fair.

Mr Christopherson: I understand that this has been pursued in the past and, each and every time there was a rejigging of the system, someone within the employer community would feel that they're receiving a particular hardship, and from their point of view they could make that case. Are you suggesting, though, clearly going on the record that regardless of the cost to employers this needs to be brought into balance and there would not be more money going out in rebates that is received in penalties? Is that correct?

Dr Cecutti: I won't go on the record, no, not what you just said. I said that we are in favour of experience rating and that it has to be fixed in some way to make it more equitable. I don't know that you could ever, say, guarantee that it would be balanced. It may not, but that would show up eventually in the rates.

Mr Christopherson: In this particular case, then, fiscal accountability is not necessarily the absolute top priority?

Dr Cecutti: I'm sorry?

Mr Christopherson: I'm just having some trouble understanding. If the fiscal requirements and needs of the WCB are the absolute priority driving the business community position, by and large, and yet they're also supporting one of the key elements within the WCB that gives a greater benefit to employers over and above what the policy says, then it would seem to me that you should be quite comfortable saying: "That has to be fixed. It has to balance the way that the policy is meant to." I would just offer, with great respect, that if you are not comfortable to say that, it does a great deal of damage to your argument that the fiscal accountability has to be the driving force of reforming WCB.

Dr Cecutti: No, I think you're incorrect in making that assumption. I think that what we're saying is that the whole board has to be accountable. Experience rating is one of the tools that has to be addressed. You've misinterpreted what the whole intent is. The intent is that the whole functioning of the board has to be financially accountable and run more effectively, but we still want experience rating as part of the system, and you can't take it out of context of the whole board.

Mr Christopherson: That's interesting.

The Chair: That more than uses up our 15 minutes. Thank you very much for taking the time to visit us today and preparing your presentation and brief you left behind.

BUSINESS COUNCIL ON OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY IN ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Business Council on Occupational Health and Safety in Ontario. Good afternoon to you. I wonder if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves to the committee and Hansard.

Mr Mark Gabinet: Good afternoon, Mr Chairman and members of the committee. My name is Mark Gabinet and I am the director of safety and environment for BICC Phillips Inc. Accompanying me today is Dawn Janveaux, who is the director of health and safety for Cuddy Food Products Ltd. We are here as representatives of the Business Council on Occupational Health and Safety in Ontario, an employer organization to which both of our companies belong.

The business council was established in 1991 and is now comprised of 27 companies, the names of which are shown on the page following the cover of our brief. The mission of the business council is to support the development of public policy in the areas of occupational health, safety and workers' compensation which is both protective of individuals and consistent with economic competitiveness. To this end, we have supported programs of policy research and published a variety of reports and commentaries on health and safety policy matters. Our members have also worked actively with this government, as well as the with the previous NDP and Liberal governments, in the pursuit of our objectives. Currently, one of our association's directors, Ms Mary Roy, is a business representative on the ministerial review team respecting the Workplace Health and Safety Agency.

We are pleased to have this opportunity today to provide the standing committee on resources development with our views on Bill 15. The reforms set out in the bill are most welcome by our members and long overdue. We are generally supportive of the bill, although we do have a particular concern and objection relating to one provision which appears to have the effect of giving quasi-regulatory powers to employer accident prevention associations created under the authority of section 135 of the Workers' Compensation Act. This matter will be the starting point of our submission. We also wish to use this opportunity to suggest further enhancements to Bill 15, as well as broader system reforms.

I will begin by addressing the matter of offences under the Workers' Compensation Act. In a prior submission to the Minister of Labour, dated September 26, 1995, we recommended that the act be amended to create a series of strict liability offences with a view to facilitating prosecution for fraud or system abuse. This is clearly the case in Bill 15, and we are generally supportive of the provisions.

However, we do have a very serious concern over subsection 154(2), which reads, "A person who contravenes a rule of an association formed under subsection 135(1) that has been approved and ratified as provided under subsection 135(2) is guilty of an offence." In referring to subsection 135(1), we see that the association in question is an accident prevention association, such as the Industrial Accident Prevention Association, the Construction Safety Association or any of the other employer accident prevention associations formed under subsection 135(1).

Therefore, subsection 154(2) effectively gives the accident prevention associations, which are supposedly non-governmental and non-regulatory organizations, regulatory or law-making authority by virtue of the fact that any rule they create would be one which an employer would be compelled to conform with under threat of penalty and prosecution under subsection 154(2).

This is troubling to our members for many reasons.

First, these accident prevention associations are not competent to function as lawmaking bodies. They are not structured, administered or otherwise equipped with personnel, expertise or processes necessary for creation of law or public policy. Nor do we believe they should be. Moreover, since many of these accident prevention associations are independently governed not-for-profit corporations under Ontario statutes, neither the WCB nor the government can expect to exercise control or direction over the rule-making activities of such associations.

Second, conveying such powers to safety associations would create an obvious conflict of interest. Currently, the accident prevention associations are essentially service providers. They provide training and consultation services, often for a fee, despite the fact that these services are already paid for through employer WCB assessments. It would seem, therefore, that these associations could face the tremendous temptation to create rules which would, as a direct or indirect effect, compel employers to utilize the associations' fee-for-service offerings.

This is not an improbable scenario. During the era of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency, a similar conflict of interest arose due to the agency's authority both to set standards for certification of joint health and safety committee members and to control the delivery of training to achieve such certification. Predictably, the agency created standards that called for several weeks of core training, which might still be followed by several weeks of sector-specific training; then set a price to such training; and then decreed that only they and their health and safety delivery organizations, that is, the accident prevention associations, could deliver such training. In fact, this tendency to create standards to create work seems, from our perspective, to have been a pervasive mindset at the agency prior to the election of the current government.

If subsection 154(2) survives, you should anticipate an unprecedented frenzy of association rule-making and a degree of discontent in the employer community that will make the past relations of employer groups to the Workplace Health and Safety Agency appear cordial by comparison.

Please don't misunderstand our position. We are not opposed to the creation and legislation of health and safety standards. It is simply that we believe this to be the proper domain of the government, not the WCB nor the accident prevention associations.

As a fourth and final point, the policy aim of subsection 154(2) is unclear. Is the government seeking to delegate its role and responsibilities for lawmaking and standard-setting in the area of workplace health and safety? This raises questions respecting the role of government in lawmaking and enforcement, and it also raises concerns over due process. Laws are made by governments, under the authority of elected representatives. Acts require the assent of the Legislative Assembly and regulations require the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council. These processes are not accidental but have been designed deliberately to provide opportunity for public input.

By comparison, we might ask where public representation and accountability can be found in the rule-making process envisioned by subsection 154(2). The answer is that public representation and accountability are absent. Subsection 154(2) undermines the role and responsibility of government and extends to non-governmental bodies a variety of powers to which they are not entitled.

Finally, with respect to subsection 154(2), we wish to express our disappointment and puzzlement that this was not a matter on which the government chose to widely consult prior to the introduction of Bill 15.

For these reasons, we strongly recommend that subsection 154(2) be excised from the bill.

I will now turn to the matter of governance of the Workers' Compensation Board.

Like many employer groups, we have shared the view that the board's prior bipartite government model was ineffective. Therefore, we are supportive of the move to a multi-stakeholder board. However, this alone provides no assurance of remedy for the paralysis and dissention that characterized board governance in the past. We believe it is critical in reforming the governance system of the board to focus on the duties assigned to members of the WCB board of directors and the skills needed by persons serving in that capacity.

We support the inclusion in Bill 15 of a provision to give WCB board of directors an explicit and clear mandate, concerned solely with the good governance and financial stability of that agency. Moreover, we believe that the act should provide for the creation by the board of directors of its own rules of conduct and guidelines respecting conflict of interest. The objective of these rules and guidelines should be to clarify for all members that their fiduciary duty lies with the WCB, and that although they may be selected as representatives of a particular segment of society, they are not to act as de facto lobbyists for the interests of that segment. Our goal in recommending this is to see the WCB board of directors freed of the narrow and self-interested partisanship that played so large a role in its dysfunctionality.

Similarly, we support the inclusion of a clear statement of the specific authority of the board of directors, which in our opinion should be limited to the establishment of operational policy, policy interpretation of the Workers' Compensation Act, direction of senior officers, and the hiring and firing of the WCB chief executive officer.

More importantly, we believe that members of the WCB board of directors must be selected on the basis of merit and with a view to constructing a board having expertise suited to the operational needs of the WCB. Collectively, the board of directors should possess experience and knowledge in areas relevant to the effective and efficient operation of the board as a loss-insurance system.

Specifically, we believe this to include expertise in the following areas: disability, health and life insurance; financial and actuarial science; customer service; occupational accident prevention; information systems technology and management; labour market economics; and health care administration.

We also believe there to be merit in having board positions occupied by one or two representatives who are chief executive officers of successfully operating workers' compensation systems in other Canadian jurisdictions or of a large private sector disability or health insurance provider.

On a final note concerning governance, the board of directors should not be composed with a view to balancing the representation of political or economic stakeholders. Should this happen, the board of directors will once again primarily be a forum for fractious lobbies. To the extent that the government considers there to be a need for stakeholder representation as such, the employer and labour representatives should occupy minority positions. In short, neither political affiliation nor representation should be dominant factors in the appointment of directors.

I will move now to the subject of financial accountability.

We strongly support the inclusion in the Workers' Compensation Act of the proposed purpose clause which speaks to the importance of maintaining the financial integrity of the system. However, if this is to be more than merely symbolic, it will be necessary for the government to define in legislation the financial parameters which constitute financial integrity.

Specifically, we believe the act must eventually stipulate the empirical financial parameters that the WCB should strive to achieve and maintain. For example, federal and provincial insurance legislation governing private insurers often stipulates specific financial conditions and ratios—such as reserve levels, degree of full funding and constraints on investment policy—which must be maintained. There is no apparent reason why similar legislation should not govern the financial management of the WCB.

Similarly, we believe there to be merit in giving consideration to legislative limits to the level of operating deficit the WCB may incur in any fiscal period. This is conceptually no different from the discipline imposed by provincial legislation on municipal governments and school boards.

With respect to the value-for-money audits, we strongly support legislation to require such auditing on an annual basis. Moreover, we believe it is essential that this extend to all organizations and agencies which are funded by the board.

It is not, however, sufficient in doing such auditing to simply look at issues of efficiency and utilization of resources. It is essential that the scope of evaluation be sufficient to assess the extent to which WCB policies and programs are effective in achieving their goals. This should extend particularly to the accident prevention policies and programs of the board and the accident prevention associations funded by the WCB.

Accordingly, it is our recommendation that in addition to value-for-money auditing, the act be amended to require periodic external evaluation of policy and program impact and cost-effectiveness.

We congratulate the Minister of Labour and her government for taking this important next step to correct the many problems plaguing the WCB system. Recognizing that future changes are required, we wish to close by highlighting those issues we believe must be addressed as part of system reform, either within the context of Bill 15 or thereafter. However, in the interests of time, I leave these issues for your reading and due consideration.

We appreciate having this opportunity to present our views to you and the committee and we would be pleased to address any questions you may have.

The Chair: I'm afraid we've used up the full 15 minutes, but we appreciate your leaving us the other points there. I can assure you they'll be considered prior to the clause-by-clause debate. Thank you very much for taking the time to come and address us today.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES, ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next group up is the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Ontario. Good afternoon. I wonder if you would be kind enough to introduce yourselves to the committee and to Hansard.

Mr Ralph Carnavale: My name is Ralph Carnavale and I'm the workers' compensation specialist for CUPE in Ontario. To my right is Mr Bill Harford, who is the chair of the workers' compensation committee for CUPE in Ontario, and to my left is Ms Yvonne Carr, who's president of Local 1750, who are the employees of the Workers' Compensation Board for Ontario.

First of all, let me say that we welcome the opportunity to address this committee today. The Minister of Labour sought input on several fundamental changes to the Workers' Compensation Act during August 1995. Although given a short time frame, we submitted a response to those and anticipated full consultation and full participation. It's therefore with great disappointment that we're here today, appearing that it is debating a bill which in our view is completely unnecessary and a bureaucratic disaster.

We wish to address the following proposed areas of change: offences and penalties; financial viability; overpayment; and the Workers' Compensation Board employees. We must point out that we do not want this interpreted as support for the other sections of the bill, but rather it's the sheer irresponsibility of those particular sections that is difficult to accept.

Under offences and penalties, we are going to turn Workers' Compensation Board employees into compensation cops or, at best, collection agents. These new responsibilities are to be introduced without regard to the number of changes currently imposed on board staff as a result of both Bill 165 and the new appeal structure, just to name two.

It will now force workers, unions, advocates and employers to purchase expensive liability insurance as protection against civil actions. And let us say to you on the record today that the Canadian Union of Public Employees will in every effort recommend to every one of its members that should they be denied workers' compensation, they should seek out legal redress in the courts for all injuries not being paid for by the Workers' Compensation Board. It is our opinion that once having been denied workers' compensation, every employee in this province has the legal right to civil recourse, and it will be our position to recommend to our members such action. If the employers in the province feel they are going to save money, let us assure you that the litigation in this province will do anything but save them money.

We ask you what is meant by "material change." What is the purpose of increased fines and/or imprisonment when currently some 55,000 employers owe approximately $400 million in unpaid fines and assessments? How do you collect that money? I've heard the business community say, "Give them amnesty"—this from an organization or groups of organizations that say they want financial accountability. So let's give up $400 million, let's take $400 million a year out of the investment fund because the general fund isn't making enough, let's not have employers pay their share. And this is financial accountability?

We've heard comments about NEER, experience rating and SIEF. The bill does not address the problem of companies that walk away from past compensation debts simply by changing their names and continuing to operate under a new company, without any penalty for experience. Bill 15 does nothing to address this serious loss of revenues. Simply by changing the name of a company, not even their address, there is no review of their experience under past names, past history, past experience. But we hear the business community saying, "Experience rating is working." Some 22,000 companies are not registered, but "The system is working."

We further submit that if fraud exists, then the compensation board simply needs to proceed under the Criminal Code. The board policy on fraud, which we have attached at appendix I to our brief, properly addresses these situations. We fail to see the need for further duplication of authorities created by this bill.

Under the financial liability, it is our submission that in 1994 the board paid out $280 million more in unplanned rebates to employers than it imposed as penalties. This payout was an increase of $64 million more than that of 1993. The average rate of assessment for employers has been decreasing since 1991, and the 1995 average rate is that of the 1988 levels. In addition, when the impact of the experience rating off-balance is taken into account, the real average declined even more. It is now approximately $2.70 per $100 of payroll, compared to more than $3.10 per $100 of payroll in the early 1990s. That is a decrease, not an increase.

Although average assessments for employers are continuing to decline, the board showed an operating surplus of $130 million in 1994. This was the first surplus in 14 years.

It is the province's employers who did not wish full funding. It is this province's employers who said they would rather have the money which would go into full funding to be used for job creation and investment. If this government is true about its fiscal accountability and financial accountability, then simply increase the funding to 100%. That will give you full funding, that will eliminate your unfunded liability, that will make the employers pay their true share; not 37%, not 31%, but 100%.

In the fall of 1995, the Minister of Labour hinted at a 5% reduction in assessment. The business community here today has said to you they applaud it. If the board is in financial crisis, why would the government incur what has been estimated as an additional $120 million per year in loss of revenue by allowing a 5% assessment reduction, added to the unfunded liability?

The compensation board is currently removing $400 million annually from the investment fund. The absence of any repayment system in this bill, at the very least, is troublesome to us. There has been no mechanism introduced anywhere for that $400 million a year to be paid back into the investment fund. Where are the moneys coming from and how does this reduce the unfunded liability?

It appears to CUPE that this bill will encourage companies to join the underground economy or force them to close shop in the province.

Under overpayments, the current policy provides a thorough method of recovery. It incorporates recovery from future payments to injured workers and employers. Civil action for recovery is also included. The current policy is in line with any other government agency or civil law system.

We urge you to review the submissions and appreciate the submissions from the front-line workers, the employees of the WCB. We have attached their royal commission submission and hope that you take the opportunity to review it.

In conclusion, it is our submission that this bill is unnecessary at this time. The government had, and in fact still has, the opportunity to learn from the royal commission. Allow them to report. If that's unacceptable, release the report of the royal commission for public debate. Don't keep it in a library. Release it to the public. Let the public decide what the royal commission has said so far.

In summary, this bill will not do what the government intended it to do. It's going to criminalize the Workers' Compensation Act. It will create a greater level of distrust and fear among all the stakeholders. It will chase away business from Ontario. It will not reduce the board's unfunded liability. It will not reduce fraud. It will not reduce premiums or cost.

We urge this committee to withdraw Bill 15 and hold full and public hearings.

We wish to leave you with one final comment. We would like you to consider the vision statement of the Workers' Compensation Board: To be a Workers' Compensation Board valued and respected by workers, employers and the people of Ontario. We urge this committee to meet that vision.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Carnavale. First questioning this time, government members.

Mr Carroll: Did I hear you right, that you suggest, if we want to cover the unfunded liability, we look at 100% funding by employers?

Mr Carnavale: The funding ratio currently is 37.8%. We have suggested and the labour movement has suggested for the last 10 years that it be fully funded, yes.

Mr Carroll: We currently in the province of Ontario have the second-highest assessment rates of all the provinces in the country and you're recommending that we triple that already excessive rate to cover the unfunded liability?

Mr Carnavale: Let me ask you which rate you're talking about—the $3.10 rate or the $2.70 rate?

Mr Carroll: I'm talking about the rate that covers 37%, according to you.

Mr Carnavale: We're suggesting to you that all of the employers pay their ratio.

Mr Carroll: So you're recommending we triple the rate, which is already one of the highest in the country?

Mr Carnavale: We didn't say "triple," no. We're recommending that the plan be funded, simply as you would with any insurance plan, as you would with any long-term disability plan, as you would with any sick leave plan, as you would with any other type of coverage that you would have for income protection.

Why would it be any different for the WCB to be funded than it would be when you buy sickness and accident benefits, or you would when you buy from London Life? Why should the premiums be any different, why should the funding be any different?

Mr Carroll: Okay. Second issue: You say that CUPE believes that this bill will encourage companies to join the underground economy and close up shop. Would you like to elaborate on that a little bit?

Mr Carnavale: Simply put, if you continue to go with this bill, you're going to criminalize the bill. You're going to say to people—and we don't understand what material change is. The government has introduced a concept of material change. We don't know if that means that every time an injured worker becomes pregnant, that's a material change. If they declare bankruptcy, that's a material change. If they change their address, that's a material change. We don't know what that means, but what it will do is have all the companies that are worried about or scared about how they report, when they report or whether or not they should report, they simply won't do it and will hide, as the 22,000 are now.

Mr Carroll: So you believe that will cause companies to close up shop?

Mr Carnavale: Yes, we do. We believe that they're going to go away from the concept of reporting. Why would they?

Mr Duncan: Two aspects of your presentation struck me. Number one, you referenced the funding ratio in 1994 versus 1985 and you indicated that the funding ratio had increased. There has been quite a body of work done on what the so-called appropriate funding ratio is. I wonder if CUPE has had an opportunity to review that issue and over what period of time you would see us moving to that zero figure.

Mr Carnavale: We think that the projections that the original—although we didn't fully support, as a labour movement, the financial improvement package that was submitted by the board, it was the labour members of the board of directors who put a motion at the last board meeting to have the financial improvement plan passed. In fact it was the labour community on the board of directors who voted against it. We supported that package, and we still do, looking at 2014 as being the zero, the year 2014.

Mr Duncan: Okay. Then, if I can, just one other question. At one point in your presentation you referenced the $130-million surplus in 1994, but in another part you made reference to the $400-million subsidy from the investment fund and you also expressed your concern about no plan for repayment robbing that fund, if you will, to make up the operating deficit. Do you have any thoughts along the idea of how you would set up a repayment plan?

Mr Carnavale: I think the repayment plan is part of the overall financial package that has to be reviewed. I think that if the ratio or the $3.10—we actually reduced to $2.70 per $100, and if you go back to a stable $3.10, which apparently is what they want to go back to, certainly a designation of a portion of that $3.10 should be made towards reinvesting or putting back into the investment fund. Remember, we're not just talking about the $400 million. It's all of the interest and all of the advantage that that $400 million annually would have garnered that's been missed as well.

Ms Martel: I'm interested in your comments about the financial improvement package that was put forward at the board of directors, clearly to try and bring into line the unfunded liability issue by the year 2014. I wonder if you can just comment again as to who in fact was responsible for bringing that forward and who voted against it.

Mr Carnavale: The labour side of the board of directors, with a lot of review and a lot of discussion, brought forward the motion that the funding package recommended by the staff of the board be approved. It was the employer members of the board of directors who voted against it, and that's a matter of record.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Carnavale, and your associates, for coming in to see us this afternoon and for leaving us with your presentation.

ONTARIO NETWORK OF INJURED WORKERS

The Chair: Our next group up is the Ontario Network of Injured Workers. Good afternoon, gentlemen. I wonder if I could have you introduce yourselves to the committee and Hansard.

Mr Karl Crevar: Certainly. My name is Karl Crevar. I am the president of the Ontario Network of Injured Workers. On my left is Mr Phil Biggin, who is the executive vice-president of our organization.

I have to apologize, first of all. I do not have written submissions, so I hope you all have your tape recorders so it can be recorded what we're going to be talking about.

I'm going to be talking from a little bit different angle, because the discussions that have been going around—I have not followed all of them—but we are the ones who are going to be impacted, the injured workers in this province and workers in this province, by any changes that are being implemented, and I think that's one of the most basic things that has been forgotten. I have not heard that since I've been here today. All I've heard is the financial responsibility and all the financial aspects of it.

Let me say that I'm clearly disappointed and angry at the manner in which these hearings were set up. Our organization is represented in 34 communities across this province, in the range of 50,000 or more injured workers, largely the unorganized.

When we got the word, when it came down that this committee was meeting, I tried to confirm to get a position here on behalf of injured workers in this province on the first day of hearings. I was informed the Thursday previous of the hearings that were going on.

We have participated in the past on Bill 162, we participated on Bill 165, and all our groups want to be able to participate and express our concern over the changes and the impact that it's going to have on workers and their families across this province.

With that, I want to start off just by giving committee members—maybe they're not familiar with the history of what workers' compensation is all about in this province. It was introduced in 1915 by Judge Meredith and that was after a long discussion, a long process between labour and management on how we can address and get away from civil litigations to be able to fairly compensate workers injured in the workplace.

There have been four royal commissions in this province. The latest one, which is the one the government of the day decided that they were going to do without, they weren't going to take the reports—and I can assure all members here, if you're not familiar, that many injured workers addressed the last royal commission. There were very many submissions. Many, many thousands of injured workers submitted what was wrong with the system, how to correct it, yet we find ourselves in the process of dealing with Bill 15 again.

I can tell you on behalf of injured workers, we will not be part of justifying the government's initiative just to say that they had consultation in this province to deal with workers' compensation in this province.

The three royal commissions that were established, very interestingly, the first one was in 1931. The commissioner of that royal commission was the Honourable William Edward Middleton, Justice of Appeal of the Supreme Court of Canada. Following that royal commission, the basis for that was to address benefit levels. There was an increase in benefit levels, and that was on the recommendation of Justice Middleton.

In 1949 the next royal commission that was set up was headed by the Honourable Wilfrid Daniel Roach, Justice of the Appeal of the Supreme Court of Ontario, and I just want to take an excerpt of his findings in his report:

"This act should be considered for what it is and was originally intended to be, namely, a scheme by which compensation is provided in respect of injuries to workers in industry. It is not a system for dispensing charity. It is not unemployment insurance. It is not social legislation for the purpose of elevating the standard of one group in society at the expense of another."

At that time, benefits again were raised.

Sixteen years later in 1966, the third royal commission, the Honourable George Argo McGillivray, Justice of Appeal of the Supreme Court of Ontario, was appointed commissioner. His report was filed September 15, 1967. Regarding workers' compensation, the report advised:

"For the working poor, the balance between earning just enough to get along and having to do without certain basic necessities is easily upset. Income interruption or income reduction, even for a short period, spells disaster for anyone whose budgeting is done on a week-to-week or even day-to-day basis. The reduction of earnings which takes place during the period when a low-income worker is forced by accident or injury to rely on work-mans' compensation benefits inevitably causes serious problems."

Each royal commission—the poverty report, the McRuer commission and the task force report—all brought attention of the government and the public to the low benefits and poor treatment of injured workers. What are we dealing with in Bill 15? Again, the process and the discussion that the Ministry of Labour had announced earlier this year in reforming WCB—reduction in benefits to workers, the introduction of the three-day waiting period with no top-up—in my view invades the privacy of citizens of this province. When you buy insurance or whether you have a mortgage on your home and the bank rate says it has to go up, guess what? You pay the increase. That's the price of doing business, whether it's workers' compensation, whether it's purchasing a home or whether it's purchasing car insurance. When the car insurance industry says, "We have to raise your rates by 20%," you either take coverage or you take the chance of driving without insurance, at which time if you ever, God help you, get into an accident, you will pay dearly. There's no negotiations for lowering the rates of benefits.

I want to leave some time for questions if you do have them, so I'm not going to get too extensive, but I do want to make a last-minute comment in here. I would suggest to the members here, this was a submission made by June Howard. It's a history on the worker's compensation in Ontario. It was submitted to the hearings committees on Bill 165. Take the time to research it and see what's in these documents as to what the worker's compensation is all about.

It said: "The majority of Ontario employers are just and fair," and that is true; we believe that very strongly. "They pay their premiums and trust that the WCB will look after their accident victims as humanely as possible. But a vocal minority consider workers to be animated disposable machines. You work them as hard as you can, fix them if it's possible to return them to productivity, and dispose of them as cheaply as possible if they no longer have value in your workplace, all in the name of profit and greed.

"This vocal minority is the voice heard today asking for a reduction in WCB benefits, that want back and other soft-tissue injuries removed from compensation and demand workers pay premiums for their compensation. They care little about what happens to the victims of their accidents."

These were words that were heard back in 1910. We hear those same words today, and those vocal words by a few minority in this province are reaping millions of dollars. I ask you seriously: You've heard some of the submissions before. If you want to look at problems, look at the revenue leakage which amounts to almost $2 billion in the last four years. This is money taken out of the system to pay for administrative costs. Also, you've heard before on the experience rating, on the off balances. In today's dollars, in 1994 dollars, the assets of the workers' compensation would be sitting at $10 billion and we wouldn't be sitting here today talking about workers' compensation reform or addressing the issue of unfunded liability.

We have seen the unfunded liability only as a scheme and a way to not only harass, but to scare the hell out of the public in this province, when we know in fact where the real problems are. I urge you, look at the facts. They're in your annual reports. Do not proceed with this legislation. You will be destroying a system; you will be destroying a society. Workers' compensation is not a charity, it's a right. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Crevar. The first questioner in this round will be from the Liberal Party.

Mr Duncan: As you know, Minister Jackson will be bringing forward the most substantive amendments to the Workers' Compensation Act. I believe they're expected next spring. The minister has indicated on a number of occasions that they are undergoing extensive consultation. Have you or your group been asked to consult on the changes that Minister Jackson is contemplating?

Mr Crevar: It's odd that you should ask that, because as I indicated in my opening remarks, my concern is over the consultation about changes that affect us, the workers. It's going to reduce benefits; it's going to force people to go on to social assistance and to other income supplement agencies. We had just very recently been contacted by the minister to discuss, and informed that, yes, there will be consultations going on. We were well aware—and hoped—that it would be the smart thing for this government to do, to have full consultation on any changes to workers' compensation which the minister has been directed to be completed by April 1996.

The concerns I raise again with the Chair in terms of the process, as I indicated during Bill 165: How can we tell you in 15-20 minutes the devastating impacts that the changes will have when you don't have input from the people it will directly affect? And I'm not talking about having extra money; I'm talking about having an income in order to survive.

So it's been limited. We've been made aware that the minister is going to have consultation, in answer to your question.

Mr Duncan: Were you invited to consult at all on Bill 15 before it was introduced in the House?

Mr Crevar: The previous speaker said it entirely. We were notified by mail to have written submissions, and the time element was very, very limited in order to have effective input into that. There was no consultation requested in that respect, open consultation, as to the impact of the changes.

Mr Christopherson: My question would be on the government's proposed action regarding the 5% cut. I'm going to ask some of these questions now because I never know when we're going to get public input any more with this government, so I'm going to grab it while I can. Given your thinking and position on the funding of WCB, the unfunded liability and all those things in relationship to the priority of the board, which is to make sure that workers are covered, what are your thoughts on a proposed 5% cut to disabled workers at the same time the government proposes reducing the assessment rate by a further 5%? Can you see any benefit at all to the system or to workers by carrying out those two positions?

Mr Crevar: What we're seeing today—and I ask the committee to go and look at the Minna-Majesky report, the task force report. This came out about four years ago, I believe it was. When you look at that indication of the percentage of injured workers not returning to work on that report and look and see what's applied today and the benefits that those injured workers—and I'm talking about 80% at the first review under Bill 162; 80% of injured workers have not returned to meaningful employment, so they are receiving some sort of benefits. Thousands, and a good percentage of them, because they're limited in the entitlements, have had to resort to seeking social assistance, other income supplements.

I'm sure you've heard the stories of what it implies and the tragedies that have ensued as a result: the family breakup, the marriage breakup, suicides. Those are realities. Then to suggest another reduction of 5% in benefit levels, that will be devastating. Those injured workers who have the limited incomes now or benefits that they receive from WCB will have to go on to other income supplements.

Where do they turn? They will have to turn to social assistance, and lo and behold, we've already had a reduction in those benefits. It will be devastating. It will cost, because the taxpayers of this province will be paying for that.

The Chair: We've reached the allotted time. Thank you, Mr Crevar, for making your presentations. I certainly encourage you to continue to provide submissions.

ONTARIO RESTAURANT ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Ontario Restaurant Association.

Mr Paul Oliver: Good afternoon. My name is Paul Oliver and I am president of the Ontario Restaurant Association. The ORA welcomes the opportunity to present our views on Bill 15, An Act to amend the Workers' Compensation Act and the Occupational Health and Safety Act.

The ORA and the more than 15,000 employers which comprise the restaurant and foodservice industry are deeply committed to reforming the WCB system. The ORA strongly supports the principles of the existing no-fault compensation program which "provides a fair level of compensation to workers and protection from legal proceedings for employers." The ORA believes that reforming the WCB system, however, must be a priority of this government. The competitiveness of Ontario and the competitiveness of Ontario's restaurant and foodservice industry is directly influenced by the ability and the success of the government in reforming the existing compensation system.

We believe the Ontario WCB system is in crisis. It is broken both fiscally and structurally. Operating with a staggering $11.4 billion in underfunded liability is not a sustainable prospect. Without addressing the long-term stability of the system, the future viability of the WCB system is in jeopardy, as is the ability to pay benefits to injured workers both today and in the future.

We support the initiatives of the government of Ontario to undertake structural reform by introducing Bill 15. However, we must emphasize that we see this as only the first step towards stabilizing the system. The real fundamental reform, which is an even more major step, must follow quickly.

The establishment of a new board of directors is a key element to facilitating change and reforming the WCB system. The foodservices industry strongly supports the announcement that the WCB governing structure will move away from a bipartite structure and towards a multi-stakeholder approach. We believe this is a positive step and one which is critical to undertaking meaningful reform of the system. We feel that the bipartite model has not effectively served the people of Ontario, nor enabled the WCB system to be operated in a prudent or responsible manner. The bipartite model has led to confrontation and paralysis in decision-making, and has been a contributing factor in the staggering underfunded liability.

The ORA has had experience within the bipartite governing model through our direct participation at the WCB's sister bipartite organization, the Workplace Health and Safety Agency. At the WHSA board, the ORA was represented on both the board of directors and the bipartite small business advisory committee. I myself co-chaired the agency's bipartite small business advisory committee and know all too well from firsthand experience how inappropriate the bipartite structure is to developing good and workable public policy.

From the experiences we faced at the Workplace Health and Safety Agency, it is clear to us that the bipartite model of governing is not an effective model to be used at the policy development and policy implementation levels. Bipartitism has worked effectively in many workplaces in Ontario. However, at the policy development and administrative levels we believe it has failed, and it has failed to the point of jeopardizing the WCB system.

We believe the departure away from a bipartite governing model is important because this change in governance is critical to moving the WCB away from being an adjunct to the social welfare net and instead restoring it to its original objective, that being that "in exchange for giving up the right to sue an employer, an employee can expect to receive fair," and equitable, "compensation." This change is critical to the WCB returning to a workplace accident insurance organization, and as a result, a corporate model of governance is the only vehicle for this transition.

By moving to a multi-stakeholder board, the Ontario Restaurant Association recognizes that this means that the business community is giving up its ability to have direct representatives who speak for their interests at the board of directors. However, we believe that all stakeholders will be far better served when board members place the interests of the system's long-term viability above their individual respective interests.

The Ontario Restaurant Association also supports the inclusion of a clear policy direction role for the government through a revised memorandum of understanding.

We support the requirement for the annual five-year strategic plan, an annual statement of priorities and an annual statement of the board of directors' investment policies and objectives. The enhanced role made for the government by Bill 15 makes it clear that the WCB crown corporation is an element of the provincial government which must serve the public interest as set forth by the government of Ontario.

We also support the establishment of a new requirement that each director of the board must act in a clearly defined fiscal and accountable manner which helps to restore the confidence in the leadership and direction of the WCB. This provision will help make the directors focus their responsibilities more directly and correctly on the financial management problems at the WCB.

The ORA welcomes the amendments to the purpose clause as outlined in Bill 15. This amendment will help focus the activities of the board of directors on securing and protecting the long-term fiscal viability of the system. We strongly support the six elements of the purpose clause in the order in which they are outlined in the legislation.

The ORA also welcomes the two major additional objectives outlined in the purpose clause, which expand the responsibilities of the WCB to include provisions "to prevent or reduce the occurrence of injuries and occupational disease at work" and "to promote health and safety in workplaces." We believe that the WCB can play an important role in focusing the efforts of workplaces on the prevention of accidents and the implementation of health and safety in workplaces. In this regard, we support the return of this responsibility to the WCB.

We must, however, raise a serious issue of concern to the hospitality industry at this point, and that is the funding of health and safety within our sector. We are concerned that the current funding allocations do not warrant enough resources to enhance health and safety training within the foodservices, accommodation and hospitality industries. This is not because our industry's unwilling to contribute financial resources; it's just the opposite.

We have previously raised this issue on a number of occasions, but unfortunately it fell on deaf ears with the previous government. We therefore raise the issue again.

We believe that it is an important issue which must be addressed and is appropriate at this time, as the committee is now reviewing the Workers' Compensation Act as well as the Occupational Health and Safety Act.

On an annual basis, as part of WCB rate group assessments, hospitality employers contribute approximately $2.5 million towards health and safety training and accident prevention. Unfortunately, once these financial resources are allocated to individual sectors, our industry receives less than $1 million, or 40% of what we actually pay.

We believe that this financial allocation, or what we would consider a misallocation, is unfair and that if an industry is contributing financial resources towards accident prevention in their sector, then these resources should be rightfully allocated to the contributing sector.

We recognize that this issue is not directly impacted by Bill 15. However, we strongly urge the committee to raise this with the Ministry of Labour, as it is part of the WCB's new fiscal accountability.

Foodservice operators share a common business desire to reduce fraud by identifying areas of potential revenue loss and overpayment and implementing preventive measures to eliminate these concerns. We are pleased that this approach is now a part of the business process of the WCB. These actions will ensure that all employers within the foodservice industry pay their fair share and, most importantly, are treated equally and equitably.

While supportive of the amendments contained in Bill 15, the Ontario Restaurant Association believes that it is only the first tentative step towards more substantive and fundamental reform of the WCB system which is critically needed.

We applaud the decision of the government to establish a minister responsible for WCB. Minister Cam Jackson's review in many ways will be more substantial and meaningful than Bill 15. However, we recognize that the amendments contained in Bill 15 are important to clearing the path for Minister Jackson's review.

While not directly impacting Bill 15, we felt it was important to highlight some of the additional reforms to the WCB system which we believe are critical to ensuring the long-term viability and sustainability of the compensation system. Some of the issues of concern to the foodservice industry include:

1. Ensuring that there are no exceptions or exemptions to the application of the Friedland indexing formula.

2. Foodservice operators in Ontario have earned at least a 5% reduction in assessment as a reward for their successful efforts at reducing accidents over the past decade.

These reductions are critical to the competitiveness of Ontario's restaurants, especially when recognizing Ontario has the second-highest WCB assessments of anywhere in Canada for the restaurant industry. At $2.75 per $100 of payroll, Ontario's assessment rate for restaurants is substantially above any other provincial jurisdiction except for one. Other jurisdictions, such as New Brunswick, are priced at $1.04, Alberta at $1.42 and British Columbia at $1.07.

This inequity in assessment rates across Canada places Ontario at a significant disadvantage when competing for head office jobs, such as marketing, administrative jobs and the many other portable jobs within the foodservices industry. To ensure that Ontario does not lose existing jobs or future job creation to other jurisdictions, these discrepancies in WCB rates must be corrected.

3. We also believe that the performance of new claims should be driven by the price of the WCB system. We believe that it is imperative that an improved new claims performance should result in a direct reduction in WCB assessments.

4. We also believe that modifications to the benefit levels should apply to both new and old claims.

5. We believe that the experience rating program of the WCB needs to be further supported and enhanced. As the foodservice industry is comprised of employers of all sizes, the experience rating program is an issue of great concern and interest. We believe that experience rating needs to be meaningful to all employers regardless of size. To do this, a variety of choices and applications must be available.

We also do not believe that the current experience rating off-balance should be seen as a major contributor to the WCB's reported cash flow problems. The current experience rating off-balance is a direct result of the dramatic reductions in new claims and should be viewed as a positive initiative, not as a negative consequence.

In conclusion, once again, the Ontario Restaurant Association supports Bill 15, as we see it as an essential component to the successful future economic and administrative changes within the WCB system. From the perspective of the foodservice industry, we believe that these changes are vital to improving and enhancing the economic environment in Ontario. We do, however, urge the government to continue to remain very focused on the more important and pressing long-term reform issues facing the WCB system.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Oliver. We've got about two and a half minutes remaining. Questioning will commence with the third party.

Ms Martel: Most of the employer groups that have been here this afternoon have made a comment in one way, shape or form about how the bipartite model had led to confrontation, paralysis in decision-making and any other number of characterizations. I guess the reason I want to focus on this is because I would like some concrete examples, if you can provide them, not with respect to your experience at the health and safety agency but with respect to what went on at the WCB, because I know that at the point where both the business and the labour reps were fired by this minister, we had a situation where the board, for the first time, had an operating surplus. It wasn't a lot, but it was for the first time. We had for the first time as well a reduction in the unfunded liability, and we also had worker reps, for example, who had moved to accept a financial improvement package which would have reduced the unfunded liability by the year 2014, as this government is wanting to do in this bill. So I am really curious as to what experiences, what issues etc people can point to, as the minister has pointed to in her own statements, that in fact the reason she had to fire everyone was because of the paralysis that went on.

Mr Oliver: Well, you mentioned the FIP package, the financial improvement package. I would submit that the length of time that it sits on the table at the board, not looking at meaningful issues, not being able to break up the package, not looking at the different components of it, probably is an indication of a system that's not working. In a normal corporation or an insurance company or in a board that's effectively working, you'd be able to move through those policy initiatives, make the decisions fairly quickly.

How do you resolve the decisions where there is deadlock at the board, where there are two fundamental different approaches? The FIP package is an example of that. Getting beyond what is just written on the paper and getting into the true financial accountability of that package was something that needed to be done and it was never able to be done.

Ms Martel: I would have assumed, though, that even for the labour representatives to agree to move forward on FIP, they would have had to make some compromises too. I suspect in that package there are some things that, as worker reps, they would have found pretty untenable. I guess I don't understand why—

Mr Oliver: You're mentioning about compromises and negotiations, and quite frankly I don't buy into the idea that good public policy is always negotiated. If you're basing it on facts and you're basing it on information and you're bringing technical expertise to the table, there shouldn't have to be negotiation. You shouldn't have to be negotiating what is good public policy. You'd just be able to identify it and move on with it.

Ms Martel: I guess that's if you're all coming from a similar point of view. You know, it's easy if everyone is representing either a labour perspective or an employer perspective. Then you don't have to negotiate. We're talking about workplace parties dealing with a system that was in place (a) to protect workers who got hurt and (b) to make sure that employers didn't have to get sued.

Mr Oliver: But I think in the multi-stakeholder approach you would not have to have this too polarized approach. You would have professionals on there, you'd have representatives from the accounting and financial communities, and they would be bringing forward the professional approach and looking at issues from more than just two perspectives, because there are more than just two perspectives.

Ms Martel: But if I listen to you talk about professionals and people having the skills etc, I have to assume then that the people who were appointed, either by the business community or by the labour community, weren't in fact that. That's the only impression I am left with as I hear you talk about people's qualifications and skills. But surely your business colleagues, at least from your point of view, who were there representing business interests were qualified to be there.

Mr Oliver: But they were there representing business interests or labour interests, and what I'm suggesting is, developing public policy, there may be more perspectives than just business and labour.

Ms Martel: They had no skills with respect to accounting, human resource management, fiscal accountability etc?

Mr Oliver: If you want someone with fiscal and accountability background, why don't you go to the financial community and bring that person forward? That's what you would do under a multi-stakeholder approach.

Ms Martel: I would have assumed that people in the business community would have brought that perspective as well.

Mr Oliver: And I would have assumed that they would have done it from organized labour, but they didn't.

The Chair: We've surpassed our 15 minutes slightly there. Thank you, Mr Oliver, our appreciation for taking the time to come and make your submissions today.

UNITED TRANSPORTATION UNION

The Chair: Our next group up is the United Transportation Union. Good afternoon, gentlemen.

Mr Dennis Schweitzer: Good afternoon.

The Chair: I wonder if I could get you to introduce yourselves to the committee and for Hansard.

Mr Schweitzer: My name is Dennis Schweitzer. I'm provincial chairperson for the United Transportation Union. With me is Paul West. He is the vice-chairperson of the Ontario legislative board. Our main responsibility in representing bus and rail workers in the province of Ontario is in dealing with workers' compensation.

I have provided you with a lengthy submission, which I do not intend to read, and I would like to take a cue from the last question and answer period with Ms Martel and Mr Oliver.

I was a former vice-chair, from labour, of the board of directors of the Ontario Workers' Compensation Board, and I would like to put it on record clearly that both the business and labour representatives on the board of directors took their responsibilities very seriously, that the board was made up of people who had expertise, unlike what Mr Oliver seems to suggest. That board of directors, both while I was there and after I left and prior to the minister's dismissal of that board, was making sufficient progress for us to have optimism in the future of the Ontario Workers' Compensation Board.

When the board in 1994 had an operating surplus of $130 million, when the board accepted a package on to the table from its administration for financial improvements that would not have reduced, if my recollection is correct, the unfunded liability by 2014 but eliminated the unfunded liability by 2014, I would suggest to you that there was a measure of irresponsibility, and that irresponsibility lies clearly on the employers' doorstep. The package that was put together did have pros and cons, both for the worker community and for the business community, no doubt. There were a lot of things that were hard to swallow for labour. Yet labour agreed that it was their financial and fiscal responsibility to promote the package.

Now, you have to bear in mind that the administration is made up of many different areas of expertise: the financial expertise, the client service expertise etc., etc. They brought a package to us while I was there and while in the interim, between my end of term, when I was an adviser to the CEO, Mr Copeland. It's somewhat ironic to me that the business community and the CEO would not support a package of administrative improvements that would have seen the end of the unfunded liability. I find it very difficult coming before you and listening to my predecessors talk in the manner in which they're talking about the people who served on that board. I for one, personally, and, I understand, John Martin, who's going to be here after me, resent the implication that we were less than what we should have been on that board of directors.

I would also suggest to you that this government has invented a crisis by saying that the board is out of control, that the unfunded liability is driving business out of the province, that workers are ripping off the system and making illegitimate claims. You have to consider that the WCB is unlike any other business in this province. It's not an insurance company. It's not a business like Eaton's or Simpson's. It's a business that deals with workers who get injured and workers who need assistance.

In 1994, there were 230 workplace deaths in Ontario. We need to improve that to the point where there are zero deaths. The Ontario WCB has recognized only one out of 17 occupational disease victims in this province. Those are the things that are the crises in workers' compensation, as far as we are concerned.

We also believe that the worker community has been forthright with respect to the rate assessments. As far as I can recollect, the average rate has not increased beyond $3 since 1993, the last year that I had anything to do with rate-setting at the board.

We do suggest to you that there are as many as 20,000 employers in Ontario who should be registered and paying workers' compensation premiums but who aren't. I would suggest to you that many of them are in the Ontario hotel and restaurant business.

When I was at the board, one of the last things we did was move a motion forward to pursue employers who did not register. One of the things that was discussed and talked about around the board table was granting employers a short amnesty after a very vocal campaign to let them know what their obligations were and then, after that, it was our intention as a board to come down on them with all the force of the law to make them pay their assessments. Right now, we understand that there are over 55,000 employers in Ontario who owe the Ontario Workers' Compensation Board in excess of $400 million, either in unpaid assessments or in penalties.

I would like to end my submission with just one suggestion to you with respect to the unfunded liability. It has been purported to be the cause of the crisis in the Ontario workers' compensation system. To us, the unfunded liability is not a debt; it is merely a figure which represents the present cost of future payments owed to injured workers by their employers for their current claims.

I believe that we have to take into consideration that the WCB has an accident fund of over $6.8 billion. I'd have to ask the employers who are in this room: What do they want? Do they want a fully funded system? Do they want $50 billion in assets in the Workers' Compensation Board? I think the answer to that question is no.

There's a lot for you to read in the submission, and I think that if you take the time, you will see that we do have some legitimate points of view. We would like to answer any questions that we're able to.

The Chair: Thank you very much. The questioning this time will be starting with the government benches.

Mr Maves: A couple of things: The first one is with regard to the financial improvement plan that keeps getting bandied about. I understand there was a plan brought forward from, I think, Mr Copeland which had about 200 proposals. The labour representatives on the board brought forward a plan, kind of their own version, with significantly less proposals. That was the one which the employers disagreed with. Is that accurate?

Mr Schweitzer: In my recollection, it's not accurate. 1750

Mr Maves: There was only ever one—

Mr Schweitzer: My understanding is that the board of directors, of which I was a part from 1993 up until July 1994, directed the administration to find ways to financially improve the lot of the workers' compensation system. That, in and of itself, is a big job. The administration is made up of a number of different areas, and I believe what they were asked to do was to find ways of trimming costs, saving money and producing the overall net result of a reduction in the target area of approximately $400 million.

I believe, if I'm not mistaken, that the target of $400 million had something to do with the amount of money that was withdrawn each year for a period of three or four years from the accident fund to be used for operating revenues.

So the administration did what they were asked to do and came back with a package. I don't know how many recommendations there were. It might be 200, it might be 250, it doesn't matter, but it was my understanding that after I left the board it was to be brought to the new board as constituted by the previous government, which would have been March of this year. When it was brought to the board, it was defeated.

Mr Maves: But there was only ever one group of proposals brought to the board? That was never changed?

Mr Schweitzer: As far as I'm aware.

Mr Maves: I'll check my sources then.

This bill goes after employers, in a sense, those 20,000 employers we were talking about, with stiffer penalties for the failure to register. Do you agree with that aspect of Bill 15?

Mr Schweitzer: My suggestion to the writers of the bill would have been very simple. All they had to do was legislate that all workplaces and all employers should be covered for workers' compensation in the province. The province of British Columbia has done it and Ontario fell far short with this bill.

Mr Hoy: I don't want to at all put into question the value or the contribution of employees and employers on the board prior to our discussion today. However, I would like to ask you, since you stated that you were on the board, do you think that the expanded board that's proposed under Bill 15 would improve the WCB?

Mr Schweitzer: Let me answer by suggesting to you that we have appeared before three governments and three standing committees on three bills. The first one that we appeared before was Bill 101, which was a Tory government. At that time, there was a multi-stakeholder board of directors in place. The multi-stakeholder board of directors is made up of people from, I guess, whom-ever the government wants to appoint. I don't believe we're going in the right direction.

I do believe that the business and labour people on the bipartite board were able to significantly improve workers' compensation in the province and I believe that bill 15 is going in absolutely the wrong direction. I believe that a bipartite board representative of the two major stakeholders, the workers and the employers, is the only way in which we can expect workers' compensation in Ontario to move forward. And we didn't fight, believe me.

Mr Hoy: You actually answered my second question there as well, so I'll defer.

Ms Martel: If I might, Mr Chair, I would like to read to you the minister's characterization of the bipartite board, which was as follows, and this is when she introduced the bill for second reading, "Unfortunately, the bipartite, labour-versus-management approach has paralysed constructive decision-making on very crucial administrative, policy and financial issues facing the board."

I have felt that that was a very unfair characterization of the board because I certainly believed that both sets of representatives, from labour and from management, came, were prepared to do an important job, took their roles seriously and were qualified to do that job. But you were a member on the board for some time, and I wonder if you can respond to that characterization and outline whether or not you think it's an unfair or a fair criticism.

Mr Schweitzer: I certainly think it's unfair, particularly because the minister was never near the board. The minister's relying on certain special-interest groups to come up with those statements. I find it kind of ironic that she would rely—she's certainly not relying on the labour groups for her input. She has to call into question the business community itself, because they were ably represented on the board. They had the Honourable Robert Stanbury, who took business's positions very seriously. I would say, for my part, he was certainly an honourable opponent. We didn't often or always agree, but in the end there was usually a solution for the problem and it was seldom, if ever, that we ended in a stalemate.

Ms Martel: If that was the case, then why do you think this particular government fired everyone and is now moving back to a multi-stakeholder position, a position we were once in under the last Tory government?

Mr Schweitzer: I guess they're listening to the wrong people. I think that there are those, out in the business community particularly, who think that expertise is somebody who runs a financial institution, runs a physiotherapy clinic, is a vice-president of a manufacturing company. What I believe is needed in a bipartite situation are people who are committed and able to put in the time to deal with the various complex problems that are involved in a workers' compensation system.

The thing with multi-stakeholder that really scares me is that what you're going to have is a group of people who don't have the time, aren't able to give the commitment, don't have the knowledge and, frankly, don't know what they're getting into. I don't think they will be a board that will perform. I don't know if that answers your question.

The Chair: With that we've reached our 15 minutes. We appreciate you allowing time for at least one round of questions. Thank you very much for coming this afternoon and making your presentation.

EMPLOYERS' COUNCIL ON WORKERS' COMPENSATION

The Chair: Our next group up is the Employers' Council on Workers' Compensation. Good afternoon, gentlemen. Just a reminder that we're limiting all the groups, in order to get all 73 deputations in, to 15 minutes, to be divided as you see fit between the presentation and question and answer. Introduce yourselves to the committee and to Hansard.

Mr Jim Yarrow: Thank you, Mr Chairman. My name is Jim Yarrow. I'm chairman of the Employers' Council on Workers' Compensation. With me at the front table today is John Neal, a consultant to the ECWC, as well as a member. I feel more confident and can talk much better for my part of it because I have him to answer the questions at the end, as he had a lot of the input, particularly nice sharp questions we had from over here. The other gentleman is Mr John Blogg, who is a member of our council and also from the mining association.

You have in front of you our presentation, some of which I will not be reading, most parts of which I will be in order to get it into the record.

The Employers' Council on Workers' Compensation appreciates the opportunity to present its members' views on Bill 15 and the need for further reforms next spring following Minister Jackson's review.

The ECWC, for those who might not know, is a non-partisan coalition of employer associations, employers and experts in the workers' compensation field, representing the interests of over 100,000 employers. Our members represent all sectors of the economy and include large and small business.

Since 1984, the ECWC has been active with the board, the WCAT and the Ontario workers' compensation system, working with those agencies to attempt to ensure that Ontario has an effective and sustainable workers' compensation program. A full list of our membership is attached to your copy of the presentation.

Before turning to Bill 15 and next spring's reforms, we would like to briefly review the last few years in order to set the stage for the debate on the current reforms.

As outlined in your copy below these comments, its members have been deeply involved in the reform of Ontario's workers' compensation system for many years. Copies of some of our presentations as well are available for the benefit of the committee.

What is clear from our hands-on experience with Ontario's workers' compensation system is that nobody is satisfied with the current state of affairs. The experiments with various forms of governance and benefits since 1985 have been ineffective. These reforms have left us with a bloated, all-but-bankrupt system. It often provides more than is needed, discourages proactive self-rehabilitation and still leaves some workers with less than that which is appropriate.

What Ontario needs for its workplace insurance program is protection of covered workplace participants from the real losses caused by workplace accidents; proactive behaviour by workplace participants to minimize the number of workplace accidents; and proactive behaviour by workplace participants to minimize the real losses caused by workplace accidents.

What Ontario does not need for its workplace insurance program is: provision of real gains from workplace accidents; protection of covered workplace participants from losses caused by lifestyle, retirement, loss of employment, aging, congenital disabilities, non-traumatic stress and non-workplace accidents and diseases.

In order to reform Ontario's workers' compensation system so that Ontario gets more of what it needs and less of what it does not need, the ECWC recommends: rename the WCB to something like the Workplace Insurance Company; replace entitlement to benefits with indemnity for real losses caused by workplace accidents; exclude indemnity for acts of God, war, insurrection, lifestyle, aging, retirement, loss of employment, congenital disabilities, stress and all other non-workplace events; and register all covered participants.

We also recommend increased accountability for the government, the administration, employers, workers and injured workers.

The government should be held accountable for: effective legislation that is affordable, sustainable, clear, avoids unrealistic expectations and outlines the responsibilities of the administration, employers, workers and injured workers; realistic pricing of all reforms and policy changes; and the appointment of the board of directors.

I'm taking each of these areas. The administration should be accountable for: the pricing of new claims and the planned funding of the system; staff as well as the board of directors must be financially responsible; courteous, timely, accurate administration which includes getting it right the first time, prompt decisions regarding when indemnity is required and when it ends, prompt collection of funds and payment of indemnity, and proactive communications with government, employers, workers and injured workers.

Employers should be accountable for: financing the system, based upon their own claims experience; registering covered participants; ensuring occupational health and safety; obtaining medical support at the time of accident; rehabilitation and reinstatement of injured workers; supporting the administration to make the system work.

Employees should be accountable for: safe work practices and healthy lifestyles.

Injured workers should be accountable for: healthy lifestyles; immediate reporting of workplace injuries; proactive self-rehabilitation; proactive participation in rehabilitation programs; proactive participation in modified work programs; and a timely return to work.

Having set the stage for the reform of Ontario's workers' compensation system, we will present our views on Bill 15 and the need for further reforms next spring, following Minister Jackson's review. The ECWC supports Bill 15 as it starts its journey towards more accountability.

We urge Minister Jackson to rename the system. We recommend replacement of entitlement with indemnity for real losses. Indemnity must be limited to indemnity for events directly related to workplace accidents. There must be provisions that lay out the responsibilities of government, administration, employers, workers and injured workers.

We support the structural changes outlined as follows in our presentation.

We recommend a focus on clarity and simplicity. By way of example, we note that the current registration rules can be complex. The complexity arises out of the fact that the WCB has its own rules for whether or not an individual is deemed to be an employee. There are no fewer than seven questionnaires used for this purpose. It would be far clearer if the board were able to adopt the rules used by Revenue Canada to determine the requirement for making CPP and UIC contributions. Use of Revenue Canada rules and reporting requirements would clarify and simplify an organization's responsibilities and enable prompt, cost-effective, courteous administration.

We also note the fact that there are no pricings for the savings expected from Bill 15. We acknowledge that many of the provisions of the bill are difficult to cost. Nevertheless, costings plus administrative targets such as a 10% reduction in appeals for 1996-97 and again in 1998 would provide the new board of directors and the system's stakeholders with a clear picture of what is expected from them.

On the need for further reform next spring, we reiterate the need to:

- (1) Rename the WCB. This will return the program to its original intent of providing no-fault employer-paid insurance for workplace accidents in exchange for the elimination of the right to action.

- (2) It will replace entitlement with indemnity for real losses. This will clarify that indemnities are limited and not part of the welfare safety net. Replacing entitlement with indemnity for real losses will require several things:

(a) Lower benefits to address overcompensation arising out of the tax-free status of payments and the impact of our progressive income tax system;

(b) Lower benefits to address reduced expenditures arising out of not going to work;

(c) Removal of supplements that fail to recognize sources of income such as retirement pensions;

(d) Removal of supplements that result in compensation based upon the higher of actual loss and average loss—for pre-1990 claims, lifetime pensions are based upon a chart of average disability ratings;

(e) Lower benefits in order to introduce financial incentives for proactive rehabilitation and return to work;

(f) Replacement of an open-ended system with one where rates of indemnity can be finalized.

(3) Include responsibilities, for covered workplace participants, for proactive: prevention of accidents; self-rehabilitation; participation in rehabilitation programs; return to work and reinstatement.

As outlined in the document, Workers' Compensation Reforms: Common Sense for a Change, these changes will have a significant impact upon the current system. By way of example—you don't have to be a mathematician to make this work—the combination of: a 5% cut in indemnity; a three fifths of a week waiting period; a 10% cut in overheads; reformed FELs and FEL supplements plus full application of partial indexing for new claims; reforms to existing claims to remove the $200 per month supplements; reformed FELs and FEL supplements and pre-1990 supplements plus full application of partial indexing.

All of these in combination could reduce the schedule 1 unfunded liability by $3 billion. They could reduce the schedule 1 annual cost of the program from $3 per $100 of assessable payroll to $2.32.

As large as these potential savings are, it's important to note that Ontario's schedule 1 unfunded liability would still be larger than the sum of the unfunded liabilities for all other provinces. In spite of what we're saying, it would still be higher. Ontario's schedule 1 annual cost per worker would still be among the highest of any Canadian province.

These facts are even more alarming when considered in light of the fact that between 1989 and 1993 Ontario reduced the number of schedule 1 lost time injuries by a whopping 42%, from 185,000 in 1989 to 108,000 in 1993.

In conclusion, we appreciate the opportunity to present the views of our members. We applaud the government for starting the journey towards a sustainable workplace insurance system. We applaud the government for its actions to revitalize Ontario's economy. A revitalized economy is a necessity. Without it, even a system reformed along the lines that we've talked about will be unable to provide our current and future injured workers with the indemnity that they will require.

That completes our presentation and we are open for some questions.

The Chair: Thank you very much. The first up for the questioning this time will be the official opposition.

Mr Hoy: I would make a small comment here on the workplace insurance system. It's something the government can consider, I suppose, but indeed it is the people who work there who receive the benefits because of an injury.

On page 4 you talk about provision of real gains from the workplace—it's something that we don't require—and protection of covered workplace participants from losses caused by.

If one is to be covered in an adequate way under workers' compensation, wouldn't some of these concerns that you have take place in any regard? Or are you suggesting—well, I would ask you to help me here a little bit in these provisions that we do not need.

Mr John Neal: We are suggesting that the natural aging process should not place a person who has a workplace injury in a fiscal advantage over those who have not had such an injury, as a simple example. We're suggesting that the tradeoff of litigation versus no-fault compensation was a tradeoff for things that happen in the workplace. We do not believe that workers' comp was put in place as a social safety net. If the aging process requires additional funds, we fail to see why injured workers should be a privileged class.

Mr Hoy: Okay. What are you trying to convey to us, that we do not need "protection of covered workplace participants from losses caused by lifestyle"?

Mr Neal: Workers whose degree of disability is substantially enhanced by their own personal choices should not be subsidized by those who choose to live a healthy lifestyle.

Ms Martel: I can only summarize my comments in this way: I thought I saw Jurassic Park once at the movies, but I think I'm seeing it here again this afternoon. I am just so totally opposed to almost everything you've put down here, I can barely begin to describe it.

You've just called workers as being in a privileged class. You said you should change the title of this board to not even have the word "worker" in it, instead to talk about workplace. You said that workers themselves should be responsible for safe work practices and healthy lifestyles. This is somehow to infer that when people go to work every day, they're looking to get hurt.

I just have to say to you that I'm finding it really, really difficult to control my real concern, having been an MPP for eight years and one who has a full-time staff that does nothing else but deal with workers' compensation. I find it very hard to accept a brief like this which basically puts all the problems of the system on the backs of injured workers. I find it really offensive.

Mr Neal: I would suggest that you read it with care and attention. I think you will find that the accountabilities are extremely well balanced. The system needs people to understand that this system is there for those who need help, and unless everybody is proactive at minimizing the use of the system, those who really need it will find it is not there. Those that the system was really designed for are going to be the very casualties of a system that is overused. Why are Ontario's workers receiving twice as much per client as in other provinces? Are we that unhealthy? I don't think so.

I think we are living in the best province. I think we have the most proactive services. We have dedicated people in the labour movement, in the workplace, in the employer community, working very hard to make it work, to make a difference, to help people go back to meaningful work.

I don't see that happening any better in other provinces, so you tell me why the average claim in Ontario costs twice as much as it does in other provinces.

The Chair: And with the end of that sentence, thank you. In deference to the last group, so that we can finish by our allotted time, thank you for making your presentation and coming to see us today.

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA, LOCAL 1005

The Chair: Our last group up before recess is the United Steelworkers of America, Local 1005. Good afternoon, gentlemen.

Mr John Martin: Good afternoon. My name is John Martin. I'm the president of Local 1005, Steelworkers, in Hamilton. On my immediate left is Alan Hodder, who is the compensation benefits chairman. I'd like to make note to the committee that I was previously the vice-chairman representing workers at the WCB.

Having sat here for the last half-hour, I think it would be important that I limit my statement to allow the government to ask the very needed questions, because there seems to be a misconception about what went on regarding the financial improvements package.

The financial improvements package which was tabled to the board of directors was Ken Copeland's unaltered financial improvements package. Mr Copeland was and currently is the interim president and chairman of the Workers' Compensation Board of the province of Ontario.

I attended intense meetings with the vice-chair of the employers, Stephen Cryne, and with Mr Copeland. It was the labour movement—and I want this unequivocally clear before I leave here today—that took the unaltered financial improvements package as put forward by the administration of the WCB. I went to a caucus of the stakeholders, which I represented, and, grudgingly so, convinced them to support the changes needed in that package as put forward by the administration to bring the unfunded liability in control as per the 1985 funding strategy of the WCB. These are the facts.

I would suggest to the committee that I provided the Minister of Labour, Elizabeth Witmer, copies of the minutes of the July 28, 1995, meeting, to show very clearly that the workers' side unanimously voted to introduce the financial improvements package, even though we knew it would take benefits away.

Who voted en bloc against the financial improvements package? The employer community. I'll tell you why they voted en bloc—and I'm watching the clock so you can ask me questions. Because they didn't want to give up their second injury and enhancement fund and they didn't want to give up the new experimental experience rating system.

When I throw you the next group of numbers, you should be shocked: $400 million a year, starting in the year 1991, was transferred from the investment fund at the WCB to the operations of the board for 1991, 1992, 1993 and 1994. In 1995, $400 million was transferred from the investment portfolio to the operating account, but only $250 million used.

I beg the question of the government: Employers got off the hook for revenue leakages to the tune of $1.6 billion cash. That $1.6 billion cash, had it been left at $400 million in 1991, would have brought the current balance of $6 billion in cash assets at the board to over $10 billion today.

The Workers' Compensation Board of this province is not in trouble. The WCB fiscally operates in the red because they collect off employers every three months. Due to a reset program that's to kick off next year, we're going to be collecting—I'm using a prior tense—we would have been collecting the revenues every month.

Here's the situation, and I provided one exhibit under the freedom of information act to the committee which factually shows, as of December 31, 1994, $270 million in outstanding assessments and $160 million in outstanding penalties. Even if the government had gone through with the 5% rate reduction, you would have created $140 million in benefits, in money; you would have created a $120-million shortfall to the operating accounts of the board, which would have meant we would have had to go and draw another $120 million against the investment fund.

Now, let me talk about the act. The act says very clearly in the revenue sections that the board is not to unduly burden employers into the future. Where do you think the $400 million went every year when it wasn't recovered? Into the unfunded liability. The unfunded liability, as Dennis Schweitzer from UTU told you, is not a real debt. It has no solvency rules, it is not funded.

I want that to be very clear. If my company tomorrow went broke, our pension agreement is funded by 66%. It has to meet the Pension Commission of Ontario solvency rules. Every employer in the province of Ontario would have to go broke tomorrow simultaneously for the debt level of the unfunded liability to even become effective.

That's not going to happen, unless there's an atomic explosion, and if it did happen, workers would get zero anyway because it's not funded. So the issue is around the operating expenses of the board, and labour and management while I was there worked hand in hand to try to get our minds around the fiscal responsibility.

I may be naïve or I may be stupid, as some employers would have you believe, but if I was left at the compensation board, I truly believe that labour would have assisted management in bringing the unfunded liability to zero by the turn of the century because we're the ones that are going to convince workers to take cuts, not the Legislature of this province. Having said that, I'll open the floor for questions.

The Chair: Thank you very much. The questions will start with the third party.

Mr Christopherson: John, I appreciate your clarifying that because time and time again we've heard a lot of this stuff repeated and it's good to have it on the record.

I want to ask further about the bipartite system and the relationship on the board. An awful lot of groups have come forward and talked about the bipartite system not working, that by inference the members of the board prior have been incompetent, they didn't have the qualifications, the ability to do the job, and further, that because it's 50-50, it's naturally going to always create a logjam and decisions can't be made and therefore you can't go about doing the business that has to be done.

I'd like you to comment on that a little bit and perhaps you could also, while you're doing that—because I think you were there—comment on the 5% reduction to benefits that the board was asked to approve on request by the minister. I believe that's the way it happened. Maybe you can clarify that for me too.

Mr Martin: First of all, with respect to the bipartite board working, we weren't really a true bipartite board, by the way. Bill 165 contemplated and did include two public members whom the board of directors had chosen and submitted to the current government. It would have made it a multi-stakeholder board.

With respect to working together, we had unanimity on every issue except FIP. FIP was the only issue while I was at the comp board that we split on and it was bloc against bloc and the chair chose not to break the bloc. What's important for the panel to understand, because of the inclusion of fiscal responsibility to the purpose clause under 165, we actually hired the leading corporate lawyer on fiduciary responsibility to educate ourselves on exactly what fiduciary responsibility was. That was the direction we were following.

Now let me deal with the question, Mr Chair, with respect. Had the board of directors taken the direction of a 5% rate reduction and a 5% benefit reduction in June when we were directed to do that, I would have created, as an individual, and we would have created as a board—and by the way, we were unanimous in not taking the direction of the government—we would have created a $120-million revenue shortfall on the one side, but the benefits side would only have gained $20 million to the board—that's where the shortfall comes in, from $140 million to $120 million—because benefits, long-term, are based on severity, and therefore the immediate cash savings in operations to the board would only have been $20 million. In hindsight, we were right in what we did, and that, in my view, is the reason why the government in September announced that it wanted to take a second look at the 5% assessment reduction.

Mr Christopherson: The experience rating system has been talked about a lot throughout these hearings. Employers are urging that that be retained. I questioned a number of groups about that with regard to the fact that there's an imbalance; it goes against the policy that's there in terms of the number of rebates and penalties. Can you comment on that whole system and what your thoughts are?

aren't being collected. Under the act they're not stringent enough in invoking the penalty. However, consultants, wonderful people that they are, come in at a percentage basis and say: "Whoa. I can go to the board and I can get you a cash rebate on your assessment dollar." In some instances premiums aren't being paid but rebates are given out instantaneously, so what you have here is a cash cow to employers.

That's happening. That's where the revenue leakages are coming in. In fact 80% in some instances on the NEER program are given in rebates. What does that do? It really hurts us in the manufacturing—I represent 5,000 employees, 6,000 pensioners at Stelco. You pick all the big manufacturing-based industries in the province; they're paying close to 47% assessment rates. The majority of restaurant people aren't paying anything, and the ones that are paying have a consultant there to get them 80% of the rebates in the first instance. I would suggest to government, before it moves forward on anything, to ascertain who these 55,000 employers are.

The other problem you've got with small employers, they open up a corporate number, they don't pay their revenues, they shut down, then they open up another corporate number over here. But what happens to the liability that remains from injured workers? It gets carried over to the rest of the employers.

In our view, very clearly the revenue problem is what is causing the dilemma to the system in trying to claw back on entitlements and trying to claw back on a 5% benefit reduction. It's like dropping a drop of water in that jug, because you're talking minuscule amounts of moneys in comparison to the $1.6 billion that I've proven to you, and that's in the audited records that have been pulled from the system since 1991.

Mr Christopherson: Can I ask a short one?

The Chair: If it's very short, very quick.

Mr Martin: Oh, no, he went over almost five minutes, I think, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: No, actually you've got about a minute and a half left. You started out at 6:17.

Mr Christopherson: I'll get a quick one in and then let another one. I've heard, John, and you may not be aware of this, that some companies are receiving more money in WCB rebates than they make in corporate profits. Are you aware of that being the case?

Mr Martin: I have nothing factual to give the committee, but I can say this: There are a number of seminars put forward by consultants, and the actual title of the seminar is Make Profits from Your NEER Refunds.

Mr Carroll: Thank you very much for your presentation. You suggested, if I understood you properly, that it would be labour and only labour and not the Legislature that would be able to convince workers to take reductions. Did I understand that?

Mr Martin: No, I said workers. Workers and only workers will stand up in this province, not the Legislature.

Mr Carroll: No, I realize that, but you said it would be only workers who—

Mr Martin: That's right, and there's a reason why.

Mr Carroll: Do we assume from that then that you believe there should be reductions in benefits?

Mr Martin: I believe, and I'm going to be honest, that the WCB system needs to be fixed. There are some difficulties in it. Workers would have to give back some things in that process, and that process would be through a workers' representative through consultation. The reason I say that, Mr Carroll, is that I did a tour of 14 cities before I was fired by the government and I got it loud and clear that they would be prepared to have a guy from the worker community tell them why it's got to be done versus the government telling them.

Mr Carroll: Okay, but you do admit there need to be some changes in benefits.

Mr Martin: Not in benefits. I didn't say benefits. I said there have to be reductions in the way the board operates itself.

Mr Carroll: So your comment that only workers could convince workers to take less didn't mean in terms of benefits.

Mr Martin: That's correct.

Mr Carroll: One other quick question: Did your union get a request in writing from Minister Witmer to make some submissions about changes to the WCB?

Mr Martin: No. I got it through a mass notification system.

Mr Carroll: But you did get a request for some written input?

Mr Martin: Me personally?

Mr Carroll: No, your union.

Mr Martin: The Steelworkers? I don't know that. I just said my local union found out about it through the labour movement, through the OFL.

Mr Carroll: Did you make any submissions to Minister Witmer?

Mr Martin: On this?

Mr Carroll: No, written submissions on the reform to the Workers' Compensation Board.

Mr Martin: No, I didn't, and the reason is, sir, because I had private meetings with the minister on three or four different occasions, and there was an agreement between the government and ourselves that any dealings while we were employees of this ministry would be with the Minister of Labour.

Mr Carroll: So you had an opportunity for input then?

Mr Martin: With the minister, yes.

Mr Carroll: Okay, thank you.

The Chair: Thank you very much. We appreciate your indulgence, as we've run a little late this afternoon. With that, trying to get back on schedule here, we're going to take a very brief recess for dinner and we will reconvene at 7 o'clock.

The committee recessed from 1832 to 1902.

UNION OF INJURED WORKERS OF ONTARIO

The Chair: Seeing a quorum, I call the meeting back to order and welcome our first deputation of the evening, the Union of Injured Workers of Ontario, Mr Biggin. Good evening.

Mr Phil Biggin: Good evening, Mr Chairman and members of the resources development committee. We're pleased to be here. The Union of Injured Workers has been in existence since 1974. We have appeared before this committee through three or four different governments and the only thing I would say at this point is that we certainly favour, because Ontario is such a large province, that you go out and reach the people, go to the people directly. That's part of what we're about.

We directly service people, we represent people who are having problems with workers' compensation, with welfare, with Canada pension, people who are having depression, we give hands-on support to people. You've probably heard about us through our demonstrations, but that's a very small part of the work that we actually do. We work one-on-one with a lot of people in groups, small groups and large groups, educationals and so on.

We're here because we feel very strongly that the workers' compensation system is something that was right to be set up in the first place. Certainly, when Chief Justice William Meredith laboured between 1910 and 1913, in 1915 it became a reality. Today there is a need for workers' compensation to assist injured workers, people who get hurt on the job.

Labour Minister Elizabeth Witmer said that in tabling Bill 15, she was acting now because the board is on the brink of a financial crisis. Obviously, the Minister of Labour has trouble digesting the 1994 annual report prepared by the WCB, or perhaps that's why she felt obliged to dismantle the bipartite board of directors before it was even determined whether they were going to be able to do the job that they had set out to do.

It's our position that the Workers' Compensation Board has two stakeholders. The primary stakeholder is the injured worker and the secondary stakeholder is the employer who funds the system. This was the bargain that was set out by Chief Justice William Meredith in 1914 when he intended the system to be set up to provide economic security for workers who were unfortunate enough to be hurt on the job.

There was a historic tradeoff or compromise where workers gave up the right to sue their employers in order to get this security of benefits. It was agreed by all parties—labour, the manufacturers' association, everybody—that employers would fund the system and no money would be taken from tax revenue. Finally, it was agreed this system would be administered by an organization which operated at arm's length from the government.

Now your government is planning to drastically alter this arrangement. All of this because of the so-called financial crisis. We're not saying that there are not problems at the board, financially, but why call it a debt crisis? You've heard presenter after presenter explain that this is not a debt; it is an unfunded liability. It's not the same thing. It's not something that Moody's takes into consideration when it is looking at Ontario's credit rating.

In real terms, the WCB is better funded today at 38 cents for every dollar than it was five years ago at 32 cents for every dollar. That's not good enough, of course, but let's look at the 1994 annual report. Bill 165, against our vociferous objections, took away full indexation of pensions and benefits. We haven't even seen those savings because this is the 1994 report. Yet, in the 1994 report, before Friedland went into effect, the WCB built a new office at a cost of $180 million, paid out $359 million in rebates through experience rating—the off balance—wrote off $173 million in bad debts by employers and ended up reporting a profit of $130 million.

Mr Chairman, when I indicated to you when we were presenting as a network that I wanted to speak, it was because I said if anybody had any commonsense, how could you put forward a proposal to reduce employers' assessment rates by 5% at the same time that you're taking away from the injured workers? At the same time that the people are consulting with you, the employers and the employers reps are telling you that this is a financial crisis, the system is going to go bankrupt.

Yes, if the system is going to go bankrupt, then why are these employers taking $359 million, last year, from the revenues of the compensation board when the board's statistics show that $337 million were paid out in temporary benefits for 1994? In fact, the employers are taking out $22 million more than the workers are getting, and this is supposed to be a workers' compensation system?

We heard the employers a little while ago tell us that yes, we should change the name of the system. I think you realize, Mr Chairman and committee members, that there are many more workers in the province of Ontario than employers. I'm not putting down the employers, and certainly through all of our presentations we have stressed that we want a strong economy so everybody can be justly compensated, whether they're injured, not injured, whatever. But this is not fair in any way. What you've got here is you've got the employers creating this crisis of collapse. Yes, many workers come up to me and say, "The Workers' Compensation Board is going to collapse." Well, we know from the statistics that it's not going to collapse with $6.8 billion in the bank.

Certainly, we want to have a responsibly run Workers' Compensation Board, but we have to have a board that is going to go after the 20,000 employers who do not pay coverage even though the act requires them to do so and another $200 million lost through employer non-registration, non-filing, underreporting of payroll and non-payment of assessments.

I'm going to turn it over to my colleague Carmine Tiano, who's a community outreach worker with our organization, just to give you some specifics about the bill.

Mr Carmine Tiano: I'm basically going to discuss two sections of the act, of the way the act is proposed to change. Section 21.1, specifically the section on overpayment: As someone who works with injured workers, I see this section specifically geared towards legislating to account for administrative errors at the board.

The majority of overpayments are created by board employees. I feel it would be a better idea to try to stop the overpayments before they happen, put policies within the board that will stop these overpayments. Most of them are created by board employees, and who bears the brunt of it? Workers.

Of all the stakeholders in the system, it seems that the injured worker is the one who is economically the most vulnerable. If an overpayment occurs, the worker is the one who will be affected the most by it.

The way the proposed changes are worded, there are no mechanisms which will allow for forgiving of any overpayments. This is unbelievable. Meanwhile, when the board last year, in 1994, forgave $173 million in bad debts, it seems that all they do is forgive employer bad debts but when it comes to workers having overpayments they're hounded and forced to make restitution. In the last couple of weeks I could count at least six or seven workers who have gotten notices that there have been overpayments. They've received one notice; two weeks later already they're demanding payment. This is ridiculous, when the board is forgiving $173 million in bad debts. I think if you're going to forgive any debts at all, some of the workers' overpayments should be forgiven.

The other section I want to talk about is section 161, which puts criminalization into the act. I have a number of concerns with this. The first: The way section 161 is presently written, it states, "A person who knowingly makes a false or misleading statement or representation to the board in connection with any person's entitlement to benefits is guilty of an offence." It's very open-ended. Not only is the act now targeting injured workers, it's going after employers, representatives and doctors. The way the present legislation is written, it's going to deter injured workers from putting in claims and putting in appeals. Also, doctors now are going to have in the back of their mind, "If I write this medical report for this worker and there is fraud on his part, I'll be responsible."

As someone who represents injured workers, in the back of my mind that causes problems for me too. If I'm representing someone and there's a misunderstanding that could lead to misrepresentation, I could be guilty of criminal charges. I think that this section should be rethought and reconsidered, especially when now even employers could be charged with criminal charges.

I think that the two sections I went through and other sections in this new bill should be reconsidered and rethought. There should be more input, the type of input we're putting in tonight. I feel that even though the government has fundamental differences in the way we see workers' compensation, the ultimate goal is to build a better Workers' Compensation Act. The way the changes are now, we're not going to that. We're going to give employers more power and we're going to take power out of the hands of the injured workers, and I don't think that's the way to go.

The Chair: Thank you. We have time for some brief questions, and this time the rotation will start with the government benches.

Mr Joseph N. Tascona (Simcoe Centre): I'd just like to discuss your comments about section 161. This is not a criminal section. These are provincial offences, if anything. Looking at that provision, which equally applies to employers in other parts of the act, we're dealing with false or misleading statements that are knowingly made. That is not open, and it's not something that would be subject to anything just short of having knowledge. If it had said, "a person makes a false or misleading statement," I would totally agree with you, but the fact that it says "knowingly" is a big difference.

Also, with respect to subsection 161(2), it deals with, "A person who wilfully fails to inform the board," which is an intent. We've heard from employers who have looked at one section, where it doesn't even have "wilfully" or "knowingly" in front of it and, just basically, you've actually done the act.

I would say to you that the approach that's being taken is not a criminal approach; it's an approach to deal with situations where there is an intent to defraud the board, be that involving a physician or be that involving an employee. It's not the intent to go after workers. I'd just like to hear your comments, based on my view of that provision.

Mr Biggin: That can be handled through criminal charges right now. I don't know why we need an additional section in the Workers' Compensation Act. I think the reason for that section is that it's giving a message to people. I mean, your whole approach seems to be, "We've got to cut spending and we'll do it any way we can." I'm interested to hear your comments. Certainly, somebody who is knowingly defrauding the compensation board, we wouldn't represent them in the first place, and I don't think any other representative would who had any credibility.

Mr Tascona: That's just the point, though. That's what the point is. Knowingly and wilfully defrauding the board is what this is dealing with, and you wouldn't deal with it under the Criminal Code. This is something that would be dealt with specifically under the act, and that's all the intent is.

Mr Biggin: How are you going to deal with the 20,000 employers who are knowingly not registering with the Workers' Compensation Board?

Mr Tascona: There are provisions in there to deal with them also.

The Chair: Thank you, but unfortunately we've used our 15 minutes, and it's going to be a full house this evening. Thank you very much, Mr Biggin and Mr Tiano, for taking the time to come and make your presentation this evening. We appreciate your comments.

EMPLOYERS' ADVOCACY COUNCIL

The Chair: Our next group up is the Employers' Advocacy Council. Good evening. Introduce yourselves for the committee members and for Hansard.

Ms Shirley Wylie: Thank you, Mr Chairman and standing committee members. I'm Shirley Wylie. I'm the provincial vice-chair for the Employers' Advocacy Council. To my left is our acting executive director, Sherri Helms, and to her left is Patricia Briggs, who is the Toronto chapter chair. Each one of us will take a portion of our presentation and I'll begin.

The Employers' Advocacy Council is a non-profit, volunteer organization of employers across Ontario. Our mission is to reduce employers' workers' compensation costs by influencing constructive change to workers' compensation in Ontario and through education of employers on all aspects of workers' compensation and workplace health and safety.

With over 1,700 members in nine regional chapters across Ontario, the EAC represents a broad cross-section of Ontario's diverse economy. Our members include small business owners employing less than a handful of employees and large multinational organizations. We also have many public sector employers and employers from schedule 2.

We welcome the opportunity to comment on this important initiative to begin reforming the workers' compensation system. We are pleased to see that the government, in laying out its plans for reform, has chosen to proceed cautiously in separating reforms into long- and short-term measures.

The EAC is in full support of the overall direction of Bill 15. This initiative will, in our view, begin to restore our workers' compensation system through measures that will provide professional leadership, greater accountability, deterrence of fraud and abuse, and improved overall efficiencies.

Most importantly, we believe that Bill 15 also begins to restore the confidence of workers, who rely on the system, and employers, who are the sole funders.

Based upon our active involvement and participation in pursuing constructive reform to workers' compensation over the past 10 years, we have a number of suggested amendments to the bill which we believe will serve to strengthen the legislative reform. We have also put forth some limited, yet key, suggestions to limit costs and restore some of the balance eliminated by the previous government with the introduction of Bill 165.

In supporting and proposing these amendments to Bill 15, the EAC wishes to ensure that the changes implemented are durable and in the interest of improving the entire system. It is in this spirit that we offer the following comments and recommendations for the consideration of this committee. Today, we would like to provide you with our comments in six key areas.

The purpose clause, as proposed, is a major improvement to the existing clause. However, we are concerned that it may not be strong enough to ensure the long-term viability of the system.

We have also concerns that the purpose clause leaves the system open to abuse and interpretation regarding vocational rehab programs. In many instances it's the economic situation, and not the worker's disability, that is in the reason for the worker not returning to work. A distinction needs to be made between "employability" and "employment" in the purpose clause.

We believe it is also necessary to clarify support for the use of financial incentives to employers to prevent workplace injuries.

We propose the following changes.

Suggested amendment to section 0.1: "The purpose of this act is to prevent and reduce the incidence of work-caused accidents and illnesses to workers, to reduce the overall costs of these accidents and illnesses to employers and the citizens of Ontario, to ensure the long-term viability of an effective and affordable workers' compensation system in Ontario and in doing so, accomplish the following the following in a financially responsible and accountable manner."

We feel there's no change required in regards to providing the fair compensation, no change to providing health care benefits.

However, we do recommend, "To provide rehabilitation programs that restore the worker's condition of employability and programs to facilitate the worker's return to work."

We endorse, "To provide rehabilitation programs for their survivors."

We recommend changes in, "To prevent or reduce the occurrence of injuries and occupational diseases at work through financial incentives to employers."

Lastly, we see no changes in but certainly endorse, "To promote health and safety in workplaces."

Ms Patricia Briggs: With regard to governance and appointments, the EAC is supportive of the measures to establish a multi-stakeholder board of directors. We have several recommendations which we believe will strengthen the government's objective of restoring leadership, management and accountability.

Directors must be selected based on their merits and skills, not because of their affiliation. They must always act in the best interests of the corporation.

To eliminate the concern of partisan views at the board, directors should be representatives "from" their respective communities rather than "of" the communities.

To be effective and have the confidence of the board, we propose that the chair be an order-in-council appointment made on the recommendation of the board of directors.

To maintain the level of independence and to display confidence in the board, the board should also have the power to hire, monitor the performance of and replace, if necessary, the president. The president should be a member of the board.

We also recommend that the chair of WCAT not be a member of the board.

With regard to policy direction, while we have the utmost confidence in the ability of the government and the minister to act in the best interests of the system, we are nevertheless concerned that in allowing an open-ended process for issuing policy directives to the board, it may in fact undermine the independence and confidence that is fundamental to this system.

In our view, the government maintains its control and direction over the affairs and activities of the WCB in three ways: by establishing the broad parameters of the system, setting benefit levels, definition of accident and coverage etc; through the appointment of the board of directors and approval of order-in-council appointments recommended by the board for the positions of chair and president; and through a memorandum of understanding with the WCB which clearly defines the roles and responsibilities of the government and the WCB.

We suggest that this provision be revisited within six months following appointment of the board of directors.

With regard to WCAT, employers continue to have concerns about the role of WCAT in the system. Generally, employers are of the opinion that WCAT has expanded the definition of "accident" well beyond what was contemplated by the legislators and has had a significant impact on the overall costs of the system.

While we recognize that the future role of WCAT and entitlement issues are being considered under Minister Jackson's review of the system, we are of the opinion that our strong concerns about WCAT can be partially addressed in this short-term initiative.

Restrictions must be imposed to ensure that WCAT can only deal with matters of fact and is bound by statute to follow and rule upon application of established WCB policy. This can be achieved through a minor change to section 86, as outlined in our main brief.

With regard to fraud and abuse control measures, the EAC fully supports the measures proposed in Bill 15 to contain fraud and abuse in the system. These measures are long overdue and will, in our view, lead to a greater level of confidence in the integrity of the system.

To promote and encourage registration of employers, we propose a six-month window and that recovery of back assessments be limited to collection of assessments that should have been collected for 1995 and 1996 as appropriate. Employers who fail to register at the end of that period should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law and required to pay WCB all outstanding assessments.

Returns of accidents: The EAC is of the view that the responsibilities imposed on employers under section 133 can be greatly enhanced by strengthened requirements on workers to provide notice of accidents under section 22. It's been our long-standing view that section 22, as currently written, provides an opportunity for abuse and prejudices the employer's position.

We propose that all claims for workplace injuries, except those of course that are occupational disease and obviously latent, filed outside the six-month period should be rejected without exception.

Inclusion of such a provision in this round of reforms is consistent with the overall objective to restore accountability and responsible behaviour from all parties.

Ms Sherri Helmka: Measures relating to Bill 165: As the government is aware, the employer community was strongly opposed to many of the provisions contained in Bill 165 introduced by the previous government. Elements of that bill have added significant cost to the system and have in certain instances undermined, or have the potential to undermine, the effectiveness of existing programs.

We believe that in this short-term package of legislative reforms significant corrections can be made to the finances of the WCB, and the effectiveness of existing practices and programs restored.

In regard to permanent partial disability supplements, section 147, the supplements under this section, when introduced in 1989, were intended to be a bridging supplement until age 65 for disabled workers unable to return to work and for whom rehabilitation was not likely to be effective. The change introduced by the NDP distorted that intention and simply awarded some 40,000 workers an additional $200 per month regardless of the extent of the individual's needs or the extent of the injury. The change to these supplements resulted in an additional cost of $1.5 billion to the system.

To compound the cost of this program, the WCB interpreted the original provisions of subsection 147(4) to the effect that once a supplement is awarded, it cannot be rescinded, even though the act requires reviews at two and five years post award. The impact of this administrative decision increased the WCB's future liability by $350 million in 1994.

We believe that the government has a number of options available to address this problem:

Develop a review process to determine individual need for the additional $200-per-month supplement.

Limit payment of the $200-per-month supplement to age 65.

Clarify the legislation to allow the WCB to revoke the supplement, and the additional $200 per month, at the time of the review prescribed in subsection 147(13).

In regard to return to work, the changes introduced by Bill 165 have frustrated the attempts of employers to develop and promote meaningful re-employment opportunities and modified work programs. This has imposed barriers where none previously existed and complicated a process that worked quite well. Return to work information is not medical in nature; however, these provisions have now medicalized a non-medical issue, to no one's benefit.

We propose these subsections of the act be rescinded.

The Vice-Chair (Ms Barbara Fisher): Excuse me. I would just like to advise you there is one minute left in the presentation. If you'd like to reserve it for one question, that's fine. Otherwise, you have one minute.

Ms Helmka: Okay, I'll go on with this.

In regard to experience rating, experience rating has been an unqualified success in reducing the incidence of accidents by more than 30% since 1989. At the same time, the duration of short-term disabilities has declined from 110.8 days in 1991 to 71.6 days in 1994. The changes introduced through Bill 165 will, if acted upon by the WCB, undermine the effectiveness of the program and measure processes surrounding health and safety and return to work programs rather than measuring the results of those programs.

Until the longer study is complete, we urge the government to rescind subsection 103.1(3) of the act.

On behalf of our members, we thank you for the opportunity to make these comments.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you. You've taken it right to the wire and unfortunately we will not be able to have any questions, but thank you very much for coming.

INJURED WORKERS' CONSULTANTS

The Vice-Chair: I would ask the next group to come forward, the Injured Workers' Consultants. While that's happening, for anybody who arrived late, I'd just like to remind you that there is a 15-minute presentation and question and answer period. Both of those are inclusive so it has to be done within the 15-minute period. If you'd like to leave it open for questions at the end, then please, I guess, acknowledge the fact that the time is going while you're presenting your brief as well. I would invite you to introduce yourselves, please.

Ms Marion Endicott: Good evening. My name is Marion Endicott. With me is Orlando Buonastella and John McKinnon. Each of us has represented injured workers for many years, primarily in the context of our work at Injured Workers' Consultants, which is a community legal clinic which provides free representation for injured workers having problems with the WCB.

In cooperation with the Union of Injured Workers and the Industrial Accident Victims Group, we have made presentations to the standing committee on resources development for some 17 years. We have felt that our experience and insight into workers' compensation has been valued over those years.

We have appeared before your committee during the Davis government, the Peterson government and the Rae government. Your committee, we regret to say, is the one that appears least interested in hearing what injured workers have to say. There are injured workers in this room who have presented to you in the past and they were not advised of these hearings until it was too late.

I would like to point out in particular Mr Eddie Couchi, whose name you may well know. He is from the Asbestos Victims group and he's been presenting and fighting for the rights of asbestos victims for 30 years now. He was not advised of these hearings. He's here tonight; he's not able to say anything. We also have Barbara Pyzot, for example. She's in the crowd. She made a request to present to your committee and was simply told, "There's no time." There are many injured workers who would like to be speaking to you of their experiences and their ideas and they have not had that chance with this committee.

The Davis Conservatives were not afraid of public debate. This standing committee had a session on the steps of the Legislature in 1983 in order to hear from all of the injured workers who were advised of those hearings in notices that went out with the monthly cheques from the WCB.

We think that a new government and new MPPs who are just becoming familiar with the complexities of the workers' compensation system should be proceeding with caution and humility. Instead, we see a bill, Bill 15, which attempts to rapidly respond to simplistic misconceptions and not real needs. We call these misconceptions "myths."

The first myth is that the WCB is facing a debt crisis because of its $11.4-billion unfunded liability.

Mr John McKinnon: The facts are otherwise. The WCB is not in debt. It has always been able to pay injured workers out of the premiums collected from employers. It has never borrowed a cent.

The unfunded liability is not a debt, it is the projected future cost of all claims on file minus the $6.8 billion in savings already in the WCB's reserve fund. The jump in the unfunded liability, which began in 1985, was just a paper change reflecting the introduction into the legislation of cost-of-living adjustments. There was no increase in injured workers' benefits nor in employers' costs. Inflation adjustment is done without cost to employers—and we refer you to the government's report from Paul Weiler.

Everyone has their own personal unfunded liability. Multiply your own income or living expenses by the number of years of age to 75 and subtract what you have in the bank. For example, a 45-year-old MPP living on $50,000 a year with $50,000 in RRSPs in the bank has a personal unfunded liability of $1.45 million, even if that individual doesn't owe a cent to anyone.

Ms Endicott: I'd like to point out that attached to our brief is the section of Paul Weiler's report that does talk about how there was no increased cost to the employers by bringing in the cost-of-living adjustments.

The second myth is that the unfunded liability has been increasing and therefore WCB funding must be out of control.

Mr McKinnon: It's our view that the unfunded liability is not a concern in the WCB context. The private insurance industry is different. It is required by law to be pre-funded. It cannot have an unfunded liability because, with competition, it may have few or no customers to generate revenue in future years when it has to pay out.

The WCB is funded differently. It is funded on a collective liability basis. It was established in 1915 and funded on a "pay as you go" basis at the request of employer groups.

As long as participation in the workers' compensation system remains mandatory, and preferably for all employers, there will be adequate revenue to fund the system at lower premiums than a private insurance style pre-funded system, and this will also allow more money to remain in the hands of employers for ongoing investment in their enterprises.

The concern is not the projected future cost but ensuring an adequate collection pool of income each year. The concern for WCB funding ought to be directed at bringing all Ontario's employers into the WCB system.

Ms Endicott: Myth number 3: Since the unfunded liability has been increasing, common sense tells you that benefits to injured workers are too open-ended.

Mr McKinnon: If the unfunded liability concerns you, don't blame the cost of WCB benefits on injured workers. Benefits to injured workers were reduced in 1989 by Bill 162 which replaced the permanent pensions for permanent disabilities with discretionary payments for deemed wage loss until age 65.

Injured workers paid again in 1994 when the full cost-of-living adjustments were taken away by Bill 165.

According to the WCB's 1994 annual report, the benefits expense was at the lowest level in 10 years. The cost of injured workers' benefits is now 36.5% less than the cost a decade ago.

So don't blame injured workers' benefits for this "actuarial speculation" that is known as the unfunded liability. Benefits are going down while that figure is going up. In our submission, you ought to find out what is going on before you begin to attack injured workers' benefits.

Ms Endicott: Myth number 4: Employers' WCB premiums are rising at a rate that is out of control.

Mr McKinnon: Again, the facts are contrary. According to the WCB's annual report, the average premium from employers has been steadily decreasing. The average premium is now less than employers were paying in 1988. Compare that with rate increases in the private insurance industry for auto, home and life insurance premiums.

The effective rate is even lower because of, as Mr Biggin was pointing out, the expansion in experience rating and the increase in rebates. In 1994, as was pointed out, the net cost of rebates to employers was $359 million for schedule 1 employers, and this amounts to a kickback of 14% in the premiums collected.

So Ontario's premiums don't look as bad as some would like us to believe. As Mr Biggin pointed out, compare that to the treatment of the workers injured in those same workplaces; they received $22 million less in temporary benefits than their employers received in rebates.

In 1994, the WCB still paid injured workers full cost-of-living increases for over 11 months, gave employers a reduction in premiums, gave $359 million to employers in rebates, plus wrote off $173 million in employers' bad debts, bought a $180-million new building, and still declared $130-million profit. That's not bad for an institution in crisis.

Ms Endicott: Myth number 5: The cost of WCB premiums is reducing Ontario's competitiveness and reducing investments in Ontario's industries.

Mr McKinnon: Last week, the Canadian Auto Workers' submission to this committee reported that in 1994 there was $8.8 billion invested in the manufacturing sector of Ontario and that was the most for any year in Ontario's history. Ontario has an infrastructure and advantages that provinces with low WCB costs, like Prince Edward Island, cannot offer. Executive salaries are up by 18%. The average wage of a chief executive was reported by the Canadian Auto Workers to be $632,000 last year and this suggests that our WCB rates are not a barrier to investment or profits.

Ms Endicott: Myth number 6: The previous board of directors was narrow and Bill 15 broadens it.

Mr Orlando Buonastella: The previous board of directors represented an equal number of employers and trade unionists. It came to the consensus that it needed to be expanded to include the organized injured workers' movement, ONIWG, that presented today, and small business. They undertook to lobby the new government to bring this about.

What was the government's response? Fire the new board of directors. Appoint a new slate that will have the stomach to implement the cuts in workers' benefits that will come with Bill 15, part II, in the spring, as announced by the government.

We note in passing that when opposing the NDP's Bill 165, the Tory caucus brought in amendments—and we have them here in the appendix—saying that one injured worker should be and would be in the panel to recommend directors for the board. In Bill 15, injured workers' representatives are not even mentioned. Some progress.

Ms Endicott: Myth number 7: Bill 15 is not an attack on workers' benefits.

Mr Buonastella: Except that in introducing Bill 15, the Minister of Labour said it will set the stage for further comprehensive reform next spring. We call it an appetizer in that sense. What did Ms Witmer say these reforms would be? Reduction in the compensation rate by 5%, rethinking the idea of lifetime pensions, reducing the monthly FEL awards up to 40%, a three-day waiting period and, to add to this balance, a 5% reduction of premiums so that employers will benefit directly every time an injured worker is thrown on the street. This is why Bill 15 must have a new board, a board to stomach these changes.

But Bill 15 will affect benefits directly as well. The new purpose clause is being brought in to have financial concerns discipline the entire compensation system, including WCAT, the appeals tribunal. What does this mean? The board has a legislative responsibility to make decisions based on the true merits and justice of each case. This will now be compromised. Financial concerns, the concern about cost of a claim or the concern for precedent-setting cases—these concerns will now de facto be considered. In doing so and in adopting a narrow cash register approach, justice and fairness will be seriously compromised.

Let's take the example of the Elliot Lake silicosis cases or the Johns-Manville workers—and we have one here tonight. The WCB began the special rehabilitation assistance program in 1975 for these miners. Although receiving a partial disability pension for lung disease, these workers returned to their old workplace because they could not earn a living any other way. Many got sicker and died unnecessarily. The WCB then agreed to pay full benefits for those who came out and looked or trained for other work.

The program would likely not survive these days, with the new concern for financial responsibility. It would have cost less to let them die, having returned to work at no wage loss and just paid their families the death benefit when the time arrives. This is the cost-cutting approach that we're putting in place for our sons and daughters. Let them work, even if we know it's killing them.

Ms Endicott: Myth number 8: Fraud and overpayments are a major problem.

Mr Buonastella: The Ontario WCB has received national and international awards for its anti-fraud technology. There's no evidence that fraud or overpayment is a more significant problem today than under the previous Conservative, Liberal and NDP governments. The difference is that today the WCB has an entire department that deals exclusively with fraud and overpayment, and the 1994 annual report gives no figure to assess how effective they are. Why don't you propose a value-for-money audit of the fraud investigation unit before you entrench so-called anti-fraud measures in the act?

Most of the injured workers we deal with think that they are being defrauded. These are injured workers who survive on small pensions from the board, who are pushed on to welfare, workers who receive a small FEL benefit for a phantom job they don't have. You may say that we and they are biased, but a lot of your constituents are equally biased. But if you think we are biased—and we disagree—we urge you to read the Ontario Medical Association submission to this committee on Bill 165 last fall, and I included it in our addendum.

The OMA reported a disturbing trend by injured workers to request non-reporting of their WCB injuries at the apparent request of the employer. We have provided the brief to you, as I said, and I should say that Elizabeth Witmer listened to that submission very attentively, as we were in the audience, so do something about that.

Ms Endicott: Myth number 9: Injured workers must be forced to report material changes.

Mr Buonastella: In the interest of brevity, I want to say, without repeating what's here, that this is the first time a section of the act is being introduced without telling us the reason for it. Are we supposed to tell you the reason for this change? When we look at it, we think it's totally unnecessary because a lot of these material changes, like a changing in employment condition, a changing in employment status, are not relevant to people who are on a pension, to people who are on a supplement, or to people who are on a FEL benefit, because there are regular reviews scheduled for that. So there's no necessity at all to introduce these changes.

The Vice-Chair: I just might note you have one minute left in your presentation time.

Ms Endicott: We hoped by reading we'd be quicker than usual, but we will conclude now, and in concluding, I'd like to read from a document which we think summarizes the general approach of the government fairly well: This government "has developed a plan which will eliminate the unfunded liability while ensuring the principles of fairness and efficiency for workers and employers alike. Among its plans are reducing benefit levels, improving the ongoing review of long-term benefits, strengthening definitions of compensable accidents, and improving the review of worker recovery periods."

This happens to be not a government document that I'm quoting from. I replaced the words "Marsh and McLennan" with the word "government" as I read it out. This is a special-interest group that this government is representing. The entire document is appended to your brief there, and a lot of it reads like the current government documents.

The Marsh and McLennan company goes one step further. After the government makes it very profitable for them, they would then be interested in taking over the WCB, or, to put it in their words, the government should "Introduce meaningful long-term changes to the structure of the system with a view to handing stewardship to the private sector." That's page 4 of the same document which you have.

Is this what Bill 15 and the study under the minister without portfolio, Cam Jackson, are all about? We urge you to withdraw Bill 15 and to listen to the people for whom the system was created, the injured workers of Ontario.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation. That does expire the 15-minute time allocation, so unfortunately or fortunately, there won't be any questions this evening.

BOARD OF TRADE OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO

The Vice-Chair: I would ask that the next group come forward, please, the Metro board of trade. Welcome this evening. I would ask that you introduce yourselves, please, and who you are representing.

Mr Vincent Johnston: My name is Vince Johnston, and to my right is David Brady. We're both members of the labour law committee of the Metro board of trade.

Ladies and gentlemen of the committee, you have the materials in front of you. I won't go through the history of the board of trade. Suffice it to say the board of trade is the largest board of trade or chamber of commerce in the country. It represents a broad spectrum of employers in this province. We have played and continue to play an active role in providing constructive criticism to the government and to the WCB with respect to issues concerning the workers' compensation system, and we will continue that role.

I don't propose to run through the submissions for you. What I propose to do rather is highlight some of the submissions and elaborate on some of the rationale that's contained in those submissions.

Employers in the province are concerned. They are concerned because the magnitude of the problem facing the system is obvious and it's pressing. There are problems in three key areas: There are leadership problems, there are financial problems and there are systemic problems. To the royal commission we made submissions which identified these as critical issues, and they continue to be critical issues. These critical issues have led to a financial crisis and they've led to a crisis in confidence on the part of especially employers in the province.

In part, the crisis has arisen because the system which has been given the board is not managed, because it's unmanageable. I was reminded of this fact today when I received a letter from the chairperson of the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal, Mr Ellis. His letter to me was apologizing to me on behalf of their tribunal for the lengthy delay in getting a decision to us. I found this quite curious, but you might understand this letter when you understand the context.

The case was before the tribunal in May 1993. We had a one-day hearing. We concluded that hearing on that day. Post-hearing submissions were requested. All of that process was finished March 1, 1994. There are issues of credibility in the case, and yet over two years—two and a half years now—since the date of that hearing, we do not have a decision.

Mr Ellis, in his letter to us, said the following: "Gee, we're sorry"—and I'm paraphrasing, obviously—"but part of our problem is the fact that the pre-government to this particular government introduced a bunch of legislative amendments, and those legislative amendments have proven to be complex and time-consuming and have led to difficult issues. We didn't understand the impact that those legislative amendments would have on our jurisdiction until it was too late, so you're caught in a backlog and you're just going to have to wait for your decision. We can't say to you, 'You're going to get priority because your decision's this long overdue.' It's just going to have to wait till everything else."

That, I think, exemplifies the crisis in confidence that employers have in the system today. That crisis in confidence can't be underestimated. The employers right now are questioning the cost of doing business in Ontario. They're questioning the decision-making by the board. They're questioning the decision-making by the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal. They're questioning what they view to be aggressive collection and rating actions by the board against employers with what appears to them to be a laissez-faire attitude towards collecting overpayments from workers.

All of these things are problems. The question that I think faces this committee is, does this bill fix all those problems? The answer is no, it doesn't. What it does do, though, is it puts the building blocks in place, and those building blocks need to be there in order to restore confidence in the system. All of the building blocks need to be there, ladies and gentlemen of the committee. If you remove some of those building blocks that are contained in Bill 15, these amendments just aren't going to work.

The building blocks I see starting at the top, and at the top is the WCB itself. The WCB should be the manager of the system. It has not been the manager of the system for an excessive period of time. It needs to take a leadership role in determining issues concerning entitlement and issues concerning vocational rehab, concerning collection activities. It should not merely be a tool for achieving social policy objectives.

Bill 15 contains within it amendments to the composition of the board of directors. We cautiously approve the amendments which are contained in Bill 15, but quite frankly we need the right people in place. We need strong people. We need people with proven track records in turning industries around. The president and the chairperson of the board must be senior insurance executives. They must have actuarial training, because the board is, after all, in the business of insurance. We need these people in place in order to restore confidence in the system. Right now we're at a critical stage of the process for this system. We need key people, people who can pull the system out of the mess that it's in.

The board of directors which has been proposed in Bill 15 again we cautiously approve. We say no to bipartisanship. I don't need to address the types of concerns that Dr Tuohy raised in her reports concerning the agency. The board, though, has already experienced and has exhibited a great degree of inaction with respect to policy matters in the past, and if we go to a bipartite model, the anticipation is from the employer community that that inaction will become even worse.

We don't need brokered decisions at this stage of the process. We don't need decisions that are a result of negotiations going on in back rooms. We need decisions that deal with the real issues in place.

One of the facts which comes to my mind which shows the problem with the previous system concerns the policies that came into place with respect to section 54 and the obligations to re-employ. Somehow the board determined, as a result of what process we know not, to institute a just-cause test. I defy anyone in here to find a just-cause test in the workers' compensation system. It just isn't there. The only thing that employers can imagine happening is that some kind of brokered arrangement was made, and that is not in keeping with the spirit and intent of this act.

The other building block which we've identified is the concept of financial accountability and responsibility. We find it helpful that that has been enshrined in the purpose clause. We also find it helpful because this reminds everyone that there are two major groups of actors in this system. There are employers and there are workers, and both groups—both groups—were supposed to benefit from this entire process. Workers were supposed to be able to get their benefits with a minimum of difficulty, employers were supposed to have financial certainty, and they were supposed to feel as though they were contributing to a system that would spend its money the way it itself would spend its money, and right now that's just not there.

Section 7 of the proposed amendments reinforces the board's obligations. Again, we find that helpful. We do have one concern, and that concern is that the proposals with respect to financial accountability and responsibility leave one actor outside of the scope of those proposals. That actor of course is the tribunal.

The tribunal, in the not very distant past, has made a number of decisions which are completely contrary to board decisions. They have expanded entitlement for chronic pain disability, they have expanded entitlement for stress, and what that has caused in the system is a reactive mode to be instituted by the board, but it has also resulted in a number of costs which no one could have anticipated when the system first came into place. The tribunal, unfortunately, is making decisions on a one-off basis without a full appreciation for the scope of its decisions, and we would ask that one of the factors that the tribunal have to take into account in its decision-making process is the fact that its decisions must be financially accountable and must be financially responsible.

A further building block that we have identified concerns the checks—and checks is c-h-e-c-k—and balances provided by the government. We find that this restores a level of confidence in the system, a level of confidence that is lacking right now.

Again, cautionary notes: We must ensure that that type of process does not become too intrusive. We must ensure that we don't end up with a system that's a tool for social policy objectives. We just need to know that someone is there at the end of the day, looking over the shoulder of the board of directors to ensure that it's doing what it's mandated to do under the act. If they do that that will restore a great deal of confidence.

Again, confidence in this area is restored when we see things like the memorandum of understanding being put in place, strategic plans. Quite frankly, employers want to know how their money's spent. They want to know how the board's going to deal with this system. Right now we don't have a proactive board, we have a reactive board. The board's reacting to tribunal decisions, the board is reacting to pressures from workers, the board is reacting somewhat to pressures from employers. But we don't know where it's going, we need to know where it's going, any corporation would want to know where it was going, and right now the board doesn't know where it's going. That, I think, would be remedied with the memorandum of understanding in place.

Again, the value-for-money audits greatly assist in this process. It's exactly what is needed in order to ensure some accountability. One of the first value-for-money audits which should be conducted is with respect to the whole voc rehab system. Right now, in the view of many employers, there's untimely intervention, there are unrealistic goals being set, and at the end of the process it seems that neither workers nor employers are fulfilled, or feel fulfilled, with respect to what has been occurring.

The final building block and perhaps the one that's most important is worker and employer accountability. The board of trade fully endorses and supports the obligations which are imposed by Bill 15 and the penalties which are imposed by Bill 15 for failure to abide. Right now, employers are frustrated by the process.

In section 54 hearings, for instance, the board quite often finds in favour of workers because it relies on just-cause tests or on unrealistic financial viability tests. Employers quite often appeal those to the tribunal, and oddly enough, the tribunal sometimes finds in favour of employers. But no one seems to be too concerned about collecting overpayments. By implementing in the Bill 15 amendments the fact that overpayments are debts which are due and owing, we have full confidence that those debts will in fact be collected.

The material change in circumstances provision again is a very good idea, one which we think will bring some more accountability to the process, and the reason it will is it's going to force employers and workers to participate in the process, something which neither group has been doing lately. Both employers and workers have been sitting back. They've been waiting for the board to intervene. The board can't intervene because it doesn't have enough resources to intervene. By ensuring some self-reporting and some greater responsibility on the part of the major actors, you ensure that this entire system is going to start to work. In that regard, we're fully in support of the provisions with respect to the material change in circumstances.

A cautionary note, and the final note, really, with respect to the issue concerning obligations and penalties: We would ask this committee and we would ask the Legislature to consider a process of education. The reason we're asking for that is because of the potential impact on both employers and workers of a finding of a failure to abide. Right now, as I said, the process is one in which both employers and workers to a certain extent aren't doing anything. This bill proposes to make both parties self-report, and I don't believe that is a concept that has received a great deal of attention to date and it's a concept that does need to receive a great deal of attention because it does change the way the system operates.

In the final analysis, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, all of these building blocks have to be in place. They're a good first step. They're not going to fix all of the problems, but they need to be there in order for any of us to be able to fix the problems. We thank you for the opportunity to make submissions.

The Vice-Chair: We also thank you for your presentation. We have time, a two-minute period left, that we will start with some questions. The official opposition is first this time.

Mr Duncan: The Injured Workers' Consultants raised a very interesting point in their recitation of the various myths surrounding the WCB, and it was one they raised in a meeting with me that I was frankly stymied on an answer for. I'd like to ask you to address the question, and I'm paraphrasing what they said. The unfunded liability's not a debt, and it shouldn't be treated as a debt or considered as a debt. How do you respond to that, first of all? Second, I'm assuming that you see it as a problem, and in terms of its being a manageable problem, how do you see it being addressed?

Mr Johnston: Two issues: One, it is a debt. It's there right now. It's been calculated on the basis of what the board will have to pay out based upon the injuries that are in the system to date. It certainly is a factor that's reflected in employers' cost statements; it's a factor that's reflected in the whole NEER program. So I'm fundamentally in disagreement with the proposition that it's not a debt. It is, quite frankly, a debt.

In terms of how to manage it, there are a number of ways to manage that process. Bill 15 isn't going to do it. What Bill 15 is going to do is ensure greater accountability by all the parties with respect to the issues.

Some of the potential problems that are in place right now that Bill 15 may address are problems, for instance, with respect to employers who aren't properly reporting payroll papers. Bill 15, with respect to reporting obligations, could remedy that.

Other problems could be the worker who sits at home and waits and waits and waits for someone to contact him or her, and until someone does, that person's not going to say anything. The quicker we can get that person off the system and back to the workplace, the better.

Mr Duncan: Just one supplementary, Madam Chair.

The Vice-Chair: A very short one, please. Time has expired.

Mr Duncan: You noted in your presentation that, while supportive of the multi-stakeholder model, which we are, you noted some concern about the actual composition of that three- to seven-member board. We are proposing an amendment that would be more specific with respect to the numbers of appointments. Specifically, it would indicate that there would be equality between workers and management, exclusive of the non-stakeholder members, if you will. Would you be supportive of that kind of amendment, or are you looking at something different?

Mr David Brady: I get my chance for a 30-second response. I think the board of directors has to have some flexibility and it ought not to be strictly structured such that you have so many of this and so many of that, because what it does then is it introduces blocs and it introduces agendas and a voting approach to practical problems which I think must be considered practically on their merits.

Mr Duncan: So then what you said in here is less concerned—

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me.

Mr Duncan: Oh, I'm sorry. I apologize.

The Vice-Chair: That was a second supplementary. Sorry, but in fairness to everybody else who's here tonight, I don't want to delay them into the midnight hours as well. So thank you very much for your presentation.

DURHAM REGION INJURED WORKERS

The Vice-Chair: The next group tonight is the Durham Region Injured Workers. Would you please come forward. I'd ask that you please introduce yourself and, obviously, who you represent.

Mr Rick Williams: I'm Rick Williams. I'm the president of the Durham Region Injured Workers and the regional vice-president for the Ontario network.

As a union representative and an injured workers' representative, I have seen first hand the workings of the system and the effect it has on those who try to access it. I have also seen first hand the effects of three major changes in the law within the last 10 years: Bill 101, Bill 162 and Bill 165. As such, my submission will focus on the cuts to the benefits, entitlement, privatization and the compensation system. The system definitely does not need another massive change in benefit structure, and with three major revisions in the last 10 years, the system has been made worse, not better.

Cuts in benefits by 5%: It's not the injured workers who are responsible for the escalating mythical debt of the Workers' Compensation Board; it is the employers who are responsible. The reduction in the benefit levels represents the blame-the-victim approach that wouldn't offset the 5% reduction in the employer assessment rates. If the assessment rates of the employers had been increased over the years instead of holding the low rates, part of the problem would have been solved.

Rolling back workers' benefits and entitlement while at the same time lowering employer assessment rates is the type of strategy that allowed the liability to grow to its present state in the first place. WCB coverage should be considered a cost of doing business, and the cost of assessments should not be used as a threat to the payment of the benefits of the injured workers.

Workers lose when they are injured on the job and receive only 90% of their net income. They also suffer physically, mentally and emotionally, and even suggesting reducing benefits to 85% is an affront to their human dignity. It is in fact difficult for injured workers to even find out how their benefits are calculated, let alone what information has been given to the WCB to set the earnings base. It is left up to the employers to ensure that the additional information about overtime, incentive programs and shift premiums are included in the calculation of the net earnings.

The employers' position is that 90% of the net rate is too generous and that the payment of benefits at this rate is bankrupting the system. Injured workers are not getting rich off the system.

The Conservative government business caucus and newspapers fail to report that the 1994 Workers' Compensation Board annual report discloses: $6.6 billion in savings in the bank; paid rebates to good employers which totalled $359 million; wrote off $173 million in bad debts to employers; purchased a new building at $180 million; still paid injured workers full cost-of-living increases and temporary disability benefits, at a cost of $337 million. And the WCB still reported a profit of $130 million last year.

The government is planning ways to take away lifetime permanent disability pensions awarded to people injured before 1990 and to reduce the future economic loss awards by 15% to 40%. This has to be stopped.

Pre-Bill 162 injured workers were assessed for pension awards by board medical personnel based on the Ontario permanent disability rating schedule, a chart compiled by the board in 1972, which states the percentage rate considered appropriate for each disability. This rating schedule contains percentages based on the average unskilled worker's "impairment of earnings capacity, estimated from the nature and the degree of injury." Pension awards do not take into account the type of work the worker was doing, the worker's educational background or the ability to return to work.

These pensions are based on the earnings at the time of accident, and under Bill 181 in 1985 no increase was provided for inflation. In the PLMAC, the inflation protection that was given to injured workers as a permanent right, set in law, has been bargained away by people who will never have to suffer the consequences of this. The failure to protect long-term workers' compensation benefits against erosion by inflation is already a reduction of benefits.

The future economic loss awards have been the fulfilment of the nightmares of injured workers, and I believe those workers with dual awards for permanent disabilities are at a far greater disadvantage than those who received pensions under the old system. They are not based on the actual post-accident earnings but on the power of the board to deem phantom wages for what they consider the injured worker likely to be able to earn in suitable and available employment. Workers who have been unemployed for the two years following their initial FEL determination are magically deemed to have received pay increases within that two years, and by the time the first review comes around, their FEL is decreased to take into account the supposed wage increase that they have gained over the two years of experience.

The fact of the matter is that the dual award system does not adequately compensate injured workers for the degree and severity of their injuries. Coupled with that is the board's position that they cannot review the FEL awards until the statutorily mandated review times, which means that injured workers must live with the changes in their financial circumstances until such time as the review date occurs.

How then should an adequate wage replacement system be structured? At the very least, it should be based on the actual wage the injured worker is earning at the time of the determination. It should not be based on deemed wages.

Under workers' compensation, employers are protected from civil suits brought against them by injured employees, and this was the historical compromise behind the very existence of the workers' compensation. Give the workers back the right to sue the employer and only one accident could bankrupt a small company. Maybe then realization by the very cheap cost of this protection would be recognized by the employers of Ontario. Cuts to the benefits will force many more injured workers and their families on to welfare or family benefits just to survive, which will shift the financial burden to taxpayers.

Premier Harris made public statements that cutbacks to workers' compensation benefits would save taxpayers money. In light of the fact that the Workers' Compensation Board receives absolutely no public funding, this distribution of inaccurate information is seen as a deliberate attempt to manipulate public opinion in order to satisfy the demands of business.

The unfunded liability is a projection of future costs made with no consideration of future assessments. In short, it is a term that designates how far behind on payments due to injured workers employers would be if they ceased to pay for their current obligations.

The employers paid very small assessments for years while accidents continued to happen in the workplace. The average employer assessments have been steadily decreasing and are lower than they were seven years ago: Some $3 per $100 payroll in 1995, versus $3.02 per $100 payroll in 1988. WCB benefits paid are now the lowest in 10 years at 36.5% decrease. In a time of deficit reduction, it makes absolutely no sense to further reduce WCB assessments.

The business lobby has admitted that at least 20,000 employers in Ontario are legally avoiding WCB assessments at an estimated annual cost of over $60 million, yet no effort has been made to collect this money. Every employer should be required to have compensation coverage for their employees. This would increase the funding base, and give much needed protection to injured workers province-wide.

There is no reason why some employers can get out of the costs of WCB coverage for their employees. The fact that the types of employment that are exempt from reporting are considered low risk for injury—for example, banks, insurance companies, doctors' offices, private homes for the aged—and when the potential for serious injuries are contemplated, particularly considering the instance of repetitive strain injuries, this is not acceptable. There cannot be two classes of employers any more than there should be two classes of workers. Exempting classifications of employers dilutes the concept of collective liability.

Changes to the kinds of injuries covered by the workers' compensation will mean many injured workers will not receive benefits. The government wants to change entitlement requirements to effectively deny coverage to most gradual onset of chronic pain conditions—injuries from repetitive strain injuries, chronic pain, back pain and stress. These proposed changes will have a drastic effect on all present and future claims.

In the manufacturing sector with recent restructuring and the implementation of synchronous manufacturing techniques, production workers have had more demand to produce more, better, faster and cheaper for the sake of being competitive. The direct result leaves workers working a 56-minute work hour, which places stresses on their bodies that human beings were never designed to withstand. More than 30% of lost-time claims are for back injuries and the majority of claims have proven to be soft-tissue injuries such as repetitive strain injuries, tendonitis, epicondylitis and carpal tunnel syndrome. This is the main reason employers are demanding cuts and entitlement limits on the type of injury.

It is unrealistic to believe that compensation for stress-related disorders can be provided efficiently and systematically through a compensation system in which eligibility for benefits depends on proof of cause. We have probably all seen cases in which a person has had a compensable disability for now and is now totally disabled but is denied full benefits on the grounds that the present disability results partly from other causes, such as of subsequent sickness or other dramatic experiences, which affect fitness of the injured worker to work.

The business caucus and the employers are fully aware of the statistics provided by the Workers' Compensation Board in regard to the type of injuries which are costing the system the highest amount; therefore, rather than reduce accidents and provide a workplace which will eliminate these injuries, they recommend to change the definition of "accident" to eliminate the benefits for these injuries.

In the large proportion of the occupational disease cases and soft-tissue injuries, it is impossible for the medical profession to establish a diagnosis let alone determine the cause even when the diagnosis is clear. The victims of disease generally go without compensation not because it is established that the disease did not result from employment, but because the cause of the disease is unknown. When the cause is unknown claims are not approved.

In cases where the injury results in hospitalization, why should the worker have to wait three days? Private insurance companies will pay benefits for hospitalization effective immediately without any waiting period. Sick pay plans are now very extensive in Ontario and the cause of the disability is no longer relevant to the eligibility for benefits. This will relieve the employers of their liability under the workers' compensation to pay the injured worker from the day of the accident and shift the burden to insurance companies. This will also encourage workers covered by private insurance to claim from their insurance companies and not report work-related accidents to the Workers' Compensation Board which, in turn, will cause complications if the claim is filed later.

Workers' compensation reports the majority of the claims do not involve lost time and a very high percentage of the claims are of relatively short duration. One injured worker has suggested the employer be responsible for paying full wages for the first month following a work-related accident and payment for any period beyond this time be executed by worker's compensation. This would allow the adjudicators time to review the details of the accident, doctors' reports, and benefits could be processed, if necessary, at the 30-day period.

The implementation of a three-day waiting period could force injured workers with repetitive strain injuries to stay at work because they can't afford to report an injury. This could have serious repercussions by exacerbating an injury and costing the system more money in the long term.

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me. I just would like to advise you, you have one minute left.

Mr Williams: The original purpose of the board's medical advisers was to interpret medical opinions expressed by the treating physicians and specialists for the adjudicators. The board's doctors also assessed injured workers for permanent disability pensions prior to the inception of Bill 162.

Unit medical advisers' opinions usually conflict with medical reports sent by the family physicians and specialists. Interpretations are often misconstrued to the adjudicator and it is the injured worker who suffers.

One solution for saving money would be to get rid of the board doctors. With the implementation of the new mediation system, adjudicators and mediation officers will be speaking directly with the treating physicians. There will be no need for board doctors to intervene; their jobs will be redundant.

I would like to thank you for the opportunity of allowing me to make this presentation on behalf of the Durham Region Injured Workers and the southeast district of the network.

The Vice-Chair: We thank you very much, and having used the full 15 minutes there won't be time tonight for questions and answers. But thank you for coming.

ONTARIO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Vice-Chair: I would ask the representatives of the Ontario Chamber of Commerce to come forward, please. Good evening. I'd like you to introduce yourselves, please, if you would, and identify whom you're representing.

Mr Steve Raymond: My name is Steve Raymond and I am the chair of the Ontario Chamber of Commerce's employer/employee relations committee. I am one of the thousands of volunteers across this province who donate their time to chambers of commerce throughout this province. I have with me Ian Cunningham, who is the director of policy for the Ontario Chamber of Commerce.

I'd like to take you to our submission, which I hope you all now have, and I have attached to it the submission that the chamber made to the Royal Commission on Workers' Compensation this past spring. I draw that to your attention because of the statements that are made there by the chamber of commerce on the issue of workers' compensation.

You will see in the introduction, which is the first page of that submission, that in recent surveys done by the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, workers' compensation has received a significant priority from our members. In fact, in 1995 our survey of chamber members indicated that repairing the workers' compensation system was exceeded as a priority issue by only the elimination of Ontario's deficit and the existing debt load. In other words, for our members, fixing workers' compensation was the second most important thing that government should direct its efforts towards, and it with in that background that we come now and present to you on Bill 15.

Just by way of background, the chamber, as many of you will know, is a business association that represents over 65,000 employers in the province of Ontario. Our members include large and small enterprises in all sectors of the economy and from every region of the province. We believe, therefore, that we come to you and speak as—I don't want to undermine other business groups that come before you, but we come and we speak with perhaps the broadest membership of any business organization that will appear in front of you, and I've already told you what our members think about workers' compensation.

In our view, there are three significant reforms in Bill 15. Those are governance, the introduction of increased financial accountability and efforts made at fraud and revenue loss. I'd like to speak briefly about each of those three issues, and I may make some passing comments about some of the other reforms in the bill.

Obviously the key issue with the governance is the new board of directors of the Workers' Compensation Board. We think there are a couple of things this committee should consider in relation to the board of directors.

First of all, we'd like to tell you about what our board of directors would look like. We think members of the board of directors should possess the following personal qualities, attitudes and experiences: One of those is experience making a positive contribution as a director of a large organization because, after all, that is what the job is; second, to have a business-mindedness and an ability to understand financial statements; third, someone who is a strategic thinker; fourth, someone who has an ability to consolidate and analyse complex information.

In terms of experience, we think it's critical that actuarial and insurance experience be present because, after all, the workers' compensation system is an insurance system. We would recommend, therefore, that the new chair and president have strong actuarial and insurance background and knowledge.

The bill, as it now is, refers to the board of directors as being "representatives of workers, employers and such others that the Lieutenant Governor in Council considers appropriate." In the chamber's view this section must be looked at and clarified so that we do not end up with a board of directors that is bipartite. The failed experiment of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency where the board of directors was bipartite is proof enough to the government that we ought not to replace that failed experiment of bipartism with a new board of directors that is also bipartite.

We therefore recommend that representatives have the following skills and/or views: the employer perspective; the worker perspective; actuarial expertise; insurance expertise; medical or scientific expertise; and financial expertise.

We suggest one subtle but significant change to the act in this area: that the representatives should be "from" the business or worker communities, not representatives "of" the worker or business communities. We think that one change of the one word is a significant one that would move this bill away from the chaos that was part of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency and the problems that the Workers' Compensation Board had when the two main stakeholders simply faced off at the board of directors level. We have to move beyond that. We have to go multi-stakeholder and we have to emphasize personal skills of these people who are running a very complex and difficult organization.

In terms of financial viability, there is one significant addition that Bill 15 provides to the Workers' Compensation Act and that is section 0.1, which makes the entire purpose of the bill subject to acting "in a financially responsible and accountable manner." All the purposes of the act flow within that framework. It's important, we believe, that this be given further emphasis.

There's nothing in the purpose clause itself that talks about the board of directors approaching problems, approaching issues with fiscal responsibility. That is in the bill, in section 7, I believe, where it says, "The board of directors shall act in a financially responsible and accountable manner in exercising its powers and performing its duties."

But the obligation of all parts of the workers' compensation system, ie, and most importantly, the WCB board and adjudicators at the WCB board—they don't have that same obligation, in our view, and the purpose clause could be strengthened by adding a section, that one of the purposes of the act is to have a compensation system that is financially responsible and accountable to the people who pay the freight, and that, after all, is the employers.

Before I leave financial viability, I would like to stress that we do support the responsibility and accountability that are enshrined in sections 4, 17, 18 and 19 of the bill. Those responsibilities and accountabilities are shared by employers and workers alike and they make it clear that the system does not provide a free ride to any individual.

Finally, as it relates to fraud and revenue loss, it's certain that the provisions of Bill 15 strengthen the ability of the board to pursue fraud or revenue loss in a helpful and straightforward manner. However, in our view, the changes need to go further.

Fraud that is perpetuated upon the workers' compensation should be dealt with harshly. Fraud is a criminal act and should be pursued as such. There are provinces that deal with fraud as a criminal matter and there should be some recognition that fraud can be pursued not only by the board but by the police as well, because the fraud is on all stakeholders: It's on employers, it's on workers, it's on everybody.

In terms of the value-for-money audits, we are supportive of this introduction in Bill 15. We think this is a very overdue and necessary change.

Finally, one suggestion: that the government consider a low-cost but effective means of communicating these changes in as broad a manner as possible.

It's our view that if you communicate these changes broadly to the community—the amount of compliance with the changes, particularly the fraud changes, the changes in terms of financial accountability of employers and workers—you will have a higher compliance rate if these are understood. You have to find some method for providing that information.

In conclusion, I'd like to say a few final things about Bill 15. First of all, the chamber and the chamber movement are very supportive of the amendments contained in Bill 15. The minister, in her bill, has a great first step in repairing a system that was badly in need of repair.

Obviously, the changes proposed here cannot be viewed in isolation and must only be viewed as a first and necessary step on the road to the restoration of the system's financial viability and security. A clear and concerted effort must be made to continue this process of change. We would strongly urge this committee not to diminish the proposals in Bill 15 throughout or by the committee process. Future amendments must ensure that benefit levels are reviewed, issues of entitlement are addressed and further worker obligations are imposed. The chamber movement is confident that the changes that are introduced in Bill 15 are an important first step and a valuable first step in righting the previous wrongs.

Thank you. Those are all our submissions.

The Vice-Chair: We do thank you for your presentation and comments and we have two and a half minutes left of the 15 minutes' allocated time for questions and answers. The member from the third party can start tonight.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. I find it interesting that your brief traces perfectly the outline of the government. I can't see an exception here, so far.

I would point out again that in bold letters you point to a "financial crisis...a crisis of confidence," supporting the government's need to show that everything is a crisis to justify the draconian measures it's taking in a whole host of areas: a heavy emphasis on fraud, as if that's the problem too, that in large part there are massive amounts of fraud and that's the problem; again focus, implicitly at least, on the credentials and capabilities of prior board members—you talk about "a clear message...that the system does not provide a 'free ride,'" in bold letters again; you've noted, and I'm quoting, in the past "that the unfunded liability is the product of benefit levels that are simply too high."

I would like to challenge all of those, and in particular I'd like to challenge the concept that you make; I'm surprised that you would make a statement like this as definitive as you have, "that the unfunded liability is the product of benefit levels that are simply too high." I would suggest to you with a great deal of respect that in 1985, when the cost-of-living increases were included, there was a proposal that would have allowed that to be paid for along the way. It was rejected or resisted by employers on the board at that time—some of them, enough to block the passage of a policy that would allow that to be paid for. The financial improvements package would have had the unfunded liability completely gone by 2014. There was some compromise on the part of the worker employees but they're the ones who supported that proposal. It was the employers who didn't.

I would suggest to you, and offer to let you make comment, that if indeed employers had been paying an appropriate amount throughout the history of the WCB, we would have lower costs now, and that our costs in the future would be lower yet because there would be real incentive to make sure that we provide real safe workplaces for workers, and at the end of the day business would have gotten a better deal. By being so very shortsighted—

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me, but if you have a question—

Mr Christopherson: Was it turning into a speech?

The Vice-Chair: It's a speech and the problem is that the time is now up.

Mr Christopherson: I finally got the floor after listening to all these damned presentations. Anyway, I would end there.

Interjections.

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me.

Mr Christopherson: I would end there and ask—

Interjection: Do you really want input?

Mr Christopherson: All I've been getting is input. We want a little output.

In summary I would just suggest to you, and indeed flip it around: Had employers been paying adequately along the way, they'd have been doing themselves the greatest service in the world in addition to the workers.

Mr Raymond: Mr Christopherson, I certainly thank you for your question, although I'm frankly troubled by it and I don't know how to respond within the time that's been given.

The Vice-Chair: It's all right by me.

Mr Baird: That's the problem for us all.

Mr Raymond: Let me just say very quickly, on behalf of the chamber movement and business communities, I'm frustrated that you would indicate that you're tired of these "damned submissions." We're dealing with a very significant problem for the economy of the province of Ontario here today.

I would hope that our submissions would be taken in that light and, regardless of what happened in 1985, we now find ourselves, in 1995, with the problems we have in this province and we have to work together to fix those problems. It has been just that type of attitude from a certain community that has prevented the opportunity to fix the system over the past few years.

Mr Christopherson: On a point of privilege—when you're finished.

Mr Raymond: Those are all my submissions.

Mr Christopherson: Good. My point of privilege is that I was making reference to the fact that in rotation we can't ask questions for a long period of time. That's why I was asking a rather long-winded question.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. I don't mean to be rude, but I do have to cease this presentation at this time, in fairness to others. I do thank you very much for your coming here tonight and presenting your position.

Mr Raymond: Thank you very much.

ONTARIO HOTEL AND MOTEL ASSOCIATION

The Vice-Chair: I would ask that the representatives from the Ontario Hotel and Motel Association come forward, please, and for the sake of Hansard and the committee members, please introduce yourself.

Mr Rod Seiling: My name is Rod Seiling. I'm president of the Ontario Hotel and Motel Association. The Ontario Hotel and Motel Association, OHMA, would like to thank the members of the committee for the opportunity to appear before you today.

We are firmly committed to working with the government to ensure Ontario has a workers' compensation system that is affordable, competitive and sustainable. We would suggest that most everyone would agree the current system fails on all three counts. This concerns us greatly, not just from a business perspective but also that with an unfunded liability of $11.4 billion, injured workers' benefits are at risk as well.

Our association is the largest in the province representing the accommodation and hospitality industry. We have over 1,000 members located all across the province. A recent government study indicated the accommodation and the food and beverage sectors within the tourism industry represented about 105,000 direct jobs and over $7 billion in expenditures.

The OHMA has been active for the past couple of years participating in a number of initiatives to bring about positive reform of the system. These reforms were directed to the structure of the WCB, its accountability and substantive economic changes. Bill 15, we believe, deals with the first two aforementioned issues. Meaningful economic reform, as we understand it, is to be dealt with by the minister for the WCB, the Honourable Cam Jackson.

We applaud the government for taking quick, positive action. Everyone agrees the system is in crisis. We simply cannot afford more time delays for more studies before acting. Continued inaction will only exacerbate the problems and make it more difficult to put in effect a meaningful and realistic solution.

The OHMA, therefore, supports the two-stage process the government is undertaking: structural reform followed by substantive economic reform.

With respect to governance, the OHMA supports the change to a multi-stakeholder board of directors responsible for the long-term viability of the WCB. A bipartite governance structure did not work. It was confrontational and paralysed meaningful decision-making. This only served to make the problem of the unfunded liability insoluble.

Justice Roach, in his 1950 royal commission report on the WCB, stated and I quote:

"This act should be considered for what it is and was originally intended to be, namely, a scheme by which compensation is provided in respect of injuries to workers in industry. It is not a system for dispensing charity. It is not unemployment insurance. It is not social legislation for the purpose of elevating the standard of one group in society at the expense of another."

He went on to say: "I will have occasion to point out later that certain amendments which have been introduced into the act since it was originally passed are really in the nature of social legislation and a departure from the original scheme and purpose of the act. The effect of those amendments has been to impose upon industry burdens which should be borne by society generally."

"If the true purposes...of the act are adhered to, justice will be done as between industry and labour. If, on the other hand, those purposes are lost sight of, or this act from time to time be regarded as a convenient place into which to put legislation which in substance is social and not compensatory, it may become very much distorted. In the result, labour will continue to be relieved from unjust burdens which it suffered too long under the common law but an injustice will be done to industry by placing on its shoulders burdens which should be borne by society generally."

It is interesting to note that in 1967 the Honourable Justice McGillivray in his royal commission report on the WCB reiterated Justice Roach's comments as still valid. The OHMA would agree with that statement as it relates to the present.

The proposed changes, therefore, are that important first step in moving the WCB away from that of a social welfare system and back to an insurance system for injuries experienced by workers at the workplace. That was the intent of the 1915 agreement whereby injured workers gave up their right to sue an employer in exchange for a system of compensation.

For this to happen, the WCB must be operated as an insurance system based on sound business principles. This means the board of directors must become responsible for the long-term economic health of the system.

Reducing the size of the board to nine members and having its composition selected from a multi-stakeholder base will benefit the system, as decisions will be based on sound business principles. It will also ensure the acquisition of the required professional resources to provide the board with the information it will need to make the hard choices it will be forced to make.

The revised memorandum of understanding, which includes a clear policy direction role for the government, will ensure the system becomes accountable to its superior, the government. We believe that type of accountability must be there to ensure that policy, as defined by the government of the day, is carried out.

The OHMA supports the changes to the purpose clauses. Specifically, I refer to the opening phrase, "The purpose of this act is to accomplish the following in a financially responsible and accountable manner."

We also support the inclusion of the following two objectives: to prevent or reduce the occurrence of injuries and occupational diseases at work, and to promote health and safety in the workplace. The WCB, we believe, can and should play a leading role in the ongoing effort to ensure we have proactive and effective workplace health and safety programs. The WCB, therefore, is the logical place for the responsibility for the workplace health and safety program.

The OHMA has put forth this position to the workplace health and safety task force. We believe an integrated approach with sector-specific programs and delivery organizations answerable to the respective industry will ensure a safe and healthier workplace. A better-educated workforce will lead to reduced levels of claims and less stress on the system. Lower costs translate directly into a more competitive industry.

We also support the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal, WCAT, being included within the purview of the new purpose clause. This body must have applied to it the same levels of governance and accountability as the WCB.

The move to eliminate fraud by implementing preventive measures and identifying areas of potential fraud is to be commended. Perception is reality, and if the WCB is to regain the support it needs to renew itself, it must eliminate the perception that the system is full of abuse and is unaccountable.

Substantive economic reform must follow in the near short term if the system is to be saved from its current crisis. This means Minister Jackson's reform package must be ready early in the coming year. Specifically, this reform package needs to include the 5% reduction in assessment rates as promised; the introduction of a three-day waiting period; the definition of an injury; the alignment of benefit levels to neighbouring and competing jurisdictions; the strict adherence to the Friedland formula, no exceptions; experience rating must be retained—it has been a positive force in reducing claims; modifications need to be made to benefit levels of old claims to reduce pressure on the system; and a re-examination of the $200 per month for life supplements, and then payable only to age 65 where the loss was caused by a work-related injury.

We suggest claims performance should drive the price of the system. Improved new claims performance must result in reduced WCB assessment rates. Additionally, the costs of old claims need to be reduced and the WCB overhead costs must be controlled.

In conclusion, the OHMA supports the measures introduced by the government in Bill 15. We view it as an important first step in getting at the root problems inherent in the system. However, it must be quickly followed by the more substantive economic reforms. Only then can the crisis which has gripped the WCB for too long be ended. The WCB is too important a component of Ontario's socioeconomic fabric not to give it the chance that Bill 15 is finally providing.

The Vice-Chair: We thank you for your presentation as well. We do have seven minutes left for some question-and-answer time. The government side has the first question.

Mr Carroll: A quick question. Mr Seiling, thanks very much for your presentation. Several of the labour groups that have come before us have told us that the $11.4-billion unfunded liability was not a debt, was nothing to be concerned about, it was almost like a game with mirrors. How do you feel about that $11.4-billion unfunded liability?

Mr Seiling: I guess they've gone to a different accounting school than I went to. I believe it is a debt, and we're concerned about the ability of the system to pay the money that is owed, because it's a debt to the injured workers. Our concern is that without addressing it positively, their benefits are in doubt down the road. So certainly in our view it is a debt and it's a debt owing to those workers themselves.

Mr Duncan: Have you been invited to consult with the minister responsible for the WCB, Mr Jackson, with respect to the second part of his reforms?

Mr Seiling: We've had preliminary discussions with him and expect to be involved in the consultation process, yes.

Mr Duncan: So you have had preliminary discussions with the minister himself?

Mr Seiling: No, I didn't say I had preliminary discussions on a consultation basis. I said that we expect to be part of that process and that we've expressed an interest in being part of that process.

Mr Duncan: As of yet, have you been invited to be part of that process?

Mr Seiling: No, we have not received a formal invitation.

Mr Duncan: Just one other question with respect to the fraud offences, the new part V of the act. One of the issues that's been raised by a couple of business groups is the notion of red tape and the bureaucracy surrounding the board. Does your organization have any concerns with the type of bureaucracy that might be imposed on your members as a result of the 10-day filing requirements and some of the other I think rather onerous clauses in the bill with respect to the potential for further red tape and WCB bureaucracy?

Mr Seiling: It's our view that if we're going to bring accountability to the system, we can't just expect one side to be accountable; we have to have both sides. Therefore, if the system is to be fair, it's got to appear to be fair to both sides. So yes, while it may put some of my members in a position where they have to do some things within a certain time frame, I don't think that we can expect that to be perceived as not being fair if we're expecting certain things on the other side as well.

Mr Duncan: So then your members aren't concerned about the paperwork—

Mr Seiling: I didn't say we're not concerned, but I think it's one of perception, an issue of fairness. If you're in business and you've got rules and regulations to adhere to and if this leads to a system which fixes the problems, then I think we can live with it.

Mr Christopherson: I think you had a chance to hear my earlier speech-slash-question, so I won't repeat it. In fact, what I'd like to do is to take the opportunity of the time that's available to ask you, if you can recall most of it, to give me your thoughts on it, the premise being that rather than trying to blame the victims, which is the way we see all of this, that if indeed the employers had been paying the amount necessary to pay the injured workers what they were entitled to, we wouldn't have this fiscal problem and in fact we'd be in a stronger position now and in the future.

Mr Seiling: With respect, I couldn't agree with your premise for a number of reasons. One, the employers some time ago agreed to increased rates which would eliminate the unfunded liability. In fact, it hasn't done that; it's grown. This is also an issue of competitiveness, and if we're to regain jobs and have Ontario and our businesses compete—because we do compete; we don't compete with one another as much as we compete with businesses in other provinces and in other countries. We have to have a cost structure that reflects that ability.

For example, you referenced earlier the financial improvement package. That was a great package. Business was to pay again. That's what it was. One of the things was to get rid of NEER, and NEER has demonstrated that it is the carrot that helps to reduce the incidence of workplace injury and also helps to get injured workers back to work faster. We don't view that as being beneficial to the system.

Mr Christopherson: I hear your points. I don't agree with them, but I hear them clearly. If I can, you made the comment, "Business has to pay again." In fairness, in 1915, wasn't that the agreement? The agreement was, workers would give up the right to sue under any conditions, regardless of how much they may have had a case. They gave all that up, but the employer, on the other hand, and the province agreed to pay enough premiums to cover the costs of replacing wages and benefits for workers injured on the job. Isn't somewhat contradictory to the original intent of the WCB to say, "Business has to pay again"?

Mr Seiling: I would suggest to you that business has, and I would also suggest to you that the agreement back in 1915, if you go back to Justice Roach's comments, the system was to be an insurance-based system, not a social system. Governments over the years have added more and more to it to increase the cost of the system to business.

What we're asking for is to return the system to its original intent. If you were in the normal business world and you were the management and the board of directors in charge of the WCB, you would have been fired a long time ago. You wouldn't still be there. I would suggest to you very strongly that the System hasn't been run as an insurance-based system. What we're asking to do is take it back to its original intent, as you suggested it was supposed to be. That's what we're saying: Let's put it back on sound business principles and operate it as an insurance system, as it was originally intended to be.

Mr Christopherson: I would see the irony in that position being the fact that for 40 years, Tories made the appointments to the WCB.

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me, Mr Christopherson. We're out of time again and you've had a supplementary to your original question.

Thank you very much for coming before us.

AUTOMOTIVE PARTS MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

The Vice-Chair: I would ask representatives from the Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association to come forward. Welcome. Introduce yourselves to the committee members and for Hansard purposes.

Mr Ken MacDonald: My name is Ken MacDonald and I represent the APMA. Briefly, the Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association represents 400 companies that supply to GM, Ford, Chrysler and the other major assemblers in the auto industry. The membership employs collectively over 81,500 workers and will have produced goods worth about $23 billion in 1995.

The APMA strongly supports the goals of Bill 15. My purpose for being here this evening mainly is to propose some incremental changes to the wording of certain provisions.

I've arranged to have circulated to you the letter of today's date. I propose first to add to section 21.1—which is on page 2 of the bill, if you have that before you—a third subsection that would provide for a setoff. It would provide that the board may set off an overpayment against any payment the board is required to make to a person to whom that overpayment has been made.

It's an additional option to the board to ensure that if an overpayment is made, it can reduce a subsequent payment by a certain amount to offset the loss from the overpayment. It's an extra option. I don't see any downside to it at all. Nothing in that provision would require the board to take an onerous position to require a worker to go without money for weeks and weeks because of early overpayment. The board can do it incrementally, but it is that option. I'd suggest that it be added. It's something that I saw in the BC Workers' Compensation Act, to give that due credit.

I also suggest that section 22.1, which is on the same page of the bill, be amended by adding a requirement that notice to the board be in writing. I think the merits of that pretty much speak for themselves. If you're going to require someone to report material change in circumstances, the board would find it much more helpful to have that notice in writing. Of course, if the offence provision is to have teeth, then you want the requirement to include a written notice; otherwise, you're going to be in a situation with one person saying, "Well, I phoned the board," and the other person saying, "Well, no, I didn't hear about that," one person's word over another's. You want to have the assurance that if notice is given, it's done in writing.

Thirdly, section 158 on page 8 of the bill, if you wish to turn to that: It's a provision that creates an offence for obstructing or hindering an inspection. As presently worded, this section limits that offence to inspections under subsection 113(1) or to examinations or inquiries under subsection 111(1). Why limit it? I propose that a person who obstructs or hinders any examination, any inspection or any inquiry be guilty of an offence. As the bill stands now, it will omit such inquiries as those under section 25, for example.

Section 161 is the next provision. I'm going through the bill, not in order of importance, but rather in the order they appear in the bill. Subsection 161(6), on page 9, very helpfully creates an opportunity for the board to file a certified copy with the court for enforcement purposes. Very useful. Again, I ask that it not be limited to orders under subsection 161(5), but extended to any order that the board may be making that involves the collection of money. Note that given that money paid for fines is payable to the board, it seems appropriate that the board be empowered to take the initiative on the collection of fines or on any collection of moneys and to have the benefit, the convenience of court enforcement.

Also, in subsection 161(8) the provision states that if two years pass from the date of the most recent act or omission that would be the basis for an offence, the prosecution shall not be commenced. I would suggest that freedom from prosecution is a bit too generous. I would propose that it be changed to six years, to be in conformance with the Limitations Act, which would give a person in a civil dispute six years; that is to say, only after six years would the issue no longer be legally commenceable in any court.

Finally, section 163 on page 9, the maximum fine there that is indicated for an individual, $25,000: I see a concern there in that potentially a wrong done to the board could involve a very considerable amount of money, particularly in the case of a long-term disability benefit. We are talking about a maximum penalty here. I suggest that the maximum be raised. It does not mean that the average penalty being imposed is going to be raised, but it gives the court or it gives whatever adjudicator that much flexibility for the occasional circumstance where you have a very egregious or very exceptional wrong being perpetrated against the board and there were exceptionally large amounts of money at stake.

Those are all my submissions on Bill 15.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much. We have lots of time now for questions and answers. I would like to start with the opposition party.

Mrs Sandra Pupatello (Windsor-Sandwich): You have 81,000 members in your organization?

Mr MacDonald: That would not be correct. We have 400 companies employing about 81,000.

Mrs Pupatello: What is the largest company that is your member?

Mr MacDonald: Magna International.

Mrs Pupatello: And then what are other examples?

Mr MacDonald: Other large ones would be SKD, Johnson Controls, Lear Seating, the Woodbridge Group.

Mrs Pupatello: Okay. So it's safe to say that your comments represent all of those groups, so they would have likely been consulted in your presentation today?

Mr MacDonald: We certainly had consultation with members drawn from the large and the small within our organization. We know that as a trade association we would be creating problems for ourselves if we did not consult with the small employers as well as the large.

Mrs Pupatello: But your paper today represents those views of those members you mentioned?

Mr MacDonald: It represents a synopsis of discussions we had.

Mrs Pupatello: Okay. What is your opinion of the liability issue with the WCB? Do you feel that the unfunded liability is truly a liability?

Mr MacDonald: I could not be more articulate than my friend Mr Seiling a few moments ago, but if I were to answer the question, my own individual view on this is that the size of the unfunded liability is not even pertinent to Bill 15 and the issues that are, I think, before us tonight. Even if there were only an insignificant unfunded liability, the provisions that are set out in Bill 15, together my suggested changes, would still make good sense.

Mrs Pupatello: That's the opinion of the organization you're representing as well?

Mr MacDonald: Correct. I'm here on their behalf.

Mr Christopherson: Are most of the companies in your association unionized or non-unionized?

Mr MacDonald: About half are unionized.

Mr Christopherson: Most of those unionized would be auto workers?

Mr MacDonald: They're the largest union, yes.

Mr Christopherson: I ask because I do want to press on with matters that are in Bill 15 regarding the bipartite board, which arguably is the most important thing in Bill 15. I would argue it's merely meant to allow the government to load up their people on the board to carry out the decimation of benefits to workers in the spring, but that remains to be seen.

I want to ask about bipartism and how you feel about it, given that the auto workers' union in the parts sector has, at the admission of employers, been working closely with employers to the benefit of the company. Productivity is up and profits are up, and would it not make sense that carrying over that kind of cooperation into the WCB is a good way to go when the vested interests at stake are both employer and workers?

Mr MacDonald: What I see in Bill 15 is a continuance of a multi-stakeholder model that, while it's not polarized, if earlier models were, it does represent workers, as it does employers, as it hopefully will represent other interested groups as well. I don't see anything in the bill that would indicate any loss of representation for workers, frankly.

Mr Christopherson: But on the contrary, they lose the 50% representation they now have.

Mr MacDonald: They will be represented together with others.

Mr Christopherson: But it won't be 50%. I would point out that given that the two stakeholders—and it was admitted by one of the employer groups that was here—the two major stakeholders are employers and employees, if they have to make some difficult decisions, whatever they might be, if the worker representatives on there feel that they have to be there to protect the turf as much as they can, but aren't really partners the way they were under the existing legislation, you're not going to get the kind of cooperation that would benefit the WCB, and therefore business in the long run, the most. Wouldn't you agree?

Mr MacDonald: I see there being a role for a lot more than just the workers and the employers, and both of those are represented. If there's going to be a severely lopsided appointment process—that would be speculation.

Mr Maves: The Ontario Chamber of Commerce, which was a few presenters before you, said that WCB reform was the second most important issue to employers of the chamber of commerce.

In my riding of Niagara Falls, in 1993, there was a survey done of 110 manufacturing companies which at the time were left in Niagara Falls. They listed what they thought were the most severe disadvantages to doing business in Ontario and Workers' Compensation Board premiums and the Workers' Compensation Board system was the third-biggest disadvantage.

With that in mind, I'll put this as a two-parter so as not to lose my supplemental: (a) Would you say that this is true of the folks you represent in your umbrella organization? and (b) We heard I think it was a CUPE organizer say that in order to get rid of the unfunded liability we should look at increasing premiums on employers in Ontario up to three times. What effect would that have on people in your business, as far as staying in Ontario and investing in Ontario?

Mr MacDonald: Answering (a) first, let me say by introduction that the industry that I'm representing is one that is peculiarly closely tied to American industry in that all of our members have as their biggest customers by far American-based companies—GM, Ford, Chrysler; some production to transplants, we call them—Toyota, Honda—but by far to American customers. These American customers, as you can imagine, scrutinize more closely than probably anyone else cost advantages vis-à-vis one jurisdiction over another.

As things stand now, there is a small cost advantage in terms of labour costs to building auto parts in Ontario vis-à-vis any American state. Although adjusted for exchange rates, if you take the wages of Canadian workers, they may be marginally higher than American, the health care costs of American factories are significantly greater, such that at the end of the day labour costs are lower in Canada. So health care costs are not a major concern in the sense of their being too high in Canada, that we're losing workers on account of that. If we see a rise in premiums, then of course we'd lose that advantage. We wouldn't say now that health care costs are way higher than—

Mr Maves: WCB premium costs are—

Mr MacDonald: WCB premiums would only be a portion, of course, of overall health care costs. You can imagine that OHIP and its equivalent in the United States comes into the formula as well.

Mr Maves: So (a) was, is this a major concern, increased costs to your group, and (b) what kind of effect would it—

Mr MacDonald: So (b) would be, what would be the effect of a major increase in premiums? It would be to probably erase the cost advantage that Canadian producers enjoy. I'd say that the advantage was in the area of health costs.

The Vice-Chair: You've now closed out the 15 minutes of your presentation and question and answer time. I do thank you on behalf of the committee.

GREATER PETERBOROUGH
CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Vice-Chair: I'd ask the representative from the Greater Peterborough Chamber of Commerce to come forward and introduce yourself, please, to the committee and for Hansard purposes.

Mr Don Frise: My name is Don Frise. I'm the general manager of the Greater Peterborough Chamber of Commerce. Maybe I could just start by telling you a little bit about who we are. We've been in business for over 106 years continuously. We have about 1,000 members, employing about 20,000 employees locally, and we are part of the Ontario Chamber of Commerce. We're the people who are working in the trenches with our members. Our members tend to be small business; a lot of them tend to be in the service sector.

Peterborough, as I learned back when I was going to high school here in Toronto, used to be regarded as a bellwether community and today I think it still is a bellwether community in a lot of regards. We've been rediscovered along those lines in that we have a typical cross-section of industry. In fact, I understand in the last 11 elections federally we've only voted against the government once. So we're being rediscovered as a place to come and look for opinion. My job is to try and keep in touch with our members and find out where they stand.

The Ontario Chamber of Commerce told you, when it made its submission, that the WCB was a very important issue to its members. I can tell you that, just as they've said, when we have polled our members over the last number of years—and we've had a lot of occasion to do that—it's come up as one of the highest on the list. In fact, when we take government debt and deficit and government-imposed red tape out of the process, WCB comes up very high. That's maybe even more significant when you think that about probably 60% of our members are actually now in the service business and a lot of them don't even have to participate in the WCB program. So you can understand how significant they think it is.

I'm not going to particularly talk about Bill 15 this evening. I think our members from the Ontario chamber have already talked about that. I've given you a submission that we presented to the royal commission earlier this spring, and I'll be covering some of the points that are in there, but in a slightly different fashion.

What I'd like to talk a bit more about in a more macro way is what our concerns are regarding workers' compensation. I'm hoping that as you're designing the legislation to control this very important program in the province, you'll be keeping some of those thoughts in mind, because obviously we have to know what we want to accomplish before we can start accomplishing it.

The very first thing is how very concerned we are about the program itself. Over the last few years, our members and their employers and employees have stated time after time that the system just doesn't work. Employers, with considerable justification, feel they're paying too much for a system that doesn't seem to be able to differentiate between legitimate claims and those that are questionable. It seems to take forever to make even simple decisions. Employees complain of monumental red tape and bureaucracy and problems with receiving benefits. We've heard that time after time in the different opportunities we've had to make submissions over the last few years.

As to the unfunded liability that people have been asking about this evening, most definitely our members think it's a debt. To tell you the truth, if I were one of the persons on workers' compensation, and say that was a pension rather than my workers' compensation, I'd try to be making alternative arrangements for my long-term support. If the money is not there and there's a debt in its place, I would be really concerned about where the system is going, if I were an employee as well as an employer.

Of course the cost, the burden to business, that we currently have is also of concern. We've said time after time, as business organizations, that payroll taxes are job killers. I was talking to somebody today and I don't think they really understood what we were talking about when we said they're job killers, because they said: "You know, we're only talking a few cents, a couple of dollars. What difference is that going to make? If we roll back UI, if we roll back workers' compensation, how is that going to make a difference?"

I said to them, "Let me tell you an old story," and this really is an old story, so bear with me. There are two hunters out in the woods. A bear comes upon them and they throw everything off and prepare to run like heck. The one guy starts to put on his running shoes, and the other fellow says: "Why are you putting on your running shoes? You can't outrun that bear." He says: "I don't have to outrun the bear. I just have to outrun you."

Basically, where we're at today in business is that we've got the runners on, we've thrown everything off and we're going like hell. But our competition is all around us. Our competition is on my computer screen on the Internet. I can now buy stuff in the UK or in the United States or in New Zealand or Australia as easily as I can walk across the street and buy my product over there. We are in a heck of a race. We need all the help we can get.

What we're talking about is not a couple of cents or a dollar. What we're talking about is that if business is successful, not only do they get to employ more people but they get to keep the people they already have and those employees get to keep their jobs. We aren't talking about a difference of a couple of cents; we're talking about the difference between success and failure, which has a tremendous multiplying effect. When I was talking to the person about that, I think they finally started to understand what we were talking about.

Another thing that's been coming out loud and clear in some of the meetings we've been having locally is that another thing's happening due to the increase in payroll taxes. We've heard about the GST and the PST, and I understand 50 new auditors are going to be hired as part of the recent financial statement. But we have all kinds of people working as part of the underground economy now, some of them semi-legitimate and some of them not. Most of them tend not to be members of the chamber of commerce, and we don't have a lot of direct communication with them. But I guess I'm a little concerned that some of those auditors are going to be knocking on the doors of our members because they're a lot easier to find than the guys who are out working for cash.

Those guys aren't paying workers' compensation and they're aren't paying anything else, but you aren't going to find them through the process of additional auditors because they are out there for the reason that they find it easier to do it that way than to work in a legitimate fashion. But if they get injured—to tie it back into what we're talking about this evening—they become part of the social problem we have in the province.

Those are a couple of things we're really concerned about as business people.

One of the other things that really got us going when we were talking back in the spring was that the government at that time was talking about extending the program. If I could go back to the submission we made at that time, we said then:

"At a time when most people agree that the system doesn't work, we understand the government is considering extending the system to make it mandatory for all in the province to be covered. As Einstein said, 'We can't solve the problems with the same thinking that we used to create the problems.' Taking a system that doesn't work and forcing all businesses to participate will do nothing but exacerbate the problem."

"We assume that when workers' compensation was first introduced in 1914 there were few, if any, alternative methods of protecting workers. We believe that today there are alternatives that are not only equivalent to but in fact are superior to the protection offered under WCB. As an example, we now have approximately 7,000 businesses in Canada that are protected under the chambers of commerce group insurance program. The chambers' own staff are protected 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and at a cost that's considerably less than would be available through WCB. If we were forced to add workers' compensation in our office, we would not be able to afford the superior level of coverage currently offered to our employers. Clearly, this would not be in the interests of the employees or the employer."

In fact we went on to say, "We really believe that the only way to bring about meaningful change in an organization such as the Workers' Compensation Board is to provide true competition for the organization. This is the only way that the organization will be forced to become more efficient and more effective. One only has to look at what's happened with long distance rates and the service provided to telephone users since competition was increased in that industry to understand what effect increased competition would have on the Workers' Compensation Board system."

"Not only do we believe that it would be absolutely ludicrous to extend the workers' compensation system to a system of full mandatory coverage, but we believe it's absolutely essential that the government of Ontario take immediate action to allow private insurance to compete with WCB and to allow employers to opt out of the workers' compensation program"—and the following is underlined—"providing that the employers are able to provide comparable coverage from another source." We believe this coverage is required, it's necessary, it's a program we have to have, but let's do it in the most cost-effective way. "We believe that this is the only way we will ever get the organization back on track."

That's what we had to say at that time.

Some of the principles we believe you should be looking at, and I hope and I think you are:

Obviously, it has to be effective and well-organized; the needs of the users have to be handled in a prompt and a responsive way. We believe there also should be a responsiveness to both local and provincial needs.

We suggested in the brief we made back at that time that you might take a look at the way the unemployment insurance system is set up, with its tribunal process and the appeals boards made up of employees, employers and a chair. For those of you who may not be aware, any appeals going through the system right now in our particular locale are handled in less than 30 days, not the four years or more that I understand it can take to get to WCAT. There's been a lot of criticism of the unemployment insurance system, but there might be some things you could take a look at and learn from in the way they're operating. They aren't doing nearly as bad a job as some people think they are.

We believe there has to be an incentive built in for workers to return to work. We're making changes to UI now, we're making other changes. There has to be incentive built in to have them return to work, so when you're setting the compensation rates, obviously that has to be taken into account.

One other thing our members thought was really important was that there should be freedom of information regarding medical information on WCB claims. We believe that all pertinent information related to the claim should be made available to both the employer and the employee, even if this would require patient-doctor privilege being waived by statute.

We believe there also has to be a flexible approach in the application of the program. We understand that in some cases there are still considerable problems with the coding of businesses and that in some cases—we give an example of a person working for a construction business but working in the office being misclassified. There has to be some flexibility and of course it has to be done in a cost-effective way.

The last thing I would say is that if we're going to try to enforce it, it's got to be enforceable. Therefore, with things like stress-related claims, I think you should be very cautious. If you have anything to do with the final legislation that's going to affect that—I understand the Ontario Medical Association has refused to adjudicate in claims of stress, and if they aren't going to adjudicate, God knows how we're going to differentiate between the valid claims and the non-valid claims.

I think those are the things our members would have wanted me to say to you this evening.

Mr Christopherson: I'll try to ask a brief question, if that's possible for me, but first a quick statement.

Your story at the beginning was interesting. As I heard you say it, I thought that if the bear represented new legislation, when the person putting on the running shoes turns and says, "I just have to beat you," the "you" is the workers in this case, because they're the ones who are going to get eaten by the bear of this legislation.

Mr Frise: The bear is the international marketplace and other businesses.

Mr Christopherson: I would disagree with that, but I'm not going off on that one.

I want to ask a very short question. In terms of the privatization of the WCB, which you advocated in your March 1995 document, you said employers should be allowed to opt out. I'm curious. How would those who choose to opt out be held to account for that part of the ongoing public WCB that is legitimately part of their responsibility?

Mr Frise: They wouldn't be.

Mr Christopherson: So who pays the bill?

Mr Frise: The taxpayers. They're also taxpayers.

Mr Christopherson: Why? Why are the taxpayers paying the bill when this is an agreement between employers and workers?

Mr Frise: There is also a component in there that we believe, and I think most people believe, is a social component. Although, as I heard you explain before, the original process was between just employers and employees, obviously there are people on workers' compensation today for whom it's not strictly a work-related situation.

Mr Christopherson: I'd love to go on, believe me, but I did promise my colleagues that I'd give them a shot.

Mr Tascona: We've heard today that registration is a problem. You sort of commented on that in terms of the underground economy. The approach we're taking is requiring an employer to register within 10 days of becoming such. Do you agree with that approach? That's the first part. Second, what do you think about a revenue amnesty with respect to this registration problem?

Mr Frise: Could you explain what you mean by "revenue amnesty"?

Mr Tascona: For employers that are out there who—

Mr Frise: When I'm talking about underground economy, I'm talking about businesses that aren't reporting much of anything. They might be on unemployment insurance at the same time that they're out working. They aren't reporting anything. I don't think an amnesty would really have much effect on that kind of economy.

We're talking about people who are doing recreation rooms and dens and things like that. They're getting the person to buy the materials themselves, they're supplying the labour and they're working for cash. You just don't see them at all. They're totally invisible for most intents and purposes.

Mr Tascona: What's the solution to get them to register?

Mr Frise: We wrote a document a few years ago in response to Searching for Fairness, the taxation brief written at that time. We called ours, interestingly enough, Searching for Common Sense. We were saying at that time that the only way to really turn things around is that we have to strike an environment where it makes sense to have all businesses working within it in a legitimate fashion, and that meant we had to have a fair tax structure, one that made sense and one that was cost-effective. That would be my response to you.

Mrs Papatello: Much of the position you take is similar to that of the Ontario chamber. Much of it is, in principle and philosophy, what our party campaigned on: streamlining, improving the system etc.

I was surprised to see that you compared it to your chamber of commerce group insurance program for the chamber staff. Most that I've ever seen are service-oriented work in an office setting, and it's very difficult to compare that kind of employee group to Ford, GM, Chrysler, Magna, Lear, all the companies under the gentleman who was here first. I don't know that that's a fair comparison, with respect. Why did you include that?

Mr Frise: Because most of the net new jobs are being created in the small business sector; that's where it's happening. Again, we're typical of what's happening in Ontario and Canada. We used to be a very large manufacturing centre in the 1950s; over 50% of people living there were directly in manufacturing-related jobs. Now the predominant part of the sector we have is the service sector. That's where the people are going, that's where the businesses are being created.

Mrs Papatello: Would you probably agree, then, with the gentleman who was just here from APMA, the automotive parts, who said that at the end of the day the cost of labour is lower in Ontario than in any other state? That was Ken MacDonald, who was just here.

Mr Frise: It probably is, as long as we have a 74-cent dollar.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you for attending tonight and presenting your position to us.

L.A. LIVERSIDGE AND ASSOCIATES LTD

The Vice-Chair: May I please have the representatives from L.A. Liversidge and Associates. I would ask you to introduce yourselves, please, to the committee and for the purposes of Hansard.

Mr Les Liversidge: My name is Les Liversidge. I'm president of L.A. Liversidge and Associates Ltd. With me is Mr Michael Mitchell, who is vice-president of consulting services with my firm, and Mr George Nolis, who is manager of appeals with the firm.

We're a management consulting firm of 24 employees specializing in workers' compensation issues and provincially service a client base of approximately 500 corporations and organizations from all sectors of the economy. I presently serve as an executive member and consultant to the Employers' Council on Workers' Compensation, which I understand appeared earlier on today, which is a coalition of employer trade associations. I'm also a member of the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal advisory group.

Workers' compensation reform has been active and continuous in the province of Ontario for at least the last two decades. While the system still manages to provoke very sincere and oft-times very valid criticisms and while these criticisms appear to conserve some certain essential elements over time, the program of 1995 in my view bears very little resemblance, from a delivery and benefit perspective, to the program of, say, 1975, just 20 years ago.

If you're following along, I'm going to be editing as I go through this so that there perhaps is some time for questions. I'll be skipping ahead a little bit.

Since the early 1970s, the Ontario workers' compensation system has undergone a continual and almost complete overhaul. I am convinced that if the system of 1995 were somehow transported back in time to 1980, it would far exceed the expectations then of even the most ardent worker reformer on most fronts. Yet after two massive legislative adjustments—Bill 101 in 1984, which put in place a representative board of directors, the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal, the offices of the employer and worker adviser and the Occupational Disease Standards Panel, and Bill 162, which completely overhauled the benefit delivery structure, eliminating systemic over- and undercompensation, along with a very aggressive reorganization of the WCB itself—old criticisms persist and new ones still emerge.

Many observers may conclude, and not without some cause, that the attempts at reforms have failed, that they did not address the root problems of the system. If the test for success is the silencing of the critic, then I agree they have failed. But if the test is the refinement of the system to make it a little fairer, more responsive, those reforms did achieve a large element of success. While the system remains imperfect, the claimant of 1995 is infinitely better served than the claimant of not even a generation ago.

While the system has been responding administratively and legislatively as a direct result of those changes, the effective constituencies have become far more aware, more educated, more involved and likely less patient. The workers' compensation community, if indeed that designation is appropriate, of 1995 is far more cognizant, knowledgeable, sophisticated and demanding than the community of 1985, and certainly that of 1975.

Paradoxically, the very reforms that were demanded and which were delivered have launched increased and enhanced demands over time. The advent of the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal, a particularly significant and far-reaching institution which has set in motion a dynamic process of law reform that not only ensured individual cases would receive a higher standard of justice but significant and contentious issues would be openly debated, along with the creation of a representative board of directors in 1985, with employer and worker participation, with an accessible and committed membership, assured a link to the community while guaranteeing some direct involvement in policy design.

It is more than simply a fascinating fact to realize that over the last decade not only have all three political parties introduced workers' compensation reform legislation—the Tories in 1984 with Bill 101, the Liberals with Bill 162 in 1989 and the NDP in 1994 with Bill 165—WCB reform in each case was almost their last act as a government. While the Tories introduced Bill 101, the Liberals were critics; they had to implement it. The Liberals introduced Bill 162, a very significant reform package which completely revamped the benefit delivery model, and the NDP, who actively campaigned against those reforms, were required to implement them. Bill 165, one of the last acts of the NDP, received aggressive criticism and many elements will not survive and, in my view, some rightly so.

The backdrop of political realities then is not without some very significant implications to the current state of workers' compensation and may begin to explain what I believe is one of the most compelling causes behind the state of today's system.

I am convinced, having participated in one way or another, in all three major legislative reforms from 1984, that today's problems are less a function of design than they are of execution. The lack of political accountability has had profound impacts on the system.

By the end of the last decade, after a massive amount of workers' compensation reform had taken place, speaking at the 75th anniversary symposium in September 1989, the then president of the board said this in response to the massive changes implemented, "The underlying agenda will shift from an agenda of change to one of stabilization and renewal."

In a publication released near the end of the last decade, Workers' Compensation in Ontario: A System in Transition, this was said: "On the legislative front, the program of major reform commenced last decade has now been largely accomplished with the enactment of Bill 162. However, it is very likely that housekeeping amendments will be in order."

This period of stabilization and renewal never did occur. The architects of those very changes found themselves displaced with the change in government in 1990. Rather than continue with the aggressive administrative reform agenda and ensure a period of stability and renewal, beginning in 1991 the senior executive group at the WCB was purged.

The implementation of Bill 162, which completely revamped the benefit delivery model introducing future economic loss and non-economic loss, was never allowed to mature. Shockingly, Bill 162 never underwent that required and expected refinement. Instead, the administration of the day renewed investigative efforts at corporate design and retraced the ground, step by step, that had been exhaustively covered since the late 1980s, and I'm alarmed that five critical years have been effectively wasted.

Never before, though, to my recollection, has a government not only set out a workers' compensation reform agenda prior to an election, but actually actively campaigned on the issue, providing a strong and aggressive platform. The present government, in my view, is to be congratulated not only for the substance of the platform that it presented but for the swiftness of movement on needed and immediate reform.

By presenting change at the beginning of the mandate, the political accountability so sadly lacking since 1980—and during that period of time I think all three political parties can do a mea culpa on that. The tough decisions and the follow-through will be shepherded by the very government that has spearheaded the reforms, a requirement that has been absent for over a decade and a half and three major reform packages.

Accountability of the government and of the WCB management is a theme that is clearly embraced in Bill 15. With the absence of accountability, the WCB has been afforded the luxury of ignoring the growth of a perilous financial crisis that threatens to lead to the bankruptcy of the system and put at risk the payments and pensions of those who rely on the system the most. This committee is well aware of the current financial state of the WCB and needs no comment from me.

I would like to turn, though, to three aspects of Bill 15 that do warrant comment and invite this committee to consider amendments in several areas. First, let me commend the government for moving swiftly on changing the composition of the board of directors. While the prevailing argument—I mean, you look at a system that is dealing with, to a large measure, issues concerning workers and employers.

At first blush, it does not appear unreasonable at all to have that system managed by those two core constituencies. However, even before Bill 165, when the bipartite board was officially enshrined in the act, the WCB had been operating under a bipartite scheme for several years and it simply didn't work.

The board could not even agree several years ago to pursue a funding strategy at a time when an untold crisis was beginning to unfold. The board released a discussion paper, WCB Funding Strategy, in February 1992 and the board was never able to get its hands around that and make one inch of progress to putting together a comprehensive plan for the future. In fact, for 1993, for 1994 and for 1995 employer assessment rates were set in the absence of any long-term funding plan.

Bill 15 makes a small improvement to the purpose clause. I've recommended in the paper—I've commented on it a little bit to suggest that some reference be made to a requirement to consider the competitiveness of Ontario business which was something that was considered some time ago by the management caucus of the past governments, premiers, businesses and labour advisory committee.

One of the requirements of Bill 15, which I strongly support, is the requirement for the development of a strategic plan which the system has been sadly lacking. Not surprisingly, the past board was unable to agree upon a strategic plan, even though a development was attempted throughout 1992 and 1993.

The last strategic plan, in fact, goes back to 1984. Mr Christopherson asked a question with a long preamble, a few presentations ago, and I'd just like to take one very quick moment and respond to that to save him the opportunity and the need to chew up my portion of the clock on that. As I sort of sense the question—

Mr Baird: If you don't, he will.

Mr Liversidge: That's right. Maybe I'll let him do it. As I sensed the question, it was why should it be costing workers to reform the system? The bottom line is that it shouldn't. If the current state of the Ontario workers' compensation was because business was not paying enough, it was because accident rates were up, it was because business was somehow getting a free ride then, considerations of benefit reductions and assessment rate reductions would be absolutely irresponsible. But that's not the case.

You need only go back to 1984, when business went to the government and went to the WCB, when they first saw the beginning of the unfunded liability which, at that time, was peanuts. It was approaching over $1 billion, which unfortunately is peanuts in the context of it today. They said, "Listen, we have to do something about this." At that time, they set an unprecedented plan in motion and said, "We, business, will take, we will absorb for three years running, assessment rate increases over and beyond the rate the inflation for 15% per year each year for three years followed by three more years of increases of 10% per year over and beyond the rate of inflation."

In 1987, the WCB reported in its annual report that this was having some effect. In fact, it said that if things continue, that by the time 2014 rolls around the unfunded liability should be zero. Two years later, 1989, the WCB reported in its annual report that the financial plan, agreed to by business five years earlier, was a tremendous success and that if accident rates held to 1989 levels, the unfunded liability would be paid off not in the year 2014, but rather in the year 2007. Guess what? Accident rates did better than hold at 1989 levels, accident rates in many industry sectors actually decreased by 50% from 1989 till now and, as we all know, the dream of an unfunded liability being zero in 2014 is pure fantasy at this point in time. So business tried to do something; business contributed more money.

The one area where I think some very strong amendments to Bill 15 are needed, deal with a theme of workers being required to provide notice to the board when there's a material change in the circumstance. I think we can all understand and appreciate why that is there, and there's a reciprocal requirement on the part of business which was discussed earlier on by one of the earlier presentations. I don't think that amendment, that requirement is going to have the intended impact. Let me explain why. I've listed four examples in this paper, and I encourage you to look at them. I'll just give you but one, and it deals with future economic loss awards, a core important benefit component of the system. Right now, under that system—if you just look at case 1 on page 11, these are real cases, and if I'm able to provide the WCB with the case numbers and you want any further details from them, I'm sure you could get it that way.

This worker was granted an award June 13, 1994, in the amount of $1,267 a month, but he returned to regular work, with no wage loss within three months after the issuance of that award. Under the current law, that worker will continue to receive full salary plus that $1,267 a month for at least another 24 months, which is a perfectly legal windfall of $26,620.86 tax free. That worker had net earnings of $2,902 before his accidents and net earnings of $4,169 post accident.

If you can get—we're not just talking about people ripping off the system and there are huge amounts of fraud and concerns like this, these are legitimate people, these are people who have done nothing wrong, these are honest individuals who are simply getting what they are legally entitled to and for them workers' comp was a windfall. That's wrong; that's wrong. It's simply a matter of correcting problems like that within the system which I think will return untold millions of dollars, and all workers will still be fairly and properly compensated.

I've listed three other examples that I think warrant some consideration that I think get the point across that there's a serious problem that ought to be reviewed. I suggested that you consider putting in place an amendment in anticipation of the upcoming Jackson review to not allow the board to lock in some of these inappropriate awards, which they will start to do, which they will be required to do beginning in January of next year.

With that I'll end my comments. I don't know if I used up all my clock or not.

The Chair: We have about one and a half minutes for questioning. I'm told the government ranks are up next in the batting order. Anyone have any questions?

Mr Baird: I guess the question I have, since you work extensively with many firms of both small and large sizes: What could you tell us about both high premiums and about the unfunded liability and its effect on the economic performances of the businesses you work with and on job creation?

Mr Liversidge: Let me deal with the second part first. In this package I've outlined some examples and I'm giving you some newsletters that we regularly send out to our clients. In one of those newsletters some months ago I said the government is proposing reducing employers' assessment rates by 5%, understanding again if that's from windfall for business, that's inappropriate, but we all know that Ontario has the second-highest average assessment rate in the country—second only to Newfoundland.

How would that impact your business, I posed? The response was tremendous and people indicated, and they've always tied in, payroll taxes and particularly workers' compensation payroll tax which, remember, is a variable tax. You see the stated premium which an employer pays every year, but that premium is altered by that company's individual performance, and our clients and most of the companies with which I come in contact would far prefer to see the premium measured more to their performance. If they cost more they ought to pay more; if they cost less they ought to get a rebate. But the starting point has to be competitive, the starting point has to be reasonable and workers' compensation tax, which is essentially a payroll tax, does cost jobs.

Mr Maves: I want to ask a supplementary of the PA.

It's my understanding, Mr Baird, that there's a public discussion paper on reform in early winter.

Mr Christopherson: What's going on?

Mr Duncan: We're requesting delegations. You're using up the time to ask delegations questions. Now, we've been very cooperative—

The Chair: I indulged your time to ask two questions of the research.

Mr Duncan: No, you didn't. That happened after the delegation's time had expired, at the end of the time. This is time to ask questions of the delegation.

Interjections.

The Chair: The clerk picked a good time to absent himself.

Mr Ted Chudleigh (Halton North): You've used up the time. We're going to go again.

The Chair: That solves that. Thank you, Mr Liversidge, and your associates. We appreciate your taking the time to come and make a presentation tonight.

Mr Liversidge: Thank you.

The Chair: Now Doug comes back.

Mr Duncan: I would suggest the clock to be restored to about 34 seconds left. I counted them, and when that started—

The Chair: It was actually 9:15.

Mr Duncan: —and get a ruling from the clerk.

The Chair: The question wouldn't affect Mr Liversidge anyway.

Mr Duncan: Yes, but it used up time.

The Chair: No, he was at the time. I was indulging a supplementary.

Mr Duncan: I counted 34 seconds.

The Chair: The question arose, is it possible to ask questions of other members around the table or do questions have to be posed to the deputation?

Interjections.

The Chair: It's a matter arising from this question: Is it appropriate for someone else to ask for clarification?

Mr Duncan: During the time when the delegation is still up and the opposition has questions of the delegation?

The Chair: We will have to chat about it further.

HUMAN RESOURCES PROFESSIONALS ASSOCIATION OF ONTARIO

The Chair: Our last group of the evening, the Human Resources Professionals Association of Ontario. Good evening.

Mr Michael Failes: Good evening. Thank you very much. My name is Mike Failes. I'm the chair of the provincial government affairs committee. This is Mary Beth Currie, a former chair and a member of the committee as well.

We're here tonight on behalf of the Human Resources Professionals Association of Ontario, HRPPO. This is an association of approximately 6,500 members throughout Ontario who are human resource practitioners. We perhaps bring a slightly different view from a group representing employers or workers. We represent instead the people who often have to administer acts such as the Workers' Compensation Act.

We're certainly pleased to speak with you tonight. In keeping with the late hour, our submissions are very much to the point. We've reviewed the legislation and there are a number of aspects which we're very pleased to see, things that we've been looking at for quite a while. We're pleased with the financial accountability aspects of the legislation; the newer, more streamlined board of directors, which appears to be based on a multistakeholder model; we're certainly pleased to see the value-for-dollar audits and the additional enforcement mechanisms in the legislation.

One area, though, our members have been very concerned with is with respect to the material change requirement contained in section 109.1 of the legislation and the complementary enforcement mechanism that goes with that. The concern, first of all, focuses on the fact that section 109.1 talks about the obligation to advise the board of material change. Of course, it's a reciprocal obligation for both employers and workers, but it's very vague. That vagueness raises a number of concerns for our members.

First and foremost is a fairness issue for them. What is a material change? If you just put yourselves, perhaps for a moment, in the chair of someone who's trying to administer this piece of legislation for an employer, is for example an increase of 10 employees a material change in your payroll? It might be, for example, if you have 10 employees in your workforce; it might not be seen as material change in some workforces where you have perhaps 500 employees.

These are difficult issues which will have to be dealt with every day with the very short time line that's in there, that is, the 10-day time line. It'll be difficult for people to respond to it. We can see there'll be some difficulties for employees as well, workers, in terms of their understanding of what a material change is.

There's also a concern with respect to the vagueness of material change for the government. Obviously, one of the things that we like in the legislation is the ability to enforce these requirements, but it's going to be difficult to enforce when people are not going to really understand what a material change is. It's going to be difficult, frankly, we'd suggest, to get convictions as well when you are trying to show—and I'll come back to this in a moment—that there's been a wilful failure to advise the WCB of material change.

I mentioned the 10-day time limit as being a concern as well, and that's largely related to the fact that there is a certain vagueness in the terms which are being used. The solution we see is that you should provide some sort of definition of "material change." We'd suggest it should be in a regulation so it can be fine-tuned and administered easily.

With respect to the concern which most of our members face, if the material change in the workforce was linked in some way, for example, with the Employment Standards Act requirement for notice of mass termination—just for those of you who might not be familiar with it, if you have a situation where you terminate the employment of 50 or more people in a period of any four weeks, there's an obligation to provide a notice to the minister.

Similarly, if that was defined as being a material change, where you either hire or terminate the employment of 50 or more people on a four-week period, that's the kind of material change where a human resource practitioner can say, "Okay, we have an obligation to advise the WCB of this," this is a material change and there's paperwork that's already being generated in any event in that situation.

Most importantly, though, we think there have got to be some sort of guidelines for people so they know what they're supposed to do, what they're supposed to be reacting to. Right now it's simply too vague.

This also ties in with the prosecution section. As we indicated to you, we'd suggest there are going to be some real difficulties in terms of getting convictions where the term is defined as broadly as it is, and in particular with the wording of the act right now which requires a wilful failure to advise the board of a material change. That is going to require proof of a state of mind, which is going to be difficult to show.

We'd say it's much better if (1) you define what a material change is; and (2) you make this simply a regulatory offence, that is, if you fail to advise the board of that material change, that's an offence. Then, just as there is under, for example, the Occupational Health and Safety Act, there's a defence of due diligence. If you took all the steps that are reasonable in the circumstances to ensure that the board would be advised of a material change, then that is an absolute defence to the charge.

We'd suggest that's a better approach than putting the board in the position of having to show state of mind, and secondly, putting employees and companies in the position of having to respond to something as vague as a material change. Define it; make it a regulatory offence with a defence of due diligence.

Incidentally, the definition of what a material change is will also resolve some of the concerns our members have about the 10-day time limit. If you define "material change" to be a significant enough change, then there won't be a problem in terms of responding within the 10-day time limit which is currently in the act.

Subject to any questions you have, those are the concerns that we had. It's very, very defined in terms of what our members have come to us and said they'd like to see different in this legislation.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Failes. The questioning will begin with the official opposition.

Mr Duncan: I want to ask you a question around the whole issue of governance and the appointment of people to the new board as defined in Bill 15. The previous delegation, in its presentation, although he omitted it in his verbal presentation, said, "Perhaps the election of 1985 had less of an impact as the incoming Liberal government appointed the former Labour minister"—that was Robert Elgie, who had been the Labour minister under the previous Davis government—"as chairman of the WCB, which...ensured a high degree of stability and accountability."

A number of employer and employee groups have suggested that it's very important to find qualified and competent people to fill the positions on the board and try to remove the partisanship that's been there in the past. Would you agree with that?

Mr Failes: Certainly you want to look for people who are qualified and competent, and often people who have formerly held positions such as legislative assistant subsequently become MPPs, and you see them years later and you recognize them from perhaps a former career. I'm just speaking in a very hypothetical way here. It's not at all directed to anybody in this room. There's certainly no question that sometimes former experience can be very valuable, but I think that's got to be weighed on a case-by-case basis. I don't necessarily mean that as an endorsement of any particular former MPP or otherwise.

Mr Duncan: I guess the question is a serious one, though, that governance is, in our view, not clearly enough defined. We support the multi-stakeholder model. We did in the run up to the election.

Mr Christopherson: And now?

Mr Duncan: And we do now, as we have all the way through. I guess the question is this: Do you feel it's necessary to be more specific with respect to the composition of the board, or are you satisfied that the amendments as contemplated in Bill 15 are sufficient to guarantee that irrespective of who the government is, there will be a fair and balanced board of directors?

Mr Failes: I share your concern that you don't want to see a change in government undermine what we think is there right now. There's obviously a firm commitment on behalf of this government to have a multi-stakeholder model. That's desirable; that's obviously going to happen. If it's not enshrined in the legislation, yes, there is some concern, but I'm not too sure you can really fine-tune this legislation sufficiently to say, "It should be this person or this type of person." I'm not sure that's really suitable in a piece of legislation.

Mr Christopherson: Interesting submission. You didn't comment on this but I'm hoping you'll have some thoughts on the proposed benefit cut, just what your thoughts are on that—the government's proposing a 5% cut to existing WCB benefits—either your association's thoughts or your own.

Mr Failles: We had to wrestle with this in our earlier submissions to the government, which I appreciate you don't have before you. We were reluctant, as an association, to comment upon that. We do believe, obviously, in the financial viability of the plan, and we appreciate that cuts may be necessary, but the kind of analysis that would be required in order to determine the amount of a cut or reduction is not something which we have done, and we're not really comfortable commenting on the exact amount. We do, though, support anything that's going to obtain fiscal viability.

Mr Christopherson: Fair enough. It wasn't meant to be a setup question anyway. I just wanted your thoughts.

Following that, because having professional human resources, I know someone who's in that field and if ever there's a group you can't label or the ones that will fool you every time, it's that group, because they have a unique perspective that doesn't lend itself to left-right if you will, in my opinion.

One of the groups made the statement—this will be a quick question—Employers' Advocacy Council stated in their report, "In many instances, it's the economic situation, not the worker's disability that is the reason for the worker not returning to work." What are your thoughts on that statement?

Mr Failles: I think there are a lot of reasons why workers often don't get returned to the workplace in a timely way. If I was going to pick the most common one, it's because intervention and reintegration at an early stage doesn't occur, not really so much the economic circumstance. I'm not sure of the entire context of the submission.

Mr Christopherson: Their thinking is that there needs to be an economic incentive, and I'm analysing now, because most workers will not return to work as quickly as they could if they didn't have that economic need pushing them.

I guess two parts to the question: One is, is that your experience? What percentage of workers do you think could be back at work sooner than they are? Secondly, for whatever proportion that is, isn't a financial incentive necessary to do it or an important part of it?

Mr Failles: I don't think there's any question that financial incentive does play a part. I don't know of any studies that have really analysed it. If you look at the experience of our members with disability plans which have waiting periods, for example, or which have an element of employee funding, invariably the experience where there's a waiting period or there are scaled-down benefits as opposed to a plan which pays 100% and has immediate payments, there's going to be less use of the plan. There's no question about that. Now, whether people are at times forcing themselves to come to work when they're not really able to, that's difficult to say, but there's no question that financial incentive is going to make people come back to work more quickly.

One thing, though, that is absolutely clear is that the sooner the worker gets back to work, the more like they are to be reintegrated successfully. So some element of pushing is desirable from the worker's own point of view. If you talk to any medical practitioner in the field, that's the first thing they'll tell you. If the person doesn't come back to work within the first five days, their chances of returning to work are greatly reduced, and the longer it goes on, it's astronomical the way the odds increase of them never coming back.

Mr Tascona: I guess as a practical matter on that material change, unless the employer advises the WCB of the material change the WCB has no way of knowing, and you suggested a guideline with respect to the material change, that the WCB would have policy guidelines with respect to what a material change is. Would you see it to be preferable to be part of the regulations or part of the statute versus to be a policy guideline?

Mr Failles: No, absolutely. We'd suggest the regulations. You're going to be faced with prosecutions on this. This isn't something for WCB guidelines; this is something for the government to legislate. If you're going to go and prosecute people, it cannot just be a WCB guideline. I'm not even sure that would be enforceable.

Mr Tascona: As to what a material change actually is.

Mr Failles: Yes.

Mr Tascona: So then we move on to what the defence should be, okay, and you suggest that the defence should be due diligence rather than wilfulness, which arguably is a lower standard.

Mr Failles: Yes, definitely a lower standard.

Mr Tascona: But you'd be satisfied with that.

Mr Failles: Yes, but when I say it's a lower standard, the due diligence defence is, but you're turning it into a regulatory offence, so a mere breach of the requirement is going to result in a conviction absent the due diligence.

Mr Tascona: We're not talking about absolute liability. Wilfulness is a little different.

Mr Failles: Yes, wilfulness is definitely different. There's a mental element to it, which I'm not sure you're going to be able to prove in very many cases. You're going to have to show that the person knew that this was a material change and intentionally failed to advise the board. That's going to be tough to show. You're better off to simply have an ascertainable standard which is contained in the regulation. If you fail to meet that standard, then you've got to show that you had the mechanisms in place, if you're the employer, for example, which should have advised the board; you did everything reasonable.

Mr Tascona: What if the standard was "knowingly" rather than wilfulness?

Mr Failles: I think it's the same standard.

The Chair: Thank you both. In the interests of being fair to the other groups that spoke, we've actually gone a minute or two over, but I appreciate your taking the time and the patience to be the last group of the evening, Ms Currie and Mr Failles.

Before the committee scrambles away, having had the opportunity to consult with the clerk, it's the Chair's decision that questions may be posed to the PA or to the minister at times either between deputations or, in case of evenings such as this, after the conclusion of all presentations. I would entertain your questions at this time.

Mr Maves: Mr Duncan continues to ask witnesses whether or not they've been asked to appear before Mr Jackson. It's my understanding that there's going to be a discussion paper on reform that's going to come out this December or early next year and the consultations on a new bill will be around that, and so, if that's true, is the first part of the question; the second part of the question would be, therefore, will the minister be asking people to come in and consult with him at that time?

Mr Baird: That's a good question. The member for Burlington South, the Honourable Cam Jackson, Minister responsible for WCB reform, is undertaking a public discussion paper detailing the need for intervention and the objectives of his reform and will outline the approaches that he'll propose. That'll be issued very shortly, early this winter. With the release of the discussion paper, he'll be meeting with the public for the basis for a focus consultation.

Like my colleague from Windsor, we were in favour of disbanding the WCB royal commission, and he has secured the intellectual property of that as well. So there will be a public discussion paper in early winter and there'll be direct consultations by the minister in the winter as well.

Mr Duncan: Will those discussions and consultations be held in public?

Mr Baird: You'd have to ask the minister directly, or I could get that for you at the next meeting.

The Chair: You undertake to get that answer?

Mr Baird: I do.

Mr Christopherson: Just a short observation: How impressed I am at the clairvoyance of the parliamentary assistant to have a written response ready for a spontaneous question from his colleague in the Tory benches.

The Chair: The committee stands adjourned till 9 am, Wednesday, December 6.

The committee adjourned at 2208.

Consideration of Bill 15, An Act to amend the Workers' Compensation Act and the Occupational Health and Safety Act / Projet de loi 15, Loi modifiant la Loi sur les accidents du travail et la Loi sur la santé et la sécurité au travail.

The Vice-Chair (Mrs Barbara Fisher): Good morning. We reconvene once again, and once again I do apologize for not being able to start on time.

We welcome you to the hearings of the standing committee on resources development as it relates to Bill 15. We would like to advise you that, first of all for the sake of the members, there has been a little bit of an agenda adjustment this morning. The 9:45 is still vacant. It is one that hasn't been filled and so we're not crunched especially for time now, and the 10 o'clock, to the best of our knowledge, is cancelled. We did suggest that somebody else could attend and they haven't signified yet that they're going to do that, so as it stands right now that's also a vacant time.

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-Walkerville): Are any of the union groups coming today?

The Vice-Chair: Well, right now the 9:45 and 10 are not. There are other union groups, as you can see on the rest of the agenda here, but they've—

Mr Duncan: You haven't been advised of any kind of boycott, though?

The Vice-Chair: No, not that we know of.

The Vice-Chair: Welcome to our hearing process. Just so you'll understand where we stand at the beginning, you will be given a 15-minute time frame in which to make your position known. That can be done in a combination of ways. It can be full presentation or you can include in that also your question and answer period. However, you will be limited to a 15-minute time frame.

Starting of questions today comes from the third party. If they're not here, it moves in rotation. They may attend before the end of your presentation and opening of the question and answer period. They would be offered the opportunity to start, and then it would go to the government side and then to the opposition party.

Without any further comments, I'd like you to introduce yourselves, please, for the sake of the committee and for Hansard's sake, and go from there.

Mr Jim Chwartacky: Good morning. First of all, my name is Jim Chwartacky. I'm the president of the Richmond Hill Chamber of Commerce. With me are Jason Mandlowitz, who is national manager of workers' compensation services for Crawford and Co. Jason's on my left, and on my right is Barbara Scollick. Barbara is the general manager of the Richmond Hill chamber.

You should have in front of you our submission, and I'm going to walk you through it. The Richmond Hill Chamber of Commerce is a business association representing over 500 employers of various sizes and sectors in the Richmond Hill area.

Like the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, we are pleased to participate in this review of Bill 15. Our members have been concerned about workers' compensation issues for quite some time and fully support our involvement in the consultation process which has led to short-term reform of WCB through Bill 15 and medium-term reform through the Jackson review. We intend to continue our involvement in this issue as the government presses ahead with much-needed changes to the workers' compensation system in Ontario.

The major stakeholders in workers' compensation have agreed for many years that reform to the system is absolutely essential. Many of the areas covered by Bill 15 address this need: governance, financial accountability, fraud and revenue loss.

First of all on governance: Like the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, we support shifting from a bipartite to multi-stakeholder board of directors. It is critical that a WCB board of directors be composed of the best available individuals whose skills and knowledge, when taken together, will allow for a combination of strategic planning and macropolicymaking. We must move beyond the bipartite WCB model, which pitted vested interests. When appointing directors, consideration should be given to individuals who have the appropriate experience with the issues, for example actuarial and insurance backgrounds, as well as previous experience working on boards of directors. It is important to make the distinction that the directors are from their respective communities and not representative of them.

We support subsection 58(2) requiring the board of directors to act in a financially responsible and accountable manner in exercising its powers and performing its duties. The board of directors will therefore have responsibility for combatting the financial crisis which faces WCB.

We cannot stress enough how concerned our members are about the financial sustainability of the WCB and the annual costs which it imposes on them. For example, when the 1995 assessment rate was set at $3 per $100 of payroll, it was the second-highest rate in the country, and without the unfunded liability would have been $2.12.

We feel that in order to address both financial and administrative issues, the board of directors must be given final say within the workers' compensation model. Therefore, we recommend that this be reflected in Bill 15 in two ways. First, Bill 15 should clearly provide the WCB board of directors with final authority, that is, final say in workers' compensation. Secondly, Bill 15 should guarantee the independence of the WCB from government.

We support the provision in Bill 15 to strengthen the memorandum of understanding—the MOU—between the WCB and the Minister of Labour. This will go far in ensuring greater accountability at the WCB.

We believe that the MOU is an important first step but does not go far enough. Accountability can be enhanced by involving stakeholders in a dynamic consultation process with the WCB system. For example, within the WCB an effort was undertaken in 1994 to formulate a policy agenda which would establish the policy issues to be reviewed for the next year. This was a very positive initiative and we recommend it be added to the statutory approach in Bill 15 so that it can be undertaken on an annual basis. A second mechanism to further this accountability would be to establish an external review body mandated to review the WCB concurrent with the termination of an MOU.

We are particularly concerned by the use of the term "material change" in section 22.1 of the bill because the term is undefined and its application would be based entirely on the discretion of the WCB. We recommend that this issue be the subject of a consultation process with the stakeholders, who would assist the WCB in defining the term and determining appropriate policy.

However, we do not support the Bill 15 provision which requires employer registration within 10 days. We recommend this be amended to 30 days to be consistent with the current act.

On fraud and revenue loss: Bill 15 contains significant changes to the penalty provisions in the act. While we support the principle of toughening the approach to non-compliance, and particularly to recovery of overpayments, we are concerned that a maximum employer penalty of $100,000 is not practical. If the intent of Bill 15 is to penalize non-registrants, this will certainly guarantee a further problem. If an employer fails to register when a slighter penalty exists, what provision will there be for an employer to come forward voluntarily? If the WCB had the capability to find the non-compliant employer in the first place, then these penalties would be unnecessary.

We feel that a more flexible approach is needed and recommend that, to encourage all possible registration and maximization of revenue for the WCB, a one-time employer amnesty be adopted for a six-month duration period. This initiative would require communication by the WCB and upon its conclusion, the provisions of Bill 15 could apply.

This report is respectfully submitted by the Richmond Hill chamber.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much. Mr Christopherson, you will have the opportunity for the first question here on the presentation that's just finished.

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton Centre): Pass.

The Vice-Chair: We'll go to the government side then for the first question. Mr Maves.

Mr Bart Maves (Niagara Falls): We've had some presenters say that the unfunded liability is not a problem; others have said that it is a problem. I'm assuming you believe that it is. On page 3—I'm interested in the end of the first paragraph—you say that without the unfunded liability it would have been $2.12. Could you explain those numbers and explain why it's such a problem in your eyes?

Mr Jason Mandlowitz: In establishing the average schedule 1 assessment rate for 1995, the board set it at $3 per $100 of payroll. Assessment rates are made up of three components: the cost, in-year, of new claims, so current and future costs of claims in a year; overhead; and unfunded liability. In 1995, 88 cents of the $3 target rate for schedule 1 was attributed to the unfunded liability, and that's how we get to $2.12.

In addition to its impact on assessment rates, the unfunded liability has a negative impact on experience rating. It is a significant component of the expected cost factor, and so long as it reduces the expected cost factor for NEER purposes, it will dampen the incentive for return to work and re-employment that has earmarked NEER over the years and made experience rating so successful. So there's a double negative impact for the unfunded—

Mr Maves: There have also been some statistics put forward about a large number of companies that have not paid their premiums, and the WCB's had to write these bad debts off. I'm sorry to ask this of you. I would have liked to ask it of some other perhaps more umbrella groups, but unfortunately you don't always get to ask the questions you want to ask of the groups that are in front of you. I'm curious as to why you believe so many employers seem to default on these payments. Are a lot of them just going out of business? What in your eyes would be the reason for so many of these?

Mr Chwartacky: That would be part of it. I think there are several components. Through my personal experience—I'm a public accountant—I have run across situations of people with their backs up against the wall and their belief that it's just unfair, that enough is enough. It's a catch-22 thing. They have to meet payrolls or meet current expenses to buy supplies etc, and things like that happen, unfortunately. I'm not saying it's right, but it does happen; and to some extent, which is mentioned at the end of our proposal, ignorance of the registration process or maybe wilful non-compliance, I'm not sure, but maybe just ignorance of startup organizations understanding when and how to register because of complexities in various government things they have to register for.

Mr Maves: Have you seen an increase in the propensity to default during the recession?

The Vice-Chair: We should limit it to two questions. I'm sorry for cutting you off, but in fairness to others, we should proceed now to Mr Duncan, please.

Mr Duncan: Good morning and thank you for your presentation. I was curious about your comments. You reflected something that we had expressed a concern about in the Legislature, and that's the whole notion of political involvement in the affairs of the WCB.

You stated in your presentation that you recommend that Bill 15 clearly provide the board with final authority and that it guarantee the independence of the WCB from the government. Then you went on to endorse the memorandum of understanding clause. I see some contradiction there. I refer you to subsection 13(1) of Bill 15, which reads, "Every five years, the board and the minister shall enter into a memorandum of understanding containing only such terms as may be directed by the minister." Then further, subsection 13(2) deals with the requirements of reporting to the minister. Ultimately, I read this statute, particularly the issues around the memorandum of understanding, as potentially bringing government and the board even closer together.

I wonder how you reconcile that opinion. I would suspect the business community's concerns may not be as strong today, given the current government, but would you still feel as comfortable with the memorandum of understanding clause if you had a government that was less sympathetic to the business community?

Mr Mandlowitz: The answer to the last question is no. I think our job in this building and the job of public policymaking is at all times to enter into the design of the best possible workers' compensation system, politics aside, although politics is a major part of it, obviously. That's where I separate the two comments that you pulled from our presentation.

I'd suggest that the memorandum of understanding has much to do with the issue of public accountability and it is absolutely prudent for the Legislature and the Minister of Labour, who reports to the Legislature, to hold the organization accountable. That's what this is about. This is a forum for public accountability, but this is not necessarily a forum for independence of administration, and that's where I make the separation. When we want politics removed from the WCB, we believe that the board of directors in its new format should have responsibility for administration. The legislative process has responsibility for public accountability.

The Vice-Chair: A very short one, Dwight.

Mr Duncan: Supplementary, then. I understand where you're coming from. I guess what I'm trying to get at in terms of your views—because frankly I agree with what you're saying, in a perfect world. But if you look at subsection 13(2.2), it states:

"The memorandum of understanding may address the following matters:

"1. Any direction by the minister about programs to be reviewed under subsection 77(2).

"2. Any matter proposed by the board and agreed to by the minister.

"3. Any other matter the minister considers appropriate."

I just put myself in the current minister's shoes. These wacko guys on the opposition stand up and demand that the minister use her authority that's contained in the memorandum of understanding to investigate this or that. My fear is that we open the door to a lot more political interference in the administration of the affairs of the WCB and that whatever gains we may make by moving to a multi-stakeholder model with an independent board could be lost because of that. I'd like to hear your views on that.

The Vice-Chair: I'm sorry, we're not going to be able to do that. We've expired our time. I guess if the questions are short, the answers can be longer.

Mr Duncan: What about more time for hearings?

The Vice-Chair: With that, I do appreciate your being here this morning and your contribution to the process. Again, sorry for the delay. Thank you very much for coming.

BEYOND ABILITY INTERNATIONAL

The Vice-Chair: I would appreciate very much if the next group came forward: Gerald Parker.

Mr Gerald Parker: Good morning, ladies and gentlemen, those honourable members of the committee. My name is Gerald Parker. I'm the president of Beyond Ability International, which is a company that provides advocacy training and education on accessibility. We also provide consultancy and publications for the accessible tourism industry in Canada and internationally at large for the disabled community.

I am an injured worker, a student injured worker, who back in 1987 was injured on the job while having to undertake a full-time job because of economic circumstances. Due to the circumstances that prevailed from that, I have had three major back operations. I returned back to school under my own resources to have to undertake the complete undermining of the Workers' Compensation Board in its excessive ineptitude. I take that and I say that from not only a personal perspective, but that of a political scientist.

During my studies, I undertook quite avidly to research the Workers' Compensation Board in Ontario specifically. I have been present before the standing committee on resources development for Bill 165 and also the Royal Commission on Workers' Compensation. Today I will tell you that I am a proud and pragmatic Canadian who knows we are a nation that resolves political and social injustices and reconciles divisiveness, not encourages it. We are not all equal in ability or resources.

I have presented before this and told you my views so I will not elaborate on them any further because they are a matter of public record.

Because I have a specialized and personal knowledge of the board and the act, I will not—repeat, will not—avail this technical and practical expertise to this committee. You ask, why not? In the province of Ontario, nothing is for free any more, nor is my time or energy. I'm not getting paid like the board of the chamber of commerce. I'm here on my own time, free will, energy and honourable intentions. If you'd like to speak to me after the fact, I'd be more than willing to sit down for as long as you so choose to go over my technical expertise of this bill, and I will send you a bill for it.

I will give you a brief synopsis of my experience with the board. Like I said, in 1987 I was an injured worker, a student worker, a full-time job because of economic circumstances. I've had horrendous treatment. I've been cut off literally 12 hours after coming out of a major back operation that kept me in bed for the entire summer. I've been sent to sociologists who have tried to tell me that my fractured vertebra was in my head—a sociologist sent by the board. I undertook my own rehabilitation by myself under my own recourse at the Canadian Back Institute. This was despite the board and at my own cost.

The systematic methods of attrition continue to just simply continue. There are delays. There are barriers and there is misinformation and subsequent cutoff because of it. Accountability is a very, very important issue. If you want to focus on something, bring the board to be accountable as a schedule 4 entity. They, as perhaps was referred to you before by a prior presenter—their political influence within the board.

I am not a union member or a party of a union. I was. My union never helped me, never even placed a phone call to me when I was injured, did not give a hoot about my family and my wellbeing. I am not a person in an executive position, or at that time I wasn't a businessperson. I was simply a guy trying to get through school to make this future a little brighter for us all. Today I am doing that despite the odds.

If we are going to undertake and deal with this honourably, to deal with the potential that our future has to offer in the stock of our youth, we have to understand that economic circumstances require us to work. We are not back in the 1950s when you can stay home until the age of 23 and live quite comfortably. We have to pay our own tuition and, as the budget referred to last week, 20% more. It's increasingly more difficult for us to do that, so we have to work.

What happens when a student worker is injured on the job? They don't have the support of the union; they don't have the political or economic resources to take a form of address. So what happens? We're left out in the cold. I was forced on to welfare. If you remove a person from a WCB docket to welfare, you're simply offsetting the cost. That is a position the Workers' Compensation Board does all the time, and I say that personally, I say that academically, because I spoke with over 500 people during the course of my research.

There was a comment made, and this has been a continuous and consistent comment made, that the business community is homogeneous. We're not. Some of us care. Some of us care about the wellbeing of our employees. I, for one, now have a business where we are bringing in $25 million of wholesale tourism into this region: $25 million. I care about my people who work for me, because they're valuable. I could not be prosperous without them. They have expertise and they are valuable to me. They are not a commodity, they are people. They are not numbers, they are people.

I know the cost of doing business in Ontario. I know the benefits of doing business in Ontario. I have chosen to do business in Ontario, and I assume those costs and benefits. I do not whine about them. I do not say, "Oh, well, if I don't have liability coverage for my workers and they're going to sue me, I'm going to lose the entire business that I've worked so very hard and long to get." But, no, I pay my premiums, and thankfully so, because I know that without those premiums I would be out of business in a second, as most of us would be in this libellous age of ours.

I want to reiterate that the Workers' Compensation Act and in its conceptual basis is a quid pro quo relationship. To extract the tort law out of the injured worker and the workplace, you have to give them the reasonable rehabilitation and the reasonable cost of being able to survive. That is the quid pro quo. You cannot lose sight of that. This is not a cost-benefit for business. This is a matter of conducting business and having a healthy and active workforce in this province. I encourage that perspective because it is a realistic and pragmatic one. It is not one vested in any political basis. It is simply one that says: "This is the reality. We want a workforce, we want a healthy workforce, we want to have good relationships within that workforce, because they all add to productivity. We want productivity, because productivity turns our economic turbines, which makes us all happy, our families happy and well fed." Without that, we have a certain level of injustice, and I don't want to tell you—I am not left-leaning. I don't want to tell you that. I'm a pragmatist.

To finish off, if you were to remove the tort from the relationship, from the act, I tell you I would have been the first person to sue my employer because of their negligence. I would be certainly a lot richer than what I am today. I would not be earning 90% of minimum wage in 1987, for God's sake. Is that what my potential is worth to the board, 90% of minimum wage based on a 1987 index? I'm a student, I'm not a worker, and no disrespect to those who have to be part of our economy to provide that manual work, but those people, for the better part, are less educated, less resourceful, less able to articulate themselves before boards or committees such as this, and they're left out to dry.

The unions are not necessarily there to help them. There are two ends of the equation here—business interests, union interests—and everybody in between is left out to dry. Let's do something about that. Let's make people accountable. Let's say when a doctor drags a patient across a room, bends him over four different ways, causes that person to be in pain and in severe pain for more than a week, that by any stretch of the imagination is malpractice. Why would the board be exempt from that? It simply boggles my imagination why as a schedule 4 entity you're looking to give them less, or some may purport to give them less—or more autonomy. We cannot accept that.

Please understand that I am a businessperson. I care about the people who work for me and I care about those who are around me, because I know that if a person beside me is not performing to their potential, then we all, as a group, are not doing as such.

I understand the benefits and costs of continuing business in this province. I've made that choice, as every other businessperson has. Live with that decision. Don't cry about it, don't whine about it. Don't say, "Lower my premiums; I don't want to be responsible for my workplace activities." Don't do that. Make them accountable. Say, "We want healthy, safe workplaces for people to live in and enjoy and produce this economy, to grow and to prosper so that we can all live a healthy and happy life."

Mr Ted Arnott (Wellington): Mr Parker, thank you very much for your presentation. I don't think I have any specific questions, but you certainly offer a unique perspective and have obviously experienced considerable difficulty dealing with the board. We certainly appreciate your coming in today and your interest in talking to us. Thank you very much once again.

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): I have two questions. You mentioned the way the WCB, for lack of a better word, administratively handled your case. What was your experience there and what would you see as room for improvement?

Mr Parker: I may preface my remarks by saying it's not just how they handled my case, okay? When you start talking about people—and I will tell you, in speaking with the amount of people, you start looking at the degree of desperation, the marital breakups, the dissolution of relationships, the forfeiture of mortgages etc etc. It's not just me, it's many, many other people. I take my experience and I try to crystallize that.

More specifically, though, I had a fractured vertebra. There were X-rays that clearly diagnosed that. It had been diagnosed for two and half years. I was forced to be in chronic, continual, the absolute most unbearable pain, if you can imagine part of your spine sitting there grinding every time you moved for two and half years. You know what the board's response to that was? It was to send me to a sociologist who told me my fractured vertebra was in my head—a sociologist, not even a medical professional.

Despite having the X-rays and pointing the X-rays out to this individual, I was told that I had a bad attitude. Now, I may come across as somewhat abrasive sometimes, and I apologize for that, but it is my style and I don't take no and I will not take, pardon my language, any crap because of the situation that I've been forced through with the board. I thank you for that, I really do, because it's given me a level of independence and confidence to be able to stand up against people who otherwise don't care about anybody. You call up the board and they say, "Claim number?" I say, "No, the number that is assigned to the file of Gerald Parker is..." I am a name, I am a person; I am not a number. I am not an actuarial statement.

From that I found my own doctor, a very renowned orthopaedic surgeon, and we made the choice: "You are a student. You have to have surgery. That is the case." I said, "When can we have surgery?" He said, "Six months later, that's all we can book." I said, "Look, for purposes of refocusing the very excruciating pain that I'm suffering, my academics are the only way in which I can refocus that."

So I went back at my own cost, as I had always anticipated, and did not expect the board to pay a single dime of my tuition. However, I was cut off as soon as I went back to school on a modified basis. The end result of all this is that after four years of having medical recourse exhausted, I could have turned around to the board and said, "You're obligated to retrain me," and taken another three years to do that. But under my own recourse, my own motivations and my own moral ideals and principles, I paid for that. I undertook that and I took responsibility for myself. The board wasn't going to do that, nor did I expect it to do that. But I took responsibility for myself, to have what? To be cut off. Literally 12 hours after coming out of intensive care, to spend three hours completely sedated under morphine, trying to get through to a board that would not give me any answers. Red tape, red tape, red tape.

Systematic methods of attrition, if you'd like to know precisely, is the terminology that I utilize, because it certainly is. There are barriers, and so many people stumble over those barriers, you have less people; therefore, you have less of a docket to deal with—attrition, and that's exactly what it was. I had the full medical credentials, the reason to be under the board's protection. And that is what the board is mandated to do, to protect my interests as an injured worker. That wasn't undertaken.

I was compromised, severely compromised. My marriage almost broke up, and I only give it to the fortitude of my wonderful wife, because I tell you, you put a person, a well-motivated individual with a great deal of energy, in a very, very desperate situation, in a corner, in a lot of pain, and they can't do anything.

Your group, your committee, is resources development. You are here to develop and to bring out the resources that are being squandered by the Workers' Compensation Board, not just from the workers' perspective but that of the business perspective.

I can tell you, as an injured worker, I have a real problem with the amount of people who are defrauding the system, but not to say that the criminality that is within the system is so rampant that it justifies the approach of casting everybody into the same net, of saying, "Well, you're all trying to defraud the system, you're all lazy laggards who don't want to work, and therefore we're going to treat you all with the same disdain, and exercise these methods of attrition." That was the case constantly, on and on and on.

I have plates in my back now. I've had three major surgeries. I have plates in my back. The one thing that can really help me is good shoes. Good shoes. Five years and I am still waiting for a decision from the board on good shoes, proper shoes. Shoes like these, Rockport Vibrams, cost $130. I can't afford it. I don't have that money right now to be offsetting the board's cost, because God knows, I am $90,000 in debt because of the board.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Parker, I don't mean to interrupt you, but we've actually gone beyond our time. I do thank you for coming forward today and making a presentation. I'm sure that your points will be taken into consideration as we go through the process of reviewing the bill.

Mr Parker: I would like, as an ending note, to extend to any member of the committee or their parliamentary assistants, if they so choose, to contact my company and we can talk about this a little further. Fifteen minutes by no stretch of the imagination does justice to these issues. I would certainly encourage any one of you to give me a call. I am a very reasonable individual. I get passionate about this issue because it hurts; it hurts an awful lot.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Parker, we don't have a written presentation from you. I wonder if you have a business card you could leave, if somebody does want to do that.

Mr Parker: Absolutely. The clerk has my new address. I've actually just moved offices this weekend. I will leave my card anyhow, and if you choose to contact me at the address the clerk has, I'd appreciate that.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much then.

Mr Parker: Thank you very much, ladies and gentlemen.

MICHAEL GREEN
GARY NEWHOUSE

The Vice-Chair: Would our next delegation like to come forward. Good morning. Once again, sorry for the delay. I think you were here at the start. I know we started late, which doesn't help anything in terms of the process. I would ask you to introduce yourselves for the sake of the committee as well as Hansard.

Mr Michael Green: Good morning. My name is Michael Green.

Mr Gary Newhouse: My name is Gary Newhouse.

Mr Green: We are both lawyers who've represented injured workers for over 10 years. We apologize for the lack of a brief; reasons of cost and time.

We're here for only one purpose, and that is to ask the committee to recommend the removal of two sections of the act: section 22.1, which is the section that imposes obligations on workers to report "material change in circumstances" to the board; and subsection 161(2), which makes it an offence for a worker to fail to do so.

We have essentially two reasons for that. The first reason Mr Newhouse will deal with in greater detail in just a minute. The first reason is that workers have no idea what changes in circumstances are material. He'll go through with you in greater detail the problems that exist in deciding whether a change is material.

The second is that there are bound to be hideous disputes about what was reported and what was not because of the board's failure to accurately document what workers tell them. Processing this in a criminal matter will create problems that I don't think were intended to be dealt with in a criminal process, and we'll deal with that a little bit later. I'll turn it over to Mr Newhouse who'll talk to you about the material problem.

Mr Newhouse: As Mr Green pointed out, the wording is, "A person receiving benefits or who may be entitled to receive benefits," is supposed to notify the board. On the question of what's material, obviously there's nothing in this bill and there's nothing in the act now about what a material change would be.

I would suggest that not only would injured workers not know what a material change in circumstances would be, but neither would their representatives, such as ourselves; nor, more importantly, would the people at the board who'd have to decide this. The reason it's complicated is because any particular situation or whatever might be considered a change in circumstances could be material, if we know what that means, or not, depending on what the person is getting from the compensation board.

One thing that bothers me the most right off the top is an obligation, as is set out in section 22.1, to notify the board even before potential benefits are being paid. What that means is that we often have cases—in fact, I think it's the rule rather than the exception—of workers who are hurt and go weeks or months before the compensation board manages to decide whether or not they've had a compensable injury. Is that worker in those weeks or months supposed to be somehow sitting back deciding whether or not something is material when they don't even know what they're going to get from the board? It's an impossible situation.

Once they are entitled to benefits, depending on the benefits, various situations may or may not be material. Just to give you some illustrations, if a worker goes back to work at some point, if they're receiving benefits on the basis of temporary total disability, that's a pretty easy one most of the time. On the other hand, what if they're getting a future economic loss award? They're expected to go back to work, unless it's a 100% award, and furthermore, the way the FEL awards run, there's no obligation on anybody to be reporting anything until the reviews are done at regular statutory intervals. So work may be relevant, it may not be relevant.

Something like going on a vacation—the board actually has a policy which entitles workers to take a couple of weeks off in a year, so that's not necessarily a problem. The policy says they're supposed to be doing it at a time when it wouldn't interfere with their vocational rehabilitation status. Is that a material change? Who's going to know? It can get awfully, awfully silly. What about other health problems? Someone is off with a bad back and they develop a heart condition. Is it a material change in circumstances? How serious is the heart condition? Who decides? Who knows?

The board already has mechanisms and policies to consider these things. There's no reason to impose an extra layer of obligation and an extra layer of confusion and bureaucracy on the system as it already exists.

Mr Parker, who was just here, talked about how he got cut off when he enrolled on his own in a course. We've seen that happen many times. Is that a material change in circumstances? If the board is sponsoring the course, no, it's not. But if the worker decides to show some initiative and enrolls in a course, they may get cut off, even though they're doing, as Mr Parker apparently was, the very thing that the board would want them to do. On top of being cut off, are they also going to get charged under the act with having failed to notify the board in a timely manner of a material change in circumstances?

The list goes on and on, and the bottom line is, by putting in a provision like this, all we end up doing is making situations more confused, more difficult, at a time when undoubtedly the pressures are being put to reduce the number of staff at the board. Put things like this in and you're going to have to hire more people to figure out what is material and what isn't.

At that point, I'll turn it back to Mr Green.

Mr Green: Our second point revolves around the nature of making a positive obligation and the source of disputes that this will create, and to understand this, you have to understand how the board works, how workers report to the board.

Workers are sent forms, a worker's report of accident and worker's progress reports. The worker's report of accident asks for details of the accident and earnings information, who their supervisor is and that kind of information. It's filled out typically around the time of the accident. Then a worker's progress report is sent to the worker periodically during the life of a claim and it asks the worker whether the worker has returned to work and whether the worker has been told by his doctor to go back to work. Those are the basic questions that are on the worker's progress report.

Basically, none of us, I don't think, has any problem if a worker is charged for lying significantly on one of those reports, saying the worker is not working when the worker is working, and there would be some benefit consequence if the worker didn't.

The problem is, that's not what this section deals with. What this section deals with is a situation where the worker is under a positive obligation to call up the claims adjudicator and say, "I got a job," or "I have this other health problem."

The way that's recorded by the compensation board is, the claims adjudicator will do a memorandum. The difficulty with that is that the memoranda are notoriously inaccurate and have been found to be so by the board's own employees on many occasions. The board's employees, hearings officers, have often said, "I don't believe what's in the memoranda." Mr Newhouse and I both have had that experience at hearings officer hearings.

It's one thing for that to occur in the context of a hearings officer hearing. It's another thing for that issue to arise in the context of a criminal trial for fraud, and that's what this section will mean, that we are going to get into disputes between workers and claims adjudicators about what the worker did or did not say.

It's our submission to you, suggestion to you, that that's undesirable, that the board has no need to have claims adjudicators be witnesses and defend their own credibility when they make the memoranda about what the worker did and did not say. That's what this section will lead to.

It would be a lot simpler, if the board has concerns about reports that workers are making and not making, to simply send out progress reports, as they do already, and ask for the information they need. If the progress report is filled out incorrectly and inaccurately intentionally, then by all means a fraud charge can be brought.

But this section, by imposing a positive obligation, with the understanding the positive obligation will be fulfilled by a telephone call—that's how workers communicate with the board when they don't get a progress report—this is a recipe for criminalization of the compensation system, and that's not something that I think we want to see.

Those are the two reasons why we think this section should be removed.

I do want to point out that concomitant with the introduction of this bill in the Legislature, the Workers' Compensation Board introduced new policy on fraud, and it contained one disturbing element that the committee should be aware of. It created a different standard of fraud for workers and employers. Traditionally, the standard of fraud for workers was the same as for employers: intentional misrepresentation. Curiously, the new board policy now speaks of worker fraud as being "deceiving." It doesn't sound like much, a change from intentional misrepresentation to deceiving. Well, there is a difference. The section doesn't necessarily require the same mental element of intending to deceive.

It's probably best illustrated by an example that members of the committee will be familiar with. Premier Harris promised, as you'll recall, during the election campaign that there would be no cuts to health care and then introduced a budget in which he cut—cuts to hospitals—and he said later that his intention was at the end of the term to build up the budget to where it was at the beginning of the term. Now, I'm not suggesting that he intentionally said something wrong to the public. I am suggesting to you that it's deceptive, and I think that's the way others will see it. That distinction between what's intentional misrepresentation and deception is an important distinction, and it's important that the compensation board be made to understand that there's one standard for fraud; it is the same standard for workers and employers.

With that, we'll take questions.

Mr Duncan: With respect to section 22.1 and subsection 161(2), the whole question of material change is becoming a recurring theme both from worker representatives and management representatives. You have said that those sections should simply be left out of the act. Is that correct?

Mr Green: Yes.

Mr Duncan: And that the whole notion of material change should not be dealt with?

Mr Green: That's correct. The reason is because the Workers' Compensation Board can ask for information and then workers can be under a positive obligation to reply to those questions, as opposed to—

Mr Duncan: To having an obligation to report any material change.

Mr Green: Yes.

Mr Duncan: Therefore, you would not support any kind of notion that it should be left out of Bill 15 and perhaps referred to Mr Jackson as part of his consultation for amendments he's considering, in the interim? You're just saying it's not necessary.

Mr Green: It's not necessary, no. If it's referred to the minister, that's better, obviously. We'll take half a loaf instead of no bread.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you very much for your presentation. I want to follow up on the issue of material change. Do you have any sense of why the government would even want anything like this in there? Is there an alternative that achieves that objective, or is this just very much a misplaced idea that ought to be dropped entirely?

Mr Newhouse: I think it's a misplaced idea that should be dropped entirely. I think the intention, if I can be blunt, is to create sort of a chilling atmosphere where workers will be under the impression that if they do anything wrong or say anything wrong, not only might their benefits be cut but they might go to jail or pay big fines or something else. In that kind of atmosphere, it encourages, along with the delays of the board and everything else, a backing away from the system. Injured workers will say, "Well, gee, maybe it's better not to go on workers' comp at all; maybe it's better to file for sickness and accident through the company," or whatever, because these guys—it's like, you can turn around and you might go to court for this or that, and I think it's all part of a larger picture, which is totally unnecessary, in terms of the actual running of the system, but perhaps understandable if the objective is to raise as many barriers as possible to compensating injured workers.

Mr Christopherson: Can I ask the parliamentary assistant a question on that?

The Vice-Chair: No. I think we've set the process in the previous hearing days of not doing that, so I'm sorry, not at this time.

Mr Baird: On a point of order: I think what the Chair ruled on on Monday was that following the presentations, between them was—

Mr Christopherson: Okay. Good.

Are there any regulations in this regard that would mitigate your concerns, or once you walk down this road are you pretty much into that chilling effect regardless and that's why you think it should be struck?

Mr Newhouse: I think that's the answer, that once you start, you're stuck, regardless, and regulations would just add to the bureaucracy and the confusion. Again, it achieves no valid compensation purpose. That's really what our view is.

Mr Baird: I just wanted to ask a question with respect to fraud. Obviously, one of the points of this bill is to attempt to deal in a substantive way with revenue leakage. You mentioned that a worker might be concerned that if they do something wrong, their benefits will be taken away or they would be fined or even go to jail, speaking, I suppose, to both workers and employers. What do you think should happen if there is a case where there is misrepresentation of the circumstances by either employers or employees?

Mr Green: Just to be clear, this section isn't about misrepresentation, it's about a failure to represent. It's not a worker saying, "I'm not working," when the worker is working. It's about an allegation by the board that the worker didn't come forward to say, "I'm working."

The difficulty with that, as we've explained to you, is that that's not always material, and the worker will never know whether that's material, and the board may not know, frankly, whether that's material.

But if you're asking the question, what if the worker says, "I'm not working," and the worker is working when the worker's receiving temporary total benefits, those are already prosecuted now.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much. Unfortunately, a supplementary won't be afforded at this time because of time. We do thank you for coming this morning and making your presentation.

At this time I'd like to entertain the idea of Mr Christopherson posing his question to the parliamentary secretary, just between presenters. As I understand, that was the order we did.

Mr Christopherson: Just a quick question and follow-up to my questionnaire: Is the government planning to do regulations on material change as it now stands?

Mr Baird: Whether the act is implemented by the board, that'll be, I suppose, up to them to determine both the regulation scheme, and of course there'll be jurisprudence, as with any piece of legislation, on what that means in practice.

Mr Christopherson: But you're not planning to introduce them as any kind of a—

Mr Baird: The regulations?

Mr Christopherson: Yes.

Mr Baird: That would be up to the WCB to implement, as it would be up to the OLRB to implement large portions of Bill 7, for example.

Mr Christopherson: Can I swing over then to the research? You've got a law here. Are there not regulations that are naturally attached to any law, or are they handed over to the public agency, in this case? I'm talking about legal regulations that are usually passed by cabinet.

Mr Ray McLellan: I'd have to refer that to a lawyer in our office. I couldn't answer that right now, but I will get back to you.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you.

The Vice-Chair: I would ask the committee's cooperation in another adjustment to the schedule, if you will. As we noted, 9:45 wasn't attending and 10 also cancelled and they are not showing. We are now actually about four minutes ahead of schedule. Can we agree to introduce the next party on the agenda instead of waiting till 10:15? Okay.

UNION OF NEEDLETRADES, INDUSTRIAL AND TEXTILE EMPLOYEES,
ONTARIO JOINT COUNCIL

The Vice-Chair: I would then ask that the presenters for the next group, the Union of Needletrades, Industrial and Textile Employees, Ontario Joint Council, come forward. Good morning and welcome to our process here. Just for those in the room who have attended after the first announcements, we are limited to a 15-minute presentation time. Inclusive of that is the question and answer period. If you choose to allow that time, that's certainly your prerogative and we'll proceed that way. I'd like you to introduce yourselves, please, for the sake of the committee members and for the Hansard.

Ms Pat Sullivan: I'm Pat Sullivan, the Ontario director of the Union of Needletrades, Industrial and Textile Employees, the Ontario Joint Council.

Mr Jonathan Eaton: I'm Jonathan Eaton. I'm a researcher with the Canadian office of UNITE.

Ms Sullivan: I appreciate very much the opportunity of coming before the committee. I think it was something we hadn't anticipated, with the way the government is working, the fact that this has come to committee. I appreciate the opportunity of coming before the committee.

I'd like to introduce a little bit about our union. It's one of the newest unions in Canada, resulting from a merger with one of Canada's oldest unions, the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union and the International Ladies Garment Workers. We merged into UNITE, effective July 1 of this year.

We represent a wide variety of industry, not only in the apparel industry but we also represent auto, chemical and stuff, but our primary industry is the apparel industry, and we have 30,000 members across Canada, over 10,000 in Ontario. It's primarily women; a majority of them are immigrant women and visible minorities. They're not rich. They don't have cellphones in their cars, they're not freeloaders and they're not interested in cheating on workers' compensation claims. Often they're struggling just to maintain a decent living wage.

I have some concerns, I guess, with the restructuring that's going to come under the WCB and how it will impact our members. A lot of concerns are coming out with the changes, taking away the bipartite board and putting on representatives who probably will be only representing employers. If you go through history and some concerns and problems that have been addressed over the years with the compensation system, once we got the bipartite system in, it started to work a little bit differently. With a lot of concerns raised by workers, workers' representatives at least had an opportunity to raise their concerns and be heard and acted upon.

I don't think the committee even had a chance to really get working and now it's being disbanded, even though facts have shown that the system was working better than it had in the past. If it isn't broke, why are we fixing it? I think that's a concern of this government, of taking it totally in the hands and the control of the employers.

I'm also hearing rumours going around that there will be possibly a point where labour can participate, but it's going to be such a small core of what that agency will look like that it won't have a lot of input, but it's also going to have from other areas, say, business. The insurance companies are all sitting in the wings waiting to take over the control of WCB, and I guess we can look at other areas where insurance companies have got involved; it hasn't been in the interest of anybody, workers or non-workers. The insurance companies take care of themselves, and I have some concern with that.

As a union, dealing with insurance companies on a daily basis, whether it be for weekly indemnity benefits or extended healthcare benefit insurance, as days go on it gets tougher and tougher. Even though you have provisions under your collective agreement that very clearly state when workers are going to get their benefits, they still erode the provisions under your collective agreement by being an insurance company that has the almighty power at the end of the day to decide whether or not they get their claims or whether they get their benefits paid for. So I have some real concern when you start to put it out to the hands of private interests out there.

I also get concerned about the way this has been ramrodded through. The government comes into power and within the first month put in Bill 7 and then quickly following that the changes in the WCB under Bill 15. I guess that's why I come back in surprise that this is even coming to committee. Maybe the government is starting to learn in the passing of Bill 7 that maybe we have to listen to the public out there and what their concerns are.

The government actions are an affront to democracy. There's substantial evidence to prove that the compensation problem—I think some of the things that were said—I'm trying to get everything in in the short period of time—is that we're at a disastrous level here now and it has to be taken of. It's shown in fact that the WCB has a lot of money, it has a large surplus, and that there's less money being spent than in years past. If that system isn't working and they're going to put in a new system, that goes back to reflect what it was when the Tories were in power before, when it was in a worse position than it was today.

I don't understand where the government is going. I can look at the areas where our members have concern, I guess the expected change that will come in after Bill 15 when they come in with changes to the act. A lot of our members, especially in apparel, suffer from repetitive strain, carpal tunnel syndrome, neck and shoulder injuries from working at machines that the employers haven't adapted properly in the setup of their equipment. I know the cases we're fighting on a constant, daily basis to try and get them recognized now as work-related.

You know, you have hundreds of people dying in the workplaces and not being recognized. I guess one out of every 17 deaths on the job are related through compensation. To open this all up, I think we are going to go into a worse position than what we have been in many decades, and the opportunity of workers not to have any input into the law which they will now have to live under.

Health and safety will be eroded. There are also rumours coming down in leaked documents that they're going to cut down the number of inspectors who would go under the health and safety. The safer your workplace is, the less chance you're going to have of accidents and injuries and claims being filed. If you start to take that away, take away the certification core training that workers are given out there, that there will be no implementation to force the employers to have certified members in health and safety, then you're going to back to the days of old when your prices were really high and people were getting injured and what avenue we're going to have to go.

If the problem is, as in the government's statement that they think there's a lot of fraud going on in WCB, then deal with the issue of fraud, but I don't think it's anywhere near the majority of the claims that are out there. I think the claims are legitimate. I know the claims that we're dealing with on a daily basis are not fraudulent cases. Even now under the system I think there's a lot of room for improvement that was there, let alone going in and putting it back and taking delays of two, three, four months before they even get reimbursement for their claims that are very legitimate where the doctors and the specialists are all saying it's work-related. In some cases, the companies have agreed and said, "Yes, this is work-related" and yet the compensation board still will not determine whether it is work-related. To put things into there with fraud and whether you do it and pressure will be now put on to the employers—we have a number of employers that even when employees are being injured at work, they won't file the proper paperwork. They're refusing to send the paperwork that by law must be sent in and nothing seems to ever happen to these employers. If you now put them on a board that's now going to make a decision on what kind of system is going to be in place on behalf of workers, any indication that I have from a number of employers—that's a large number. It's not just a small number of employers who will take advantage of the situation and put it in there that it would work for employers and not employees.

Insurance is there for the benefit of being able to take care of people if something happens. If the system isn't going to work and you erode that even further, people are not going to report claims, they're going to continue to work when they're injured, and the injuries will continue to get worse and then it's going to end up costing a lot more, a lot more time, lost productivity. There are going to be problems in the workplace where the people are going to refuse to do the work, and I have a lot of concern in that area.

Just on the whole bipartite board, I think it was really working to achieve being workers' representatives and labour and business and everybody in there together working; it was starting to really work. The evidence was there that it was working. Injuries were being reduced. Workers were getting back to work faster because you had the modified work programs getting people back in there. This will all be up for grabs, whatever may happen or may not happen under the new bill.

It doesn't do anything to improve the financial situation or the services provided to injured workers or employers. I don't see a lot of things coming out of this that's really going to go after the employers. It's been there for years and I don't know of many employers who got any more than maybe a slap on the wrist for violating the act that was there now, and it was employer-dominated by controlling the board. Now all those provisions are going to be taken out, even what was there not being enforced.

It seemed to be targeting employees all the time, not employers, that it's the employees who are committing the fraud, it's the employees who are cheating the system. Yet if you look at the hundreds of thousands of cases that are filed every year, if there is some fraud and there's just a few cases, then go after the problem, but you can't sort of rewrite it on the basis that everybody cheats. If everybody is a criminal and they're defrauding and then we have to make it back, it can't be done. Go after the exception to the rule. If there's a problem with fraud, then deal with the fraud, but don't change the whole system on the basis that everybody is guilty of cheating the system. I think that has to seriously be looked at.

We can go into a lot. We've got the submission; I think it covers a lot. You're going to hear probably a lot from the same people who come before the committee on all their concerns. We're open for questions.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you very much for your presentation, Pat. It's good to see your new union active. Everywhere I go, you're in there representing your members. I know how difficult it is to merge unions and you haven't let that get in the way of the job you're doing. You're to be commended and your staff and everyone.

I wanted to draw attention to page 3, second paragraph. You advised that three times you've been writing the minister seeking a meeting to talk about the labour law changes that have been coming forward at lightning speed from this government, and you indicate that you haven't even received a response, let alone a meeting. Can you comment on that?

Ms Sullivan: In calling about Bill 7 and, coming to Bill 15, calling to have a meeting with the minister to talk about the changes and how it's going to impact our industry, we send the letters off, send the submissions; never even a response back that they received them. I think the thing that was most hard and that really angered me, at the end of the process and after Bill 7 became law, I got this very nice form letter from the minister thanking me very much for participating in the consultation process on Bill 7, and that she was quite confident that I would be very pleased with the changes that this government was coming in with.

I then fired off another letter saying what I thought of her sending out this letter. If this is what consultation is, that you send stuff in, whether it's received or not you never know, but well, thank you very much. I was really quite offended by receiving that letter. I think it was an insult and a slap in the face for the time and energy that we put in representing our members and making submissions and asking them in for representation and to get a form letter thanking me for participating and saying that I will be pleased with the changes that come in.

That's the response I got, I guess for all the requests that I made. I became a name in a computer file that says, "When the letter goes out, send it to everybody that's on this list." That's the way they conduct things and I think it's a shame for this government to act that way. At least send a response saying: "Well, thank you very much, but we're not going to consult. We're not going to have meetings. We thank you for the document." But to send out a letter thanking me for going through the consultation process—consultation is when you consult the two parties conferring on the issue, not one side reading a document and then deciding whether you've consulted or not. I take great offence to that and that kind of action being taken.

Mr Christopherson: I wouldn't mind a copy of that correspondence.

Ms Sullivan: The letter that we sent back to the minister? I think we could probably send you one.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, and your response too, if you don't mind.

On page 7, the very last paragraph, the second-to-last sentence, you talk about the phoney crisis, referring to the finances. It's becoming a key point, notwithstanding the government's insistence on characterizing the opposing point of view as being not of concern at all. I think the difference is between whether it's recognized as a problem that needs to be dealt with or whether it's a crisis, not whether it's something that needs to be of concern at all. I would ask the government maybe to be a little more accurate in their contextualizing of this issue.

You call it a phoney crisis. Could you expand on that a little and why you see it that way as opposed to just a problem that needs to be dealt with?

Mr Eaton: I think that's a really good point. To say that the unfunded liability has put the Workers' Compensation Board on the brink of a financial crisis is ridiculous. We know that the board has over $6 billion in assets in the bank, we know that they ran a surplus last year of $130 million after paying $359 million in rebates to employers, and we know that the ratio of assets to liabilities of the board is higher now than it was in 1985.

Sure, the unfunded liability is a problem. In fact the bipartite board was addressing that problem. We want to be clear: We're not saying the Workers' Compensation Board is perfect and don't change it. It has problems; it does need to be addressed. In fact, we had a royal commission that was looking at this problem in a very comprehensive way, and it was doing so in a process where we would have had input, that everyone would have had input. That was shut down, and we have this phoney crisis of being on the brink of collapse with no justification for it and using that as a pretext to ram through basically what is a wish list of what business lobby groups have been wanting to have for a long time.

I just want to touch quickly as well: This idea that somehow there's widespread, rampant worker fraud of the system—again there's just no evidence that's ever been provided to support that, and yet it's being used as a cover and a smokescreen to go after workers' benefits and to basically criminalize workers who in good faith are using the system. Workers who suffered injury deserve basic respect and fair treatment.

Mr Christopherson: I agree with you. Thanks very much.

The Vice-Chair: That does expire the 15-minute allocated time. I thank you for coming forward this morning.

Just for the committee members, a point of clarification.

Mr Baird: I just wanted to speak to Mr Christopherson's previous question. My response was completely accurate, that the WCB would develop explicit policies to define "material change in circumstances." I know there was some concern when I mentioned it to the research officer.

Mr Christopherson: If I can follow up, the specific answer to my question is that there will not be regulations per se attached to this legislation but rather the board will have the ability to develop policy that further clarifies.

Mr Baird: That's correct.

Mr Christopherson: And we're going to load up the board with all your favourite appointees, so isn't this cute.

Mr Baird: I think the reason you don't put it in the statute, in legislation, is that it could evolve over time—

Mr Christopherson: No. I'm sorry. I've sat at the cabinet table—

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me, I didn't open it for debate. I only opened it up for a point of clarification. The information passed and I think that's been given.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES,
WCB COMMITTEE

The Vice-Chair: I would ask that the representatives of Canadian Union of Public Employees come forward, William Harford as chair. Good morning and welcome to our hearing process. I would ask, for the sake of the committee members and for Hansard, that you identify yourselves.

Mr Bill Harford: Good morning, Madam Chair and board members. My name is Bill Harford. I'm the chairperson of the Ontario division of CUPE, WCB committee, and to my left is Greg Letwin, who is a member of our committee and also a worker advocate within CUPE.

As chair of the WCB committee of the Ontario division, Canadian Union of Public Employees, representing some 180,000 workers in Ontario, I am grateful to be able to take these few minutes to express our concerns regarding the proposed Bill 15 and its impact on the Workers' Compensation Board as it affects the injured worker.

I must confess that I was of the opinion that I could offer little after having heard so many speakers who are much more knowledgeable and articulate than myself. However, when I had a few moments to contemplate the words of some of the speakers, I became disturbed and felt that I had to say something no matter how insignificant or inarticulate.

The vindictive and callous attack against the injured worker left me stunned. I would not have believed the agenda of business Ontario had I not heard it for myself. The most vulnerable of all, the injured worker, seems to be but a faint concern in this whole process, and the proposed changes to be introduced through Bill 15 do nothing to help the injured worker's plight.

As a person who represents injured workers in the workplace, I could not find the common sense behind some of the changes that Bill 15 will introduce.

The removal of the bipartite board creates a level playing field in favour of business. Injured workers will not have the equal representation of the board, representation that knows the real world that injured workers are faced with and yet still is fiducially responsible to the Workers' Compensation Board.

To penalize injured workers with the loss of three days' pay for injuring themselves on the job is ludicrous. Most people I represent earn, on average, $25,000 or less before taxes. This already is a marginal income, and to lose three days' pay places a severe hardship on the injured worker and his or her family.

One can only speculate, but we suggest that this will only force workers to use their sick-bank time while other employees will push themselves to continue working with their injury, causing further harm to themselves. Employers will begin to see an increase in the use of sick leave and long-term disability. The short-term financial relief employers will realize will result in greater expense in the long run when their employees end up on long-term injury.

It is realized that some of the Workers' Compensation Board's finances are out of control. The blame for this is placed on the backs of the injured workers in alleged abuse by them.

On the other hand, it has been recognized for years that a large number of businesses have failed to pay their fair share into the system. This is unfair to those businesses which do pay. Failure of the government to encourage the Workers' Compensation Board to track down these delinquent businesses only increases the financial hardship to those other businesses that operate in compliance with the board.

Money seems to be the driving force catching the attention of business. The offer of rewards in the form of NEER does little to improve the real reduction of workplace injury. It merely promotes creative ways for less-than-scrupulous businesses to show lower rates on paper than actually occurred. Often this is at the expense of injured workers, who are intimidated and/or threatened.

This reward system for business encourages employers to have injured workers, with the promise of no loss of pay, not file claims. This type of abuse by employers should be discouraged with some significant monetary fine or penalty.

If Bill 15 took some positive steps to get all the business players to participate and to create a system which would discourage abuse by employers, the financial situation at the board would begin to lean more towards the black-ink side of the ledger.

The proposed reduction of entitlement from 90% net income to 85% net income will penalize and place further hardship on the injured worker, whereas the reduction in assessment rewards business. This will do little to resolve the financial problems the board faces. In fact, in our opinion, this is nothing more than robbing Peter to pay Paul.

The whole concept of the proposed reduction of entitlement and assessment is nothing more than smoke and mirrors. When the smoke clears we will see that businesses have received a 5% reduction in assessment, coupled with an already generous NEER program, all to the detriment of the Workers' Compensation Board's ability to remain sustainable.

The proposed removal of recognition of soft tissue injury is a blind position of recognizing the dangers of the modern-day workplace injury. The implementation of modern-day technology has in many cases eased the burden of labour and minimized the trauma of crushed bone and tissue. But this same technology has given rise to other types of injuries, such as soft tissue injury due to repetitive action.

I am sure investors in this new technology had no intention of causing injury and never speculated on its occurrence. The fact is that it does occur, and business must recognize the fact that a worker does not have to be bleeding to be injured. This is an industrial accident of our time and must be recognized.

To ignore this type of injury will do one or all of three things: (1) force workers to continue working with pain until they have to quit; (2) it will merely require another, healthy worker to fill in the vacancy until his or her health is injured; and (3) if there is no recognition of the injury, the equipment causing the injury will continue unchanged.

Therefore, in our opinion, soft tissue injury must remain recognized because we know, as well as many industrial hygienists and ergonomists, that it is a real injury spawned in the technology of the modern workplace.

As mentioned earlier, the current Workers' Compensation Board is already a bureaucratic nightmare for the injured worker, and Bill 15 does not appear to be making the system any more user-friendly for the injured worker. This, coupled with the proposed changes, is only going to encourage injured workers to seek refuge under their sick and LTD plans or drive them, as a last resort, to social assistance. We have seen evidence of this trend already in some areas.

The shortcoming of this is that the employer will see increases in the benefit premiums levied by the insurance carrier, and no doubt so will the workers. This a no-win situation, other than for the insurance companies.

Finally, the proposed limiting or removal of WCAT is a major blow to injured workers. If you have ever had to fight tooth and nail for an entitlement, only to have it revoked, then you would understand the importance of this last resort of appeal.

Injured workers who have failed in expressing themselves adequately at an appeal have this last opportunity to present their side of the problem to a board represented by persons of business and worker interest. Should this tribunal be neutralized, without any power, then injured workers where possible will have to seek other relief, either through litigation in the courts, but most likely in the area of social assistance.

The final result will be the injured workers left destitute because the system has failed them.

In summary, I would urge that this board look at the proposed changes with a conscience to what they will mean to injured workers of this province. I ask that they give some thought to the fact that it's a Workers' Compensation Board, bought and paid for by pain and crushed bodies and the giving up of the right to sue. It is not an employers' compensation board.

Mr Jerry J. Ouellette (Oshawa): Thank you for your presentation. I have a comment and a question that I'd like you to respond to.

While I was employed at a certain location I was involved in a traffic vehicle accident. It was recommended that I go and see my doctor at that time, which I did, but to date, 15, 20 years later almost, I never informed the employer that I was actually in an accident; the doctor, while I was there, filled out the WCB forms.

As it stands right now, there is no mandatory requirement for an employee to report an incident to an employer. Do you feel that a change requiring an employee, on the day of infraction, to report to the employer would be beneficial, and how would it affect your union?

Mr Greg Letwin: Section 18 of the act says that it is not competent to forgo the right of workers' compensation, but in essence what it says is if you have a work-related injury in the workplace or in the course of employment, it is the law that you report it, both the worker and the employer.

Mr Ouellette: The point I'm trying to stress is on the day of infraction. The difficulty I'm finding in the cases we deal with is that it could be 10 days later that an injury is reported to an employer, yet the time has been reported to WCB. An employer could be penalized for that time delay there. If there was a requirement that an employee, on the day of infraction, reported it, at least the employers would have no recourse but to initiate a process there.

Mr Letwin: I find that as long as it's reported to the board, the board will not penalize the employer. Quite often the workers themselves, or through the doctor, will report to the board first.

Certainly, there must be some sort of consideration to the employer. That would be the policy of the employer. I don't think that would have anything to do with the government or the Workers' Compensation Board. That would be an employer policy between the employer and the workers. That's something an employer should look into, if that's a problem for that particular employer.

A worker reporting to the doctor, who files a report to the board, or a worker reporting to the board has discharged the legal obligation of reporting a workplace accident to the Workers' Compensation Board. If some accidents go undetected, then that's a problem within that employer group.

I don't see where there's an issue here in what we're dealing with today.

Mr Harford: In my experience, where we do have a lot of people who drive vehicles, and we have had a number of injuries due to automobile accidents in the course, by the very fact of them showing up at the hospital, our employer already has a system that the supervisor has to go.

However, I have had incidents within my own workplace where the injury has been reported but we don't fill out the form 7 as an injured worker; we don't even fill out the accident report. We are interviewed by a supervisor, and in some cases the supervisor can't be found. This has happened several times. What does happen in a number of cases is that the report, when it finally does get around, sits on somebody's desk before it gets through. I suppose it all depends on the type of workplace one works in as to what the occasion is.

Mr Duncan: A number of the concerns you've raised are intended to be addressed by Mr Jackson's legislation next spring. Have you been invited to consult or have you been asked your opinion on any of those major changes yet, either formally or informally?

Mr Harford: No, we have not. We have not been asked directly, and I'll have to qualify that by saying, as chair of the WCB committee within the Ontario division of CUPE, I am not aware of any requests being forwarded to Sid Ryan's office, our president. I'm sure that if it had been, then Sid would have contacted myself and some of the other principals on this issue, but I'm not aware of such.

Mr Duncan: Just supplementary to that, a number of other representatives of CUPE have said the same thing, that they have not been asked for their views. Would you be willing to share those views with Minister Jackson before he brings forward his legislation?

Mr Harford: Yes, we would be most pleased to be able to do that, because I think there has to be some discussion on the issue.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much. The time has expired.

Mr Letwin: May I make some supplementary comments?

The Vice-Chair: I'm sorry, that won't be allowed to happen at this time. We do restrict our presentations to a 15-minute question and answer. I would have appreciated the comments prior to the question and answer period, but going into that usually runs the clock out. I'm sorry, that's what's happened.

Thank you very much for coming.

Mr Arnott: I'd just like to suggest to the witness that if there are any additional comments he'd like to provide in writing to the committee, we'd certainly be interested in reviewing them.

ONTARIO PHYSIOTHERAPY ASSOCIATION

The Vice-Chair: While we're in a change here, the representatives from the Ontario Physiotherapy Association, please come forward.

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): The clerk has asked me to remind the members of the committee that in addition to the written brief from the group before us right now, we have a written brief from the Ontario Nurses' Association that will not be accompanied by oral presentation.

Good morning. I wonder if you would be kind enough to introduce yourselves to the committee members and to Hansard.

Mr Kenneth Higgs: My name is Ken Higgs and I am the president of the Ontario Physiotherapy Association and a practising physiotherapist. With me is Signe Holstein, who is the executive director of the Ontario Physiotherapy Association and also a physiotherapist.

The Ontario Physiotherapy Association is the voluntary professional association for physiotherapists in Ontario. We have about 3,500 members across the province. We welcome this opportunity to make our observations on Bill 15 to this committee. I beg the committee's indulgence. We had only one week's notice of the opportunity to appear before the committee. In voluntary associations such as ours it takes us a little time to prepare something that reflects our members' interests and concerns. This is particularly so given the flurry of government initiatives in the last several weeks affecting the health care sector in general and our profession specifically.

In considering our brief to you this morning, we ask you to bear in mind that physiotherapists, more than any other profession aside from medicine, are the major suppliers of rehabilitation assessment and treatment to WCB clients. In 1994, our members treated about 40,000 injured workers in the community clinic program and approximately 20,000 in the regular program. Physiotherapists are rehabilitation specialists, and rehabilitation of injured workers is the WCB's priority.

We intend to keep our comments brief and to focus only on four of the proposed amendments.

We are pleased with the addition of objectives 5 and 6 in the purpose section.

We see working with injured workers and employers on reducing or preventing occurrence of injury as a critical element in our role. As treating practitioners, we know as well as anyone the kinds of injuries that are occurring and why and where they're occurring. Currently, however, this role has been a missing piece in the equation. The WCB has actively discouraged us from any communication with employers. We hope this section gives the necessary incentive to the WCB to allow us to consult fully and effectively with employers and employees on workplace health and safety and on the avoidance of injury or the recurrence of injury in the workplace. We believe this partnership will promote early and safe return to work.

Our second comment relates to section 3, and somewhat to related section 14 and subsection 161(4). To convey our position, I must give you some background.

Physiotherapists in both the community clinic and regular programs are often in the situation of providing services to WCB clients, only to have payment by the WCB refused or clawed back later because the claim has been denied on appeal or has been abandoned by the claimant.

The WCB has refused to allow physiotherapists in such situations to seek payment from the individual clients. Further, WCB policy does not allow physiotherapists to withhold or delay treatment until a claim is approved, and indeed we would not wish to do this. So individual physiotherapists are left out of pocket for services they rendered to WCB clients in good faith.

According to a recent survey of our membership, 9% of claims in the regular program and 10% of all claims in the community clinic program go unpaid due to claim denial or abandonment. I'm sure you can appreciate that especially in this economy a 10% bad debt write-off for WCB clients alone is tough for many physiotherapy clinics to sustain, especially when it's coupled with an aged WCB receivables problem. According to the same survey, an average of 60% of the WCB claims paid are paid 60 to 90 days after submission by the physiotherapy clinic.

The WCB maintains that its policy is based on statutory prohibitions. We hope that this amendment will allow the WCB to pay claims relating to physiotherapy treatments, and in the case of denials or whatever, obtain reimbursement from the worker rather than penalizing the treating physiotherapist.

Our third comment relates to the proposed amendment to subsection 56(1) that would allow the Lieutenant Governor in Council to appoint a minimum of three and a maximum of seven members to the board who are representative of workers, employers and such others as the Lieutenant Governor in Council considers appropriate. It's the "such others" that concerns us.

If this section is designed in part, as we understand it is, to authorize the appointment of health care practitioners to the WCB board, then we have two concerns.

First, we think it constitutes a conflict of interest for what amounts to supplier groups having official representation on the WCB board.

Second, we are concerned that only physicians or physician representatives might be appointed to the WCB board. We certainly have nothing against physicians, but the appointment of physicians alone would not recognize the very important role physiotherapists and others play in WCB rehabilitation and would tend to further entrench the medical model of health care delivery at the WCB.

We recognize that this is not necessarily a statutory matter, but one involving the administrative discretion of the Lieutenant Governor in Council. We only wish to make the point that the appointment power, if it is to be used at all, should be used to have representation on the board that reflects the range of the health care professions that provide the burden of service to WCB clients, and that of course includes physiotherapy, not just medicine.

Our last concern relates to section 14 of Bill 15 and the proposal for value-for-money audits. The Ontario Physiotherapy Association and the physiotherapy profession support evidence-based practice and welcome objective reviews of the cost-effectiveness of any WCB program in which physiotherapy is involved.

Having said that, we aren't really sure how the new section 77 would work. As we understand it, the minister would determine the program to be reviewed and the review would be undertaken by the Provincial Auditor. But what is the role of the board, to quote from the bill, in "ensuring that the review is performed"? For example, does this mean the board sets the terms of reference for the review? If so, this could provide a means by which the WCB subverts or detours the minister's intentions for the review. Furthermore, are the results of the review to be made public? We certainly hope so, and urge that this be added as a statutory requirement.

If the reviews, once completed, are held by the WCB or even by the minister, they will not contribute to the body of evidence-based practice, nor will stakeholders have any confidence that the results or recommendations are being interpreted or implemented properly.

Finally, we really wonder why licensed public accountants, and licensed public accountants alone, are designated to perform the audits. What do public accountants know about rehabilitation, or ergonomics, work conditioning, functional capacity or fitness for work?

We know that at the federal level, in the conduct of value-for-money audits, the Auditor General of Canada can and does draw on whatever specialized expertise the circumstances of the audit require. When doing a value-for-money audit of the CBC, he brings in people knowledgeable in broadcasting. When doing a value-for-money audit of a department, he brings in people knowledgeable about the programs delivered by that department.

Rehabilitation of injured workers is not simply a numbers game. It involves an understanding of a complex of methodologies and conditions, of a body of clinical research and a range of treatments. It involves variables such as practitioner judgement, patient choice and patient initiative and commitment. It involves the development of a consensus on returning the worker to gainful employment.

In our view, an appropriate value-for-money audit of any WCB rehabilitation program would not focus on the quickest return to work for the least expenditure. An appropriate value-for-money audit would focus on whether the most appropriate treatment was given in the most cost-effective manner. This is where specialized expertise in rehabilitation treatments and outcome measures would be essential.

We strongly urge, therefore, that proposed subsection 77(4) be amended by the addition, after "public accountants who are licensed under the Public Accountancy Act," of the phrase "and such other experts or specialists as may be required."

Thank you for the opportunity to come and speak to you today. We'd like to entertain any questions that the committee may have.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Higgs. The questioning will begin this round with the official opposition.

Mr Pat Hoy (Essex-Kent): You didn't specifically address this in your brief, but with the rotation being the way it is, I have an opportunity to finally have a chance to ask someone who I think may have some valuable information.

We've had people make submissions here talking about workplace technology and the incidence of repetitive motion problems. Would you agree that the new technology of the 1990s, as we head into the year 2000, is creating a higher incidence of repetitive motion strains and other problems?

Mr Higgs: In my opinion, yes. A good example created by computer technology alone is the injuries we see from keyboarding alone. Yes, I would definitely say that in my experience that is the case, that we're seeing more of them. Maybe it's a recognition thing too, that as more research is done on it, we start to identify the signs a little bit earlier.

Mr Hoy: I have one supplementary to this. You've stated that in your opinion there is more repetitive motion illness, and you're touching on it now. My other question would be, is the medical technology advancing enough to conclusively show that it is repetitive motion related and indeed occurring in one's, let's for example say, wrist?

Mr Higgs: There are lots of research studies being done. I'm not sure how far along they are in terms of actually proving some of the theories that are out there. There needs to be more research done, definitely. I think that's what you're getting at, that we need to produce the evidence that there actually is a relationship between the cumulative trauma injuries that are being claimed and actual fact. That's what you're saying, I believe. I agree that more research needs to be done to firmly establish that link.

Mr Christopherson: I don't have any particular questions on the submission you've made, the issues, because they're fairly clear and straightforward, given the way you've so articulately presented them. But I did want to ask you with regard to your profession—we know that carpal tunnel syndrome and repetitive strain injury and other things are relatively new on the scene in terms of the decades of industrialization that we've seen. Could you just give me a sense of what you also see in the future that either is just beginning to emerge or areas that you expect will, or do you think that we've sort of seen the horizon that we'll be looking at for the next couple of decades? Your thoughts on that, please.

Mr Higgs: I think there will be just as many problems caused by sedentary work habits as perhaps there were by overexertion. As technology improves, people are tending to become more sedentary; they sit more. From a personal perspective, I find sitting more difficult than anything else I do, and that's what I do most of the time now, is sit. Certainly with back problems, sitting creates just as many back problems as does heavy manual labour in many cases.

I think we will continue to see an increase in the incidence of back problems with the way things are going and certainly repetitive strain, upper extremity problems related to keyboarding. There may actually be a dropoff in some of the other injuries that we used to see because of more knowledge in terms of correct lifting techniques and the improvements with devices to assist workers to not have to lift huge amounts of weight. I'm not sure if that answers your question, but that's the way I see it.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, that's very helpful. That's what I was seeking.

The Chair: We've used up our 15 minutes. Thank you very much for taking the time to make your presentation before us today. We appreciate your coming in.

RETAIL WHOLESALE CANADA—USWA

The Chair: Our 11 o'clock group apparently is having mechanical problems somewhere on Highway 401, so we'll proceed now with the group that was slated after them, Retail Wholesale Canada-USWA. Good morning.

Mr Dave McCormick: Good morning. I'm Dave McCormick. I'm with Retail Wholesale Canada, the Canadian service sector division of the United Steelworkers of America, which in itself is a mouthful.

Our position on this bill is quite clear: We are opposed to it and we would just like to see it withdrawn. For your information, we've also submitted a copy of a letter sent to Elizabeth Witmer, dated September 19, 1995, which we haven't got a response to and which we really didn't particularly expect to get a response to, either. Quite clearly, it's our position this government has no concern for working people of this province and is intent on hurting those who are most vulnerable. We also are of the opinion that the government will not listen to anything that's being presented during these committee meetings.

It seems to us that what the government's going to do is to try and attack section 73 of the act, which states that claims are judged on a real-merit basis; that what you're going to do is change the system to a system that simply reduces employers' costs at the expense of disposable human beings.

What I want to talk to you about is the real cost of the compensation system, and it doesn't deal with dollars and cents; it deals with human misery, with suffering and with pain. It deals with poverty among injured workers, and I can tell you this is the worst time of the year for me, because right now when I go back to the office I am going to have clients calling me asking how they're going to put groceries on their table at Christmastime, much less presents underneath their trees for children.

What I want to do is to go through this so-called bill. I'll start off with the purpose clause where it says, "The purpose of this act is to accomplish the following in a financially responsible and accountable manner..."

If you're going to do that, then why don't you look at the costs of experience rating and SIEF and their effect on the system? Why did you turn around and disband the Workplace Health and Safety Agency, something that is a proven success story? Why are you turning around now and taking the bipartite board and destroying it as well, something that the previous government, through insight and through consultation, enplaced?

You talk about overpayments of workers and you talk about criminalizing workers. I don't hear you going after employers in the same terms. As a worker representative I can tell you I have claims in front of the board right now where injured workers were coerced into going on to long-term disability benefits prior to this legislation and we're now trying to redress that problem.

You're saying that the worker should notify the board of any changes in his circumstances. I can tell you, a lot of the people I deal with have English as their second language and they're going to have a problem understanding that they have to notify the board of any changes in their circumstances.

"The board of directors shall act in a financially responsible and accountable manner in exercising its powers and performing its duties." Wasn't that the purpose of bipartism to start off with? Wasn't it there because of the fact that government messed it up for the last 20 years and then finally turned around and said, "Let's put the people in charge who can do something about it"?

It worked for the Workplace Health and Safety Agency. It certainly isn't going to work under your new system. What you're going to do is put insurance company executives in there and turn this into a for-profit system. Well, workers gave up their right to sue. It's not something that was handed to us out of the goodness of their hearts. We gave up our right to sue for a fair and equitable system, not a Tory-run agenda.

The only other thing I'd really like to talk about is this penalizing workers $25,000 and throwing them into the same category as employers. I've dealt with injured workers now for the last three years and I have not come across one injured worker trying to abuse the system. I have heard workers turn around and talk about the fact that they only want what they're entitled to for a workplace injury. I haven't come across one case of dishonesty—not one—and it's there because the system that's in place right now works.

Before a worker is entitled to benefits, there's three steps he's going to go through: He's going to notify his employer; he's going to have a medical opinion; and he's going to have a report of accident that he has to submit himself. These three things all have to correlate before the board pays a dime. That's why we don't have worker abuse and we don't have worker fraud.

What we do have is we have employers out there, some 20,000 of them, who are not paying into the system. We have banks going for a free ride because they're exempt, yet the same worker who goes out there and gets a loan is paying back that loan from his compensation benefits, and I see no reason why they're excluded. They have workers too and their workers are suffering.

If you want to take a look at where the system is and you want to look at employer abuse, then fine, but don't go blaming the guy who's already hurt on the job, because when he can't walk his daughter down the aisle without taking pain medication, he's paid his price. When I speak to a young worker who can no longer have children because of a workplace accident, she's paid her price. When I deal with a man who can't shake your hand with either hand, then he's paid his price.

This legislation that you've put in front of these people of the province of Ontario is disgusting and should be withdrawn. If you have any questions, feel free.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your passionate submission. I certainly share those feelings when we look at it from the point of view of the workers and how this legislation's going to affect them and the intent of this bill to make them secondary to the financial considerations that the government seems to be more concerned about.

I want to ask you a little bit about the bipartite board. We've heard submissions from employer groups suggesting that this is a system that won't work. You point to the Workplace Health and Safety Agency as an example of how it can work. They point to that same agency as an example of why it can't work.

I wonder if you could give us your thoughts on why you think it's so important for workers in terms of health and safety and WCB to have an equal say in the decision-making. Why is that so important to the people you represent?

Mr McCormick: First we'll take a look at the statistics from the 1994 annual report. If you take a look at the number of registered claims in 1994, it's 370,000, and the number of claims in 1990 is 473,000. You've got a 100,000-plus claim reduction. You also take a look at your lost-time claims, which were reduced by one third over that period of time.

That's something that went through because of workers knowing what their rights are, workers learning how to work safely and workers being able to participate in the workplace process of how a job is being done. They're rights that we are entitled to, rights that we had and rights that are being stripped. That can't be done if the employer is turning around and saying to you, "You're going to do what I say, because we have complete control." That's what happens when you don't have something with an equal voice and equal say.

From the retail sector, where I come from, there has been more health and safety training through the certification program that was in place through the agency in the last year than employers did in its entirety in the last 15 years. That's why it's working.

In terms of compensation, yes, workers know what's going on within the board. They're the ones who are feeling the system, and they have a right to at least have their point of view heard in decisions that are going to be made that affect everyone.

Mr Christopherson: The government is suggesting that by having workers represented even in a minority position on their new board workers will get their say. We, of course, in our previous legislation believed that workers shouldn't just have a voice but ought to have an equal say in the decision-making. Do you think that workers will be losing something by moving from an equal say in the decision-making to merely being one of numerous voices on a new board?

Mr McCormick: Yes, they are. They're going to lose a lot. It's a lot similar to the way this committee here works. There are individuals here who have concerns about what's going on, but there's a government out there that's not going to listen to what you say when you bring it back in front of the Legislature. They're going to simply use their numbers to override you and throw out anything that has to do with workers' rights. That's the same thing that's going to happen under your new board.

Mr Arnott: Mr McCormick, thank you very much for coming in. Your concerns are noted, I think, by the government side. I thought I heard you say that there's no fraud within the system at all.

Mr McCormick: I can't say there's no fraud. I can say that in the last three years I have not met with one case of worker fraud, and I represent some 300 workers a year.

Mr Arnott: It's my belief there's significant fraud within the system, injured workers and also employers perhaps, and we've got to root out the fraud if we can. It's my recollection that when this committee dealt with workers' compensation issues two or three years ago, the former chairman of the WCB, Odoardo Di Santo, was sitting where you are today and suggested—again if my recollection is correct—that the fraud might be in the neighbourhood of $150 million a year, which is a major problem, and the government is attempting to come to grips with it.

We do have a significant unfunded liability problem, which I'm sure you recognize, which, in our belief, jeopardizes the long-term ability of the system to pay injured workers. I don't know if you've got any suggestions for us as to how we would deal with that problem, but it's one that I feel is very significant.

Mr McCormick: On the unfunded liability, to start off with, for years the employers' position was that they did not want a fully funded system. "Unfunded liability" means if I am injured today that you have the money in that system to cover me until I'm 65 or until I die, whatever happens to come first. Do you want a system that says now, for every workplace injury that ever occurs employers should fully fund that system, or should that money not be spent better on the economy, allowing the employer to at least invest and work with that money? That's the position that labour has come from. Your assets, I believe, are greater now in percentage than they were 10 years ago as to the actual funding of the system. The unfunded liability, to me, is just a hoax system. I don't think employers want a fully funded system.

From a worker's perspective, I certainly wouldn't want my employer having to pay out every dime and possibly take a chance of going bankrupt at the time of my injury. I'd hope they're solvent enough that over the course of the next 20 years they can pay that as they would have my wages. So I really have concerns with that.

In terms of what you're talking about with fraud, there's fraud within any system. The reality is, though, that there are more checks and balances within the compensation system than we have in any other sort of system out there. I can't say whether there's $150 million or there's $50 million or whatever figure. I don't have that information in front of me.

I can tell you from personal experience I have not found workers cheating the system. If anything, I have come across claims that have been denied because workers have been too honest and given too much information rather than the other way. We've had to go back and at least get this straightened out as to, "What did you mean by this when you told that to the board?" and not the other way around. I haven't found that with workers yet.

Mr Duncan: It's probably not a fair question to ask, because I only had a chance to glance at your issues. First of all, in terms of a lot of your concerns today, again, Mr Jackson is scheduled to deal with them in the spring. I'm curious to know whether you have been invited to make any kind of representation or participate in any consultations with respect to those very substantial amendments that the government intends to bring forward.

Mr McCormick: I'd like to thank you for that opportunity. We have not been invited to date. I got notice of this presentation on Friday of last week, that we were given an opportunity to speak, with the date of, "Did you want Monday or Wednesday?" I would certainly hope that when the Jackson report comes out, at least there's an opportunity for full public hearings and not these last-minute, "Maybe we can appease people" type of decisions.

Mr Duncan: I would assume, if I can, by way of supplementary, that you would perhaps want to be consulted prior to any report coming out.

Mr McCormick: Quite frankly, with this government, I don't know if it would do any good. I think this government's going to simply go ahead and do what they want anyhow and they're not going to listen. It's just a paper shuffle with this government in terms of consultation.

The Chair: With that, our 15 minutes are up. We appreciate your taking the time to make your presentation today and leaving us your correspondence.

SOUTH LAKE SIMCOE ASSOCIATION FOR INJURED WORKERS

The Chair: We'll move on now to the South Lake Simcoe Association for Injured Workers.

Mr David Stephenson: Thank you for having me here today. This box beside me which I had intended on unloading and putting up here on the table is a single case that went to WCAT in 1994. I brought it in as a visual aid to show you how much work goes into a case. This case was won, and it cost the board over $70,000 to win this case, not counting the printing of these transcripts, mailing of them etc.

I'm not going to speak against this particular government. I'm speaking against the bill for the following reasons.

First, I'd like to deal with occupational health and safety. Any amendment to this act can only be an improvement. This act could only get worse if there were no act at all.

According to the Minister of Labour's facts and figures, 1992-93, health and safety policy branch, policy and analysis unit, released November 1993, which covered the years of 1987 through to 1993, this booklet clearly shows some very frightening and at the same time interesting facts. You can get this booklet from the Minister of Labour's office.

In 1987, there were 321 government health and safety inspectors. By 1993, there were only 279. This is minus 42 inspectors, or minus 13%.

As a direct result of there being minus 42 inspectors, there were 27,541 fewer inspections and 14,190 less orders to make the workplace safer.

There were minus 2,105 stop-work orders.

There were 207 less fines. That's minus 177 from the previous years, or 74%.

Prosecuted cases fell from 510 in 1988 to 159 in 1993. That is a minus of 351 cases, or minus 69%.

Work-related fatalities rose from 258 to 275 in the one-year period of 1992-93. Seventeen more workers died, or plus 7%.

This all happened in a recession when the workforce was down more than 100,000 workers; 1993 made 1987 look like the good old days when it came to health and safety in the workplace. What I find interesting is the fact that when the workplace became the darkest and the most dangerous was in a time when the government was labour-oriented.

Now I'd like to speak on the WCB.

The Monthly Monitor is a free magazine that anybody can get by simply writing in to the Workers' Compensation Board. I have a copy of the document here, but it's actually put out by the board, so I'm using their own figures. Did you know that according to the Monthly Monitor, in 1990, 19 or 14.7% of workers who died at work were not allowed "immediate death"? And 129 workers died that year. In 1994, 30 or 31.6% were not allowed to die. In 1995, by the end of July, 16 workers who died on the job were not allowed to die.

These numbers do not include workers who didn't die on the spot. If a worker took several hours or several days to die, he or she may very well find themselves among the five in 1994 who were and still are not allowed to die.

Some 237 workers died of fatal workplace diseases in 1994, and 131 or 55.3% were not allowed.

In 1990, 2.3% of all claims were denied, and even though the workforce fell by well over 100,000 workers in the years since 1990, every year more and more claims were denied: in 1991, 2.6%; in 1992, 3.2%; in 1993, 3.5%; in 1994, 3.7%; and as of the end of July 1995, 3% of all claims have been denied.

All this even though the total reported claims fell from 479,731 in 1990 to 374,243 in 1994. These figures as reported from the WCB itself clearly show that something is very wrong with the WCB, for the WCB is a no-fault social protection agency whose job is to protect the accident employer from getting sued and, most importantly, look after the injured worker. That is why it is called the Workers' Compensation Board. Any government that is elected to look after and help protect the very people who elected it should act swiftly to make amendments to the Workers' Compensation Act.

One has to look no further than the report of the chairman's task force on service delivery and vocational rehabilitation of July 1992. This report clearly defines the many problems both internal and external. What it says over and over again is that the WCB must be accountable. Until the WCB is accountable there will be many, many problems and it will be expensive to all concerned.

All the players will be affected one way or another. Today, as you can see, I took the liberty of bringing the file of an injured worker that I successfully represented at a WCAT. That is the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal, for those who may not know. It was a long fight but the injured worker found justice in the end, and I can tell you here today that it became very expensive for the WCB. They paid this injured worker more than $70,000, including interest on moneys owed. And that doesn't even touch the many, many hours, paid man-hours, for board workers who filled out the thousands of form letters and reports, nor does it include postage and other incidentals.

Why doesn't the WCB work? Look no further than articles 69 and 70 of the act. Article 69 deals with general jurisdiction of the board, and what does it say? It says in part:

"Except as provided by this act, the board has exclusive jurisdiction to examine into, hear and determine all matters and questions arising under this part and as to any matter or thing in respect of which any power, authority or discretion is conferred upon the board, and the action or decision of the board thereon is final and conclusive and is not open to question or review in any court and no proceeding by or before the board shall be restrained by injunction, prohibition or other...procedure in any court or be removable by application for judicial review or otherwise into any court. RSO 1980, c 539, s 75."

Section 70 of the act is the power to reconsider:

"The board may, at any time if it considers it advisable to do so, reconsider any decision, order, declaration or ruling made by it and vary, amend or revoke such decision, order, declaration or ruling. RSO 1980, c 539, s 76."

These are direct quotes from the act. I have the act here today.

In a nutshell, what the board is saying is that it can do whatever it wants whenever it wants to and that even the courts can't stop it. I don't believe for a minute that any government institution can put itself above the law, and the fact that it has not been challenged in a court of law by one of the legal clinics shows that we still have a long way to go, the point being that the WCB thinks it can do whatever it wants, whenever it wants to, and that it is not accountable to anyone. This must change. Taking sections 69 and 70 out of the act will be an awakening and a small step in the right direction.

What's needed before any major changes occur is dialogue between business, large and small, the injured workers' movement that represents the majority of injured workers, and the unions, who we know represent 31% of the workforce in Ontario. That's according to Statistics Canada.

Lastly, we could do what Australia, Belgium, Cyprus, France, West Germany, Spain, the United Kingdom, Japan, Italy and the Netherlands have already done and already found works. It's called the quota system. It's quite simple. It quite simply is a quota, that companies must hire so many injured or disabled workers, and the quota is from 2% to 6% of the workforce, depending on the country.

Those that hire more get a credit; those that don't, including the government itself, pay a fine. Some amounts of money collected because of fines, in Canadian currency, are: West Germany, in a single year, $122 million; Japan, $24.9 million. In 1989, West German companies, including their government, paid, as I've already stated, about $122 million in fines. The fine money goes to finance an impressive array of rehabilitation and training services. This quota system has been in some of the countries for over 40 years.

There are those who will tell you that there are too many employers and that it will be impossible to enforce such laws. That's like saying that unless every single person who exceeds the speed limit is stopped and prosecuted, a speed limit cannot work.

West Germany has twice the population of Canada, and their money is half as valuable as ours. I mention this only to show that we could generate enough money with the quota system to pay all the costs of rehabilitation and the cost to pensions of injured workers who cannot go back to work.

Let's remember the dignity of the injured worker when we start out to change the WCB, and the impact that such changes have on their families and the community at large.

Mrs Barbara Fisher (Bruce): I do appreciate your presentation this morning, and sometimes it's refreshing for us to have the opportunity of dealing with a person and not an organization. I appreciate that and I understand the amount of work it must have taken to put it together.

What specifically do you see in the bill that is before you today that you would highlight as your priority areas for repair? If the bill before you today is not what you agree with or can support, can you give us some specifics?

Mr Stephenson: Yes, I thought I said earlier I spoke in opposition to the bill. There is absolutely nothing in the bill that I see that's constructive, absolutely nothing at all. In fact, the only thing that even looks good is in the beginning where it says under Purpose it's to protect the injured worker etc, etc. That's already in the act and it's not working now and it's not going to work if we put it in there one more time.

Mrs Fisher: What specifically do you recommend? I hear that you don't like it, but I'm not hearing what the solution is. If we're not right, what is right?

Mr Stephenson: I mentioned the chairman's task force report put out by the government at the time in 1992, and it's extensive; you can get it. It was done internally with the board and externally with people such as myself and lawyers and other agencies, and they define what the problems are. The problem with the WCB is that it's not accountable. The chairman's task force report says it must be accountable.

There isn't any other organization in this province that's not accountable. Even the police force is accountable. The ladies and gentlemen in this room are accountable. But the board, under 69 and 70 of the act, are not accountable. The chairman's task force document—I have it here—states over and over again, and as well from board employees; it was done internally. It's the same message, whether it's from the inside or the outside, that the board must be accountable. It looks like this.

The facts and figures I gave you I got from the Minister of Labour's office, and the booklet looks like this. You guys will have an easier time getting it. It took me about six months to get it, and I knew what I was after. But you can see I used it.

The changes to the act now, none of them are any good. You have to think about it. The act itself is about 125 pages and it's half in English and half in French, so in reality we're only really talking about—give it 70 pages. Now the policy manual is an internal manual that the board has and it's how it interprets the act. The policy manual is 635 pages and they're all in English, so if you have an organization that takes 635 pages to interpret 70 pages, you've got a problem.

Many of the divisions at the board have four or five people to look at your case. They have a case worker, an adjudicator, a claims adjudicator and a voc rehab, and on and on. If you put 10 people in a room with a problem you're going to have a really hard time getting all 10 people to agree on the same solution, and that's the problem with the board. It's not accountable. It's overstaffed in many areas, and areas where it should have more staff it doesn't. For example, the case workers themselves are under a heavy caseload. I process about 800 cases a year with our group, and I know. Everything's just a blur after a while. I would suggest no more than 150 cases per case worker and that the case worker would see the case—this is very important—from the beginning to the end, because they don't get to see the end results, so they just race up and down.

The Chair: I'm afraid, Mr Stephenson, we've actually run a bit overtime, but we do appreciate your taking the time and the trouble to have prepared that and to bring it down. I'm sure we'll have opportunities to discuss the other aspects of WCB, and we appreciate your making submissions here today.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS, LOCAL 4457

The Chair: Our next group up today is the Canadian Auto Workers, Local 4457. Good morning.

Ms Patty Harrington: Good morning. I'd like to begin by stating that I disagree with the Ontario government illegally firing the bipartite Workers' Compensation Board of directors and the bipartite board of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency, and then, after the fact, including Bill 15's retroactive legal protection for the government on this action.

The introduction of this bill sets the tone of the government to continue their attack on the most vulnerable people in Ontario. This whole agenda is about excluding the workers from having a say and setting the agenda in the workplace. That includes the Workplace Health and Safety Agency, the Workers' Health and Safety Centre and advisory boards for setting workplace standards.

Let me start by talking about the Workers' Compensation Board. Through Bill 15, the government claims to be responding to the unfunded liability "crisis."

The unfunded liability is not a debt. It includes premiums and pensions that would have to be paid out over a number of years. Revenues through WCB premiums would still be received to fund these future payments. To say the unfunded liability is a lie is not accurate, but to put it in a crisis context is irresponsible.

Bill 15 also sends a message that workers are defrauding the system, therefore responsible for the financial situation at the board. This is simply not true. This government treats workers as if they have behavioural problems when in reality they suffer injuries, illnesses and sometimes eventually death.

The WCB is not broke. It has more than $6 billion in assets. In 1994 it paid out more in rebates—$359 million—to employers than it imposed in penalties and made a declared surplus of $130 million.

There are 55,000 employers who currently owe around $430 million in unpaid assessments and penalties and 20,000 employers who haven't bothered to register with the WCB. There are also the workers who are not covered by compensation, ie, the financial institutions, insurance companies and doctors' offices, to name a few. These companies should be contributing and those owing should be forced to pay up.

The WCB already has the tools in place to deal with the small amount of worker fraud. There is no need for a whole new set of offences to target workers.

What is the Harris government planning to do to the injured workers? It wants to impose a three-day waiting period for WCB benefits; cut benefits by 5% or more; eliminate through review lifetime pensions awarded before 1990; eliminate compensation for specific injuries such as back and repetitive strain, chronic pain and stress, and reduce future economic loss awards by up to 40% for injuries after 1990. In the meantime, the employers' premiums will be reduced by 5%.

This bill also fires all the labour representatives on the Workers' Compensation Board of directors.

The focus of the purpose clause should be on providing injured workers with benefits and services and return-to-work programs, yet the first sentence of this clause unnecessarily places a duty for further financial accountability.

This bill proposes a new structure, with no commitment to include equal representation or an injured worker on the board. Workers should be entitled to have equal representation on the board.

I oppose Bill 15 and demand it be withdrawn and call for full benefits and services for all injured workers, including return-to-work programs to be restored; the restoration of the bipartite board of directors, including worker representation; an independent WCB, governed jointly by the workplace parties.

Now I would like to speak on health and safety issues. Workers need strong health and safety laws and the right to compensation to protect themselves.

An estimated 6,000 workers die of occupational disease in this province each year, and thousands suffer from work-related diseases. Not all deaths and injuries are recognized as work-related, and many, causing needless pain and suffering to these workers and their families, could have been prevented.

Unless the government strengthens the health and safety legislation, more workers will get sick and be killed. As with any other law, there has to be enforcement and a penalty levied on those who break the law.

Equally important to enforcement is that workers be allowed to participate in the development and delivery of preventive health and safety training. Employer groups are lobbying this government to censor worker input by completely withdrawing funding from the Workers' Health and Safety Centre. They are falsely claiming that WCB funding is employer-contributed. I have participated in several sets of negotiations and employers have calculated the wage package based on hourly wage, benefit cost and WCB costs. You then have to compete with the shareholders' demand for profit for any wage gains.

This clearly demonstrates that WCB funds are 100% worker-funded. To deny workers any say in compensation decisions and health and safety training is nothing short of censorship.

I repeat, I urge you to restore the bipartite board of directors of the WCB, I urge you to restore the bipartite board of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency and I further demand you continue to adequately fund the Workers' Health and Safety Centre.

Therefore, I oppose Bill 15 and demand it be withdrawn, that health and safety laws be strengthened and enforced and that workers are recognized as major stakeholders for issues concerning health and safety in the workplace.

I would like to express how glad I am for this opportunity to speak to this standing committee.

Mr Jean-Marc Lalonde (Prescott and Russell): On page 3, you referred to "providing injured workers with benefits and services and return-to-work programs." Did you want to refer to vocational rehab programs in this case? I would like to know what your view is on 50-and-older people when at the present time they are referred to rehab programs by going back to school. What is your position on this?

Ms Harrington: If you're injured and you're 50 years old and you get retraining and going back to school, it doesn't mean that you're going to get a job. It doesn't mean you're going to get even a full-time job and be able to afford to live any more. Then if you're hurt and you have to buy drugs and you're not covered for that, it's an even further debt on your shoulders.

Mr Duncan: You are referencing the unfair treatment from your perspective with respect to offences, so-called fraud committed by workers versus employers. I received some information from the board this morning that says that maximum fines are never levied for provincial offences against employers and that an employer would have to be convicted several times.

The highest fine ever against an employer was $2,000 and most are approximately $1,000, and on average there are two to four convictions per year—two to four convictions per year—and the board doesn't keep track of how many actual investigations there are. I wonder if you could comment on that, particularly relative to the fact that some of the provisions in Bill 15 are so onerous against workers. I'd like to hear your views a little bit more on that.

Ms Harrington: Some of this is hard to understand. I do try to represent injured workers, but there's the part in there about the 10-day—if you have to make a change—just let me find that.

Mr Duncan: The definition of material change, section 22.1. The worker sections are section 22.1 and subsection 161(2), which deal with the notion of material change. Subsection 161(2) is the offence provision under the new part V. Do you think that's quite onerous on workers relative to the kinds of burdens that are placed on employers?

Ms Harrington: Yes. It's not clear and I really don't know what it means. Does it mean if I forget to make a notice of a change in 10 days I'm going to get a fine, you know, be put in jail or something like that? People are going to be afraid to witness an accident because what if they report something wrong? It deals with intimidation tactics against the workers. Yes, you said that only a couple of the employers are ever fined.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you very much for your presentation. You refer a few times to the irresponsibility of the government to refer to the unfunded liability as a crisis. Some of the unions that have come forward have suggested that one of the revenue and expenditure problems is the whole experience rating system. I wonder if you've had any experience with that yourself at all. You're not familiar with it?

Ms Harrington: No. Maybe if you could explain a bit.

Mr Christopherson: No, that's fine.

What I would like to do, then, is move to the bipartite board structure. As you know, right now the board has equal representation between employers and employees. The government feels that this is no longer acceptable and it is going to reduce the employee representation to a minority position on the board. A number of unions have felt that this is going to be detrimental to workers because they've lost that 50% say in the decision-making. Can you share with us your thoughts on that?

Ms Harrington: I think it's very important that injured workers are included in the say because the other way, if it ends up with insurance companies or somebody that's not even a stakeholder in this saying what they think should go in, it's not fair. You need to have workers saying what their responsibility is and maybe they can help bring light to the problems that are on the board. Without that, it's going to be maybe people who don't know, they're not sure of what they're talking about, putting input in that makes decisions for thousands of injured workers.

Mr Ernie Hardeman (Oxford): I was just going through page 4, near the bottom. "They are falsely claiming WCB funding is employer-contributed. I have participated in several sets of negotiations and" realize that this is part of the wage package. I would totally agree with that, that in fact the cost of doing business to an employer is the total cost of labour as it relates to the product.

Why is it, then, on page 3, that "In the meantime, employers' premiums will be reduced by 5%"? Would that not fall into the same category, that in the process of negotiation this will in fact reduce the cost of the product, that the contribution is a total reduction? If it's totally employee-contributed in the first place, is that not a reduction to the employee?

Ms Harrington: I think this money they're going to save, the 5%, plus all the other savings they're going to get on the people who are not going to be covered, the loss of stress, chronic pain, back injuries, future economic loss awards, is the money that's going to go back to the shareholders. It's going to be bigger profits, and no, it won't be passed on to us.

Mr Hardeman: But when you negotiated the contract, including the cost of compensation as part of the cost in the package, when that cost is less, would that not automatically mean in your next negotiations that you would be able to negotiate that back into it as part of the employees' package?

Ms Harrington: That's part of the whole picture in negotiations. There's only so much money, right? If it goes to your work boots or your holidays or wherever it's getting divided up, I believe that money will still go back to the shareholders. It'll be bigger profits for the corporations.

The Chair: We've now reached the end of our 15 minutes. We appreciate you taking the time to come in and make presentations to us today.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS, LOCAL 303

The Chair: Our next group up will be the Canadian Auto Workers, Local 303. Good morning, gentlemen. I wonder if you'd be kind enough to introduce yourselves to the committee and to Hansard.

Mr John Sommerville: My name is John Sommerville. I'm the chairman of the WCB committee for CAW Local 303. My colleague is Rob Wiersma, who is a WCB rep as well.

Our local usually submits a written brief to the royal commissions and there are, in the records of the Parliament, several of our briefs which speak precisely to various issues that we think should be corrected in the workers' compensation system.

However, this morning I felt it was more useful to attempt to shed some light on what is the perception of people who are involved directly in the compensation appeals process and who deal with the system on a day-to-day basis, in the hope that we might be able to ward off what appears to be a disastrous possibility for the injured workers we represent and injured workers in general in the province of Ontario.

My understanding of the proposed changes of the present government include certain key elements that our senior groups like the CAW national office and the Ontario Federation of Labour have addressed in specific terms. I would like to speak to some specific issues. I notice that the focus of the government is an effort to try and pay down or eliminate what is called the unfunded liability. For the record, the workers' compensation system has not always been a victim of unfunded liability. It's a relatively recent development, actually.

The development of the unfunded liability, as I understand it from my reading of both board documents and the general history, actually dates back to some time in the 1980s. Prior to that, the liability of the Workers' Compensation Board was in fact being covered more or less by collecting premiums from employers around the province of Ontario. What happened in the 1980s was that the board, for its own reasons, some of which we would have to assume were political in origin, decided to give employers a bit of a holiday on the premium rates that they had to pay. That holiday resulted in the biggest portion of the unfunded liability.

The other element that I understand caused some of the unfunded liability had to do with some relatively unwise investments made in European principalities that resulted in large losses.

It is absolutely unacceptable to any reasonable citizen to have those burdens transferred on to the backs of injured working people in the province of Ontario.

I'd like to specifically address these remarks to the Conservative members of Parliament who are present here today. The Conservative Party has a very long and dynamic history in the province of Ontario. They ruled in an uninterrupted way for 40 years, during which time they very much were involved in the administration of a Workers' Compensation Act which has a history. That history goes back to around 1911. At that time, a deal was struck. It was a historic deal. The deal was that injured workers would surrender the right to sue their employers in court for damages for neglect, in lieu of which they were to receive compensation benefits that were to be paid in a "non-adversarial environment."

What I see happening and what I fear is going to happen if the changes that are proposed are put in place is that workers will be put into a system where that historic deal, which, because the Conservatives ruled the province of Ontario for 40 uninterrupted years, they bought into for at least 40 years in recent history, is going to be broken.

One of my questions, and it's a rhetorical question, is, for the three-day period that workers would be obliged to wait prior to receiving compensation benefits, will their right to sue their employers for neglect or negligence be restored?

The other question I would like to raise to the whole panel for all of your considerations: The last time I checked, injured workers pay 100% of the price for a loaf of bread or a pound of meat or five pounds of potatoes. Because a worker gets injured, he doesn't automatically get a cheaper mortgage, cheaper car payments or cheaper anything else. Why on earth would it be reasonable, rational or acceptable to any humane body to suspect that a working person injured through no fault of his own would be placed in a position to receive, not 95% of his net, which approximately works out to his wages since it's untaxed—an 85% payment does not produce that result.

So please, ladies and gentlemen, consider that the people you're talking about here are your constituents. They are regular taxpayer-citizens. In addition to that, almost 100% of the money they get gets distributed to merchants, bankers and other people with whom some of you may have a closer relationship than I do.

Additionally, I also heard some discussion that you were interested in ending fraud, stopping the cheaters. Believe me, as a taxpayer and a citizen and a person who is an advocate in the compensation system, I too am very anxious to bring an end to any fraud. If somebody were to ask me, "Is there fraud among injured workers?" I would have to admit, yes, there is. It is relatively small; it is certainly, in terms of monetary importance, relatively unimportant.

The important areas of fraud are in the underground economy. Many, many construction firms working in the fair city of Toronto and around the province of Ontario employ workers outside the system. They pay no premiums, and there is absolutely no mechanism to enforce the payment of premiums by those companies.

There are people at the board who are employed as investigators, whose primary function is to investigate claimants. They go out and they do that. Some of what they do is reasonable and acceptable, and some of what they do is much less than that. But that's as it would be with any system.

So, in closing, since you have all of the briefs and the practical material before you, I hope that you study it. I hope you do not proceed to break this historic deal with your constituents, those injured workers who through no fault of their own suffer an injury in the workplace. I do not know, in my 22 years of experience as a union rep, of one single instance where a worker knowingly put himself in the way of an injury. I guess I've been lucky; I never met any masochists. If I meet any masochists, I will advise them that that's an unwise behaviour. Masochism is, as I understand it, a relatively rare disorder. Any questions?

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for your presentation. I think you've done an excellent job of outlining how the changes that this government has introduced will work to the detriment of workers and to the benefit of employers and their bottom line.

I'd like to focus a bit on the bipartite board that's being dissolved. As you know, right now workers have 50% representation on the board and have an equal say in the decision-making. This government has decided that workers need to be put in their place, and their place is a minority voice on this board. Can you give us your thoughts, in your own words, about how you think workers, the people for whom this system was set up in the first place, will be losing as a result of the 50% bipartite representation they now have being knocked aside?

Mr Sommerville: Yes, David, I think I can. My experience goes back to before we had bipartite and after, so I have a certain advantage of an overview. Before we had bipartite, the role of the MPP was very much central to resolving workers' compensation problems in the board, because the only instrument that union reps like myself had to try and move a system that tended to be rather slow off square one was to contact the chap's member of Parliament, ask for a letter—and I know you folks are busy folks, and I think you want to think about the future carefully when you think about that, because when we lose the bipartite approach, we lose the people with whom we assist our injured workers.

Typically—I'll give you a case example—in the old days, a worker would get injured on the job. His case would go into investigation. Investigation by the board into the case might result in a delay of six to eight months, typically. In the interim, the workers I represented were relatively fortunate; they had a health care plan that clicked in and they had supportive benefits.

But in order to win the chap's case, or at least to get some speed to the resolution of the case, I would contact the local member of Parliament, whether that was a Liberal, Conservative or an NDP person. I would contact that person, write him a letter, he would write a letter to the appropriate adjudicator providing some supportive information that I would provide to him, that would go through a bureaucratic process, and eventually I might be able to cut a month, or a month and a half if I had a really sharp MPP working on the job, to get it done.

When we got the barpi—bipartite—sorry, I got my tongue in my eyetooth so I couldn't see what I was saying. When we got the bipartite boards—that's hard to say fast—what happened is, I had a contact person at the board who would quite honestly, very objectively, look at the facts and, if he saw that somebody was dragging their feet on purpose, speed up the process, and I might be able to cut as much as four months off of what was otherwise a built-in delay. I think that might focus what your future's going to be like, because I can assure you, if the bipartite board goes away, all of the people I have who are having problems with the board are going to be

Now, you might say, "That's great; I'm going to have some direct contact with some of my constituents." But there's a problem in it, because I don't care how good you are, that bureaucracy's going to eat your time up just like it eats mine.

Mr Baird: I'll just go very quickly, given that we've only got about a minute and a half left. With respect to the three-day waiting period and the question you brought up with respect to the right to sue being restored, that will form part of Mr Jackson's study. He'll be issuing a discussion paper in the coming weeks and will then be undertaking a consultative process. I'm sure he'd welcome your views and thoughts on that when he does begin his consultative process, shortly after the release of his discussion papers. That's so he'll have a focused and clear discussion on that.

With respect to the reduction of benefits, I think the motive is very important here. We may disagree on the substance of it. Our motive is I think twofold. One is to have a WCB system there to protect injured workers that's financially strong and vibrant to ensure that we can meet the demands, the justifiable and straightforward demands of injured workers; that the money is there for them. We believe that if we don't take action, the money simply won't be there for them, and that's our motive. We very well may disagree on how to get there.

Secondly, with respect to job creation, we believe that a good WCB system is important for job creation and an expanding, growing economy. That's another one of our motives.

Finally, I would wholeheartedly concur with your view when you said that you were anxious to bring an end to any fraud in the system. When you stated that there would be inevitably some level of worker fraud—we don't know, no one knows—I would just wholeheartedly share your view. In our judgement, no matter how small it is, no fraud is good and we want to make sure that both workers and employers don't defraud the system, because I suppose they're not so much defrauding the system but defrauding injured workers themselves. We believe that no fraud is good and I would just concur with your remarks there.

Mr Sommerville: I'm going to interpret your question, because it wasn't framed as precisely as a question as I thought it was.

On the three-day waiting period, you should think about the jurisprudence that is built into the compensation appeal system. One of the principles you have to understand is a concept called workers' continuity of complaint. If you delay the complaining process by three days, particularly in non-unionized environments, you're going to have intimidated injured workers forced to beg for work placement while injured. Since they can't afford to do without the money—I know this may not be a part of your experience, but workers really need all the money they get. I read a statistic the other day that 80% of the people in Canada are spending 117% of what they earn. Obviously, workers cannot afford to lose three days' wages or benefits that would replace it.

In addition to that, you must come to understand that that initial report of injury is absolutely vital to a fair appeal process. If you eliminate that evidence that happens at day one when the guy gets hit by the truck on the job and you force him to lose wages or benefits or you force him, in non-union environments, to beg his boss for some kind of like-job placement for which he has no legal or contractual rights, in those environments you're going to create such gross injustices that it will be unbelievable.

I know I'm over, but additionally, in regard to the unfunded liability, the last time I checked, the banks and the insurance companies were not a part of this system. If the banks and the insurance companies were to be made a part of this system, as they well and properly should be, because people in banks do get injured, people in insurance companies do get injured, this system, which is supposed to be an all-encompassing system to cover all of the workers in the province of Ontario, would be totally funded, if the banks only paid their fair share.

The Chair: We appreciate your presentation here today, Mr Sommerville and Mr Wiersma.

Just for the members of the committee, we have one housekeeping matter. The group slated to speak to us at 11 o'clock still has not arrived, and we've had not further correspondence from them. I guess there would be an opportunity for them to be slotted in at 6:15, given the standing order that was passed enabling our sitting times.

The procedural matter I'd like to deal with, though, is that Mr Christopherson has presented a substitute form. However, it was presented after the 30-minute deadline. Am I to take from your comments when you handed it in that there will be no other representative from your party?

Mr Christopherson: It's the only one that was confirmed. Yes, that's our difficulty. I apologize for the lateness, but it's from 5 o'clock on for today.

The Chair: It is within the purview of the committee, if it deems fit.

Mr Duncan: Do you want to allow them to substitute someone else?

The Chair: We need unanimous consent to allow them to do that. All agreed? Agreed.

Mr Christopherson: I appreciate that. Thank you, members of the committee.

The Chair: With that, the committee will stand recessed until 3:30 this afternoon.

The committee adjourned at 1203.

Consideration of Bill 15, An Act to amend the Workers' Compensation Act and the Occupational Health and Safety Act / Projet de loi 15, Loi modifiant la Loi sur les accidents du travail et la Loi sur la santé et la sécurité au travail.

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): Seeing a quorum, I call this meeting to order. Good afternoon, all. Our thanks particularly to the two groups that, unfortunately, were unable to make their presentations last Wednesday. We're particularly grateful that you've found the time to come back a second time to make your presentations to us today.

TORONTO WORKERS'
HEALTH AND SAFETY LEGAL CLINIC

The Chair: Our first group is the Toronto Workers' Health and Safety Legal Clinic. Mr Ublansky, good afternoon.

Mr Daniel Ublansky: Thank you. For those of you who aren't familiar with the clinic, we are funded by the Ontario legal aid plan to provide legal and technical advice and representation to unorganized workers who face health and safety problems at work. Our activities are controlled by a board of directors elected from the community. The clinic provides workers with information about health and safety hazards in their employment, advice about their rights under the law and legal representation where that is required. In addition to individual advocacy, we undertake community education and outreach programs aimed at unorganized immigrant workers and engage in law reform initiatives, such as the presentation of briefs to standing committees.

Every year, thousands of Ontario workers are killed or injured on the job. The exact number of injured workers is difficult to determine with precision. Although WCB statistics are the usual source of reference for this information, many have argued that the actual number of workers experiencing some form of occupational injury or disease is much greater.

A Statistics Canada survey that was done in 1991 found that two thirds of adults working at a job or business in Canada felt that they are exposed to health hazards at work. Half of those adults exposed to health hazards reported that they have actually suffered some form of adverse health effect as a result of that exposure. That means that less than 10% of workers whose health is damaged by their working conditions actually receive benefits from the Workers' Compensation Board.

In our submission, the real crisis in workers' compensation today is unsafe and unhealthy workplaces. No matter what numbers are used, the facts are undeniable: Too many workers are being injured and made sick at work. Employers in this province must be held accountable for the compensation crisis which they have created in their workplaces.

Employers have a responsibility under the Occupational Health and Safety Act "to take every precaution reasonable...for the protection of a worker." The Ministry of Labour employs over 200 inspectors to cover almost 120,000 workplaces in Ontario and enforce the provisions of the Occupational Health and Safety Act. In 1994-95, inspectors made 30,000 visits to workplaces and issued 40,000 orders in respect of violations. These violations, together with the 300,000-plus claims which are allowed by the Workers' Compensation Board, speak for themselves as to the lack of commitment of employers to the health and safety of their workers. It should come as no surprise to anyone that compensation costs are as high as they are when there is such little regard for health and safety legislation.

We do not accept or believe that it is impossible to reduce accidents and occupational illnesses to a manageable level. There are responsible employers who are committed to health and safety in their workplaces, and the results show up in their accident frequency rates as well as in their profit levels. However, the majority of employers view safety legislation as a nuisance and refuse to make the additional expenditures required to avoid lost-time injuries. These employers are being subsidized by the good performers and by injured workers who have had to absorb reductions in benefits in recent years. How long are we going to continue to let these poor performers off the hook?

Earlier this year, Liberty International Canada commissioned a study of the workers' compensation system by William Wilkerson. The conclusions and recommendations of that study provide a balanced approach to WCB reform. The study attacks the notion that accidents are inevitable and proposes that WCBs take a much more aggressive approach to the issue of prevention. In fact, the study places the highest priority on encouraging employers to improve their health and safety performance.

The potential for savings in this approach is enormous. If one examines the lost-time accident frequency figures for firms in the same industry, there is a tremendous range of experience. The following table extracted from the study demonstrates this variability. If you look at the numbers before you, it's just striking how the worst performers are so much worse than the average.

Dupont Canada Inc is an example of the spectacular results that can be achieved as a result of a corporate commitment to health and safety. Dupont has a lost-time frequency rate that is 100 times better than the average of Ontario manufacturers. If the level of lost-time claims costs in Canada could be reduced to a level that is 10 times higher than the Dupont Canada rate, the reduction in costs could eliminate the unfunded liability and eventually contribute to a reduction in employer assessment rates, according to the study.

The study describes the research which has been done to try to identify the factors which distinguish the good performers from the bad. Again, without getting into a detailed description of that research, one conclusion is clear: Many of the most important determinants of frequency of injury claims are factors which employers can control. That is the bottom line.

Having identified the substantial potential for improvement, the study proposes a series of win-win strategies that offer cost containment as a natural outcome, not a driving strategic purpose. These strategies focus in on the two key drivers of cost in the system: accident frequency and accident severity. The study concludes, "The only long-term way to reduce workers' compensation costs is for everyone to commit to the idea that all injuries and illnesses are preventable." When accidents happen, there must be a disability management program in place that ensures "the duration of lost time is the minimum necessary to return the injured worker safely to the job." In other words, the two strategies are keyed to reduction of accidents and early return to safe work. Those are the long-term solutions to the problems of workers' compensation.

The importance of the Liberty International Canada study is that it shifts the focus of reform back where it properly belongs: to the workplace. Employers control what goes on in Ontario workplaces and employers must accept the lion's share of the burden for implementing the long-term solutions to problems in the system. As the study points out:

"It is important to underline the role of employers in the first two stages of the win-win strategy. They must make a solid commitment to the mutual problem-solving approach and the concomitant changes in the working culture that are needed to foster shared decision-making. They need to lead an exceptional commitment to safety and prevention of accidents in the workplace. They must be supportive to the injured worker and participate fully in return-to-work activities. There must be a diligent search for modified work activities and a willingness to make justified work process changes that reduce risk. In short, there must be an acknowledgement that an important share of the burden of workers' compensation reform rests with the employer. Where employers are prepared to take on this leadership role, success will be achieved only if workers and unions are fully committed to a mutual problem-solving role."

This approach is in contrast to reform efforts which focus on the management and administration of the WCB per se. Sometimes there is a tendency to believe that improvements in the internal administration of the WCB combined with legislation that compels workers and employers to behave differently will result in better outcomes for all parties. Although some benefits can result from this approach, they are far less lasting and far less beneficial than when the workplace parties have developed the solutions themselves.

Unfortunately, Bill 15 is one of those reform efforts that focus on management and administration of the WCB for the most part. It introduces a series of punitive measures against employers and workers which will likely create a great deal of apprehension and confusion and do little to improve the Workers' Compensation Board's financial position.

Just to highlight several features, the provisions which require reporting of "a material change in circumstances" and create an offence for failure to do so are much too vague to be understood by injured workers. How is one to judge what constitutes a material change? This is a complex legal question that can't be answered in a vacuum. If there are specific areas of conduct that the government wishes to deal with, then they should be identified and particularized.

Similarly, the provision making it an offence to make a false or misleading statement or representation in connection with entitlement to benefits creates the potential for considerable abuse. This goes far beyond dealing with deliberate attempts to defraud the board in order to secure the payment of benefits. What constitutes a misleading statement or representation in connection with any person's entitlement to benefits? Again, an open-ended question. This is a complex legal question which, if interpreted broadly enough, would serve as an intimidation factor in the representation of injured workers. Surely the board is able to sift through misleading statements or representations and render its decisions on the basis of the facts that are before it.

Finally, and of particular concern to the clinic in light of the comments I made earlier, are the amendments to the purpose clause. On the one hand, while we support the inclusion of paragraphs 5 and 6, which add the prevention of occupational illness and injury and the promotion of health and safety to the purposes of the act, by subjecting these purposes to the proviso that they are to be accomplished in a financially responsible and accountable manner, it sends a mixed message to employers, in our view. If the intent of these qualifications is to say that it is acceptable to put a price on worker health and safety, then we believe this will be counter-productive. As the Liberty International Canada study points out, it is important to encourage employers to view safety as an investment. We believe that this provision will focus attention on the cost element and provide a justification for inaction.

I thank you for the opportunity to make these submissions. If there are any questions, if we have time, I'll be happy to address them.

The Chair: Actually, Mr Ublansky, your timing was perfect, just fractionally over 15 minutes. Again, we appreciate your coming and making a second trip to see us, and particularly for bringing your comments in written form. That will assist us this afternoon.

GLAXO WELLCOME INC

The Chair: Our second group this afternoon is from Glaxo Wellcome Inc. Good afternoon.

Mr Bill Laidlaw: Chairman and members of the committee, thank you for the opportunity to make this presentation today. I was here last week but, unfortunately, couldn't present to you for reasons that you're aware of. My name is Bill Laidlaw and I am the director of government relations for Glaxo Wellcome Inc. I would like to start by giving you a brief description of our company and our presence in Ontario.

Glaxo Wellcome was created by Glaxo Canada's acquisition of Burroughs Wellcome in March of this year. Glaxo Wellcome is one of Canada's largest research-based pharmaceutical companies, with annual sales of approximately $400 million. We're also the largest brand-name company in the world at this point in time.

Glaxo Wellcome Canada manufactures a wide range of prescription products for markets in both Canada and the United States. In Canada alone, Glaxo Wellcome invests more than $50 million annually in research and development, including basic clinical research through partnerships with companies, academic institutions and support of independent research.

Glaxo Wellcome operates two facilities in Ontario: a head office in Mississauga and a manufacturing plant and development laboratories in Etobicoke. In total, Glaxo Wellcome employs 1,100 people in Canada and 800 in Ontario.

Glaxo Wellcome has made significant investments in Ontario over the last few years. In 1991, our Mississauga headquarters was completed. This marked the first phase of a multimillion-dollar expansion by Glaxo Wellcome, including a state-of-the-art manufacturing plant. Many members of the Liberal, Conservative and NDP caucuses were at that opening.

Construction of a new $111-million manufacturing and product development facility, adjacent to the administrative offices in Mississauga, will be completed in 1996 and operational in 1997, when we hope to have an opening. Glaxo Wellcome will employ approximately 350 people at this facility. All manufacturing of Glaxo Wellcome products will be consolidated in the new Mississauga facility, including the production of tablets, medicated creams, ointments, liquids and finished packages.

These investments have resulted in a significantly increased workforce. In the past seven years Glaxo Canada, now Glaxo Wellcome, has more than tripled the size of our workforce. More than 70% of these jobs were created in Ontario. Our commitment to Ontario and to our employees is the reason I am here today.

Glaxo Wellcome Canada competes directly with other Glaxo Wellcome companies worldwide for investment and product manufacturing mandates. As a result, a receptive and encouraging business environment and a productive and healthy workforce are critical to our success.

As we grow, so does our contribution to research and development, to the quality of health care for our customers and to the Ontario economy through investment and job creation. Our continued success is in large part the direct result of a capable and committed workforce.

In turn, our company is committed to providing a safe and healthy work environment for our employees. Our health and safety record is very strong and our WCB claims rate is low compared with the industry average. This is the direct result of a proactive approach and commitment to occupational health and safety throughout the company, which includes such things as: joint health and safety committees which meet regularly; an electronic, online health and safety manual, and a health and safety library accessible to all employees; compliance with federal and provincial legislation, including WHMIS and regular safety inspections and audits; a fitness centre and an occupational health unit—a nurse and doctor are on site; and a proactive claims management program and modified return-to-work programs.

First, let me say that Glaxo Wellcome supports the government's commitment to completely reform the workers' compensation system in Ontario. With an unfunded liability of $11.4 billion, near-paralysis of policy decision-making created by a bipartite board structure, inefficiencies in the system, benefit levels which are the highest in Canada and continued uncertainty about entitlement in several key areas, the interests of injured workers and employers were not being well served.

In reforming the system, a balance must be struck between securing reasonable benefit levels and an effective service for injured workers, and establishing sufficient accountability and financial integrity to ensure that employer contributions which fund the system result in its long-term sustainability.

It is clear that short-term, Band-Aid solutions do not resolve these complex problems. A complex overhaul is needed to ensure a financially stable system that responds effectively to the needs of injured workers and employers. Bill 15 is an important first step in the achievement of this goal.

Glaxo Wellcome supports changing the structure of the Workers' Compensation Board of directors from a bipartite to a multi-stakeholder model. The workers' compensation system would be best served by a board made up of experts in a range of disciplines relevant to an effective insurance system for injured workers. In addition to representatives of employers and workers, representatives from such areas as health care, occupational health and safety, and the insurance industry, for example, would provide important perspectives and valuable advice on workers' compensation issues.

As with corporate boards, directors should use their individual expertise to the betterment of the overall organization in the case of workers' compensation systems. In doing so, they represent the interests of the system's stakeholders, ie, employers and employees. In the past, Workers' Compensation Board members were appointed to represent the interests of either workers or employers, which often caused decision-making paralysis and resulted in decisions that didn't necessarily benefit the system as a whole.

We support the board structure proposed in Bill 15. It will allow employers and workers to be represented but also enable the board to have a broader expertise, critical for running an effective workers' compensation system.

Glaxo Wellcome also supports the introduction of greater financial accountability measures throughout the workers' compensation system. The future needs of injured workers will only be met by a system which is financially sound and able to meet future commitments. Employers must also have confidence that the funding they provide is used efficiently and effectively for its intended purpose; namely, the fair compensation, rehabilitation and timely return to work of injured workers.

The purpose clause introduced in Bill 15 is an important step towards establishing financial accountability through the system. While the board of directors was already required to act in a financially responsible and accountable manner, according to the changes made by Bill 165, passed last year, its ability to ensure financial accountability through the system was limited. The new purpose clause will require all actions by those in the system to be performed within the framework of financial responsibility and accountability. This can benefit everyone the system serves by ensuring the long-term financial stability of workers' compensation in Ontario.

Glaxo Wellcome also supports the initiatives taken in Bill 15 to eliminate fraud. These measures will ensure that the funding provided by employers goes directly to helping injured workers be rehabilitated and return to work. Fraud only serves to weaken the system by increasing costs for employers and creating an atmosphere of mistrust for the vast majority of injured workers who have legitimate claims.

Clear rules and stiffer penalties for employers who report incorrect information, or do not report at all, are another important measure taken in Bill 15.

Under value-for-money audits, they're simply a good business practice. Bill 15 requires an audit of one program each year to monitor whether revenues are spent efficiently and in a way that achieves the goals of the organization. We support the use of value-for-money audits until the unfunded liability of the system is eliminated. However, we believe that auditing only one program per year is not sufficient to identify waste and improper spending quickly, given the current financial state of the system and the unfunded liability.

Glaxo Wellcome supports Bill 15 as an important first step in reforming workers' compensation in Ontario. The changes in Bill 15 will set the stage for what we hope will be a complete restructuring and refocusing of the system in the longer term, including benefit levels and entitlement and assessment rates. We look forward to the important work of Minister Cam Jackson in the next stage of the reform process.

Thank you for the opportunity to make the presentation. I will be pleased to respond to any questions you might have.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Laidlaw. We have five minutes and will start this round with the official opposition.

Mr Dwight Duncan (Windsor-Walkerville): Just a couple of questions regarding your statements, first of all, on the structure, moving into a multipartite structure. Does your company have any views on whether or not the proposed bill should be more specific with the exact composition of the board as opposed to the clauses which are in the bill right now?

Mr Laidlaw: We did make a suggestion in our presentation that a broader group of people be included. I come from an insurance background. I worked at Paul Revere Life Insurance Co for five years and I obviously have a bias in that it's important to have the right people at the helm making the right decisions, but today workers' compensation is a little bit different. I think it's important to have people from a number of sectors. That would be my answer.

Mr Duncan: Finally, moving on to the question of value-for-money audits, how does your company do value-for-money audits? Do you have a rotating policy?

Mr Laidlaw: I know we do them. I don't know the exact details as to how we do them.

Mr Duncan: How often would you do them?

Mr Laidlaw: We have a very good track record. We actually got a refund, and we have done in the last two or three years, based on how we manage our claims.

Mr Duncan: No, value-for-money audits in your company. Do you do them very often?

Mr Laidlaw: I don't know that; I can't comment.

Ms Shelley Martel (Sudbury East): Mr Laidlaw, on page 6 you talk a little bit about the bipartite board, which of course this bill is getting rid of. You said, in particular, "In the past, Workers' Compensation Board members were appointed to represent the interests of either workers or employers which often caused decision-making paralysis and resulted in decisions that didn't necessarily benefit the system as a whole." Most of the employers have come before us and said that, and I've been pretty clear about asking each employer group that's come if they could give me one or two examples of where that did occur under the board of directors that was put in place under our government.

Mr Laidlaw: I sit on the Business Research Network or the Novatel Group. Glaxo Wellcome does that because it's important for us to look at all issues other than just pharmaceutical issues. I guess the group that is composed there would be made up of people from GM, Ford, Chrysler, IBM and others. The examples that I have heard from them and members of other associations indicate to me that—the scenarios and the anecdotes are quite astounding—there was gridlock there and there were examples of it. Now, for me to give you a concrete example of a personal one, I can't give you one, but having sat there through a number of committees, I guess my general read on the situation was that there had to be a better system.

Ms Martel: Don't feel bad. The other employer groups couldn't give me concrete examples either, so you're in the same boat as they are.

Mr Laidlaw: But I can get you something, Ms Martel, if you'd like.

Ms Martel: That would be helpful, because actually, the worker representatives who came—there were two of them: John Martin from Steelworkers and the rep from UFCW—made it very clear, as members who had sat directly on the board, that the minister's characterization, which is the same characterization that business is using, was, frankly, grossly unfair and that a number of good measures were passed in the times that were there; but yes, there was give and take as there should be give and take in any set of negotiations between the workplace parties.

It would be helpful if you could get that to this committee, because we haven't been able to track that down on the employers' side yet.

Just one other quick question. Where you say, "As with corporate boards, directors should use their individual expertise to the betterment of the overall organization, in this case the workers' compensation system," given that the representatives who were on the bipartite board were selected, five from worker organizations and five from business, don't you think that both business and labour would have been very careful and very clear about putting people on who would do just that: use their expertise to the betterment of the association or the organization?

Mr Laidlaw: Based on what I read and heard, I think they tried to, but the fact that it was a 50-50 split and the workers' union people seemed to clearly represent that group and business the other group—there was always a gridlock. I would think that the people who were appointed before were acceptable, but that 50-50 split is difficult when you're only representing your particular group. I think what this government's suggesting in terms of a multi-stakeholder group would be a lot more effective and efficient.

Ms Martel: If you could get us those concrete examples, that would be very helpful.

The Chair: We have time for one quick question, Mr Carroll.

Mr Jack Carroll (Chatham-Kent): Mr Laidlaw, on the same idea of the makeup of the board: If we designated the board as having two people from labour and two people from management and, say, three people from the community at large, with that designation in the rules, do you think that those people could come, as you say, to represent the betterment of the overall organization; or, being specifically named in the act to represent labour or management, would they have to come necessarily to represent that constituency?

Mr Laidlaw: I think when you look at representing, that's difficult. If we, in companies, had people on our boards who represented only one particular group of people, then we wouldn't have the best-managed companies. I think you've got to clearly establish the criteria for selection and get the very best people you can get, based on merit, and maybe it should be an independent group that looks at that. But certainly, just focusing on, "Okay, if I'm there, I'm going to represent only my issues"—you've got to open up your mind and look at what's best for the actual Workers' Compensation Board.

The Chair: With that, we've reached our 15 minutes. Thank you very much, Mr Laidlaw, for not only coming to see us today but for making a second trip down, and thank you for your presentation and for your comments.

With that, we are finished with our presentations and we may now proceed to clause-by-clause. With the exception of Ms Martel who I'm sure will correct us if we take any missteps, if the clerk doesn't catch us first, I think we're all new to this process.

With your indulgence we'll proceed through, and as the first order of business—I think you've all had proposed amendments circulated; there have been a number proposed by both the official opposition and the third party—we'll go through this bill, as the term suggests, clause-by-clause and with your indulgence I'd first ask if there are any comments, questions or amendments to part I of the act.

Mr Duncan: What is the rule on comments? Why don't we have this discussion right now so we understand what the process is and we don't get tied up in procedural debates later on? How are we going to do this? Are we allowed to make a comment on each clause if we choose or how are we going to handle that?

The Chair: Mr Duncan, recognizing that all three parties had suggested they would respect a two-hour deadline, the Chair is open to any comments you care to proffer on any section, recognizing the fact that I would think you would want to save sufficient time to deal in depth with your amendments.

Mr Duncan: Are we going to deal with the amendments as we come to those sections? Is that the idea?

The Chair: That's correct. So right now, if we could just deal with part I of the act, are there any comments on that?

Ms Martel: Yes. If I might, I want to comment on paragraphs 5 in the purpose clause, which would read, "To prevent or reduce the occurrence of injuries and occupational diseases at work," and 6, "To promote health and safety in workplaces." Much of the change you see happening here in terms of adding those to the purpose clause is because the bipartite health and safety agency has been abolished by this government. We wait to see what will replace it.

Part of my concern with respect to why we're seeing this change now is that I disagree fundamentally with the movement of the health and safety agency and the work that it was doing into the Workers' Compensation Board, because I do believe very strongly that the focus that should be placed on prevention and preventive measures is not a focus and is not a responsibility of the board and one the board staff are going to be able to undertake. They're having enough difficulty just dealing with providing benefits to injured workers.

I'm very much opposed to that change and believe that the ministry and the minister should have kept in place the bipartite board that was established first under the Liberals and then supported by us.

Mr Duncan: We just wanted to comment, as we did in debate in the Legislature, that despite the government's indications to the contrary, really this is nothing but a rearrangement of financial accountability that's already there.

With respect to the addition of points 5 and 6, we initially expressed concern that the health and safety act and the enforcement of the health and safety act not be moved to the board, and both the parliamentary assistant to the minister and the minister have now said that will not be the case.

We see this as simply a rewording of something that was already in the act. It was mentioned by a couple of groups. Indeed, one of the presentations today made note of the fact that financial accountability was already there. This presumably strengthens that. We think that's debatable.

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): If I could just briefly respond, obviously the two fundamental changes made, in our view, to the purpose clause are re-establishing the importance of financial responsibility and accountability and, secondly, we think it's appropriate that basically what is an insurance agency seek as one of its purposes to promote health and safety in the workplace. That's our view.

The Chair: Any further comments on section 1? All in favour? Contrary? I declare that section carried.

Are there any questions, comments or amendments to section 2?

Mr Duncan: Again, in terms of the significance of the act, making an overpayment a debt due is something that, although it isn't specified in the act, has always been enforced, and we don't see this as a significant change except in the context that it's taken in, that is, the context of somehow accusing or blaming injured workers for the problems that we see at the board and to somehow suggest that injured workers are the reason why there is a big problem there. Again, this is a policy that's already practised by the board and we see this as being something of just stating the obvious.

The Chair: Any other comments on section 2?

Ms Martel: If I might, I think Dwight has moved on to section 3. Section 2 talked about the fines and penalties, which as I understand it just moved it all into the back. So in essence it's what we've already got in the bill as it currently stands. It's just been moved into a new part V.

The Chair: If there are no other comments on section 2, we'll call the vote on that section. All in favour of the section? Contrary? I declare that section passed as well.

Section 3, any comments, aside from the ones already made?

Ms Martel: If I might add to what the member has said, I'm really concerned about this particular section because it doesn't make it clear to people that a good part of the time that there's an overpayment, it's because it's happened at the board level, at the staff level; not purposely, not intentionally, not wilfully, but it happens, and we've seen it often in our office.

As it is written here, it makes it appear, frankly, that an injured worker should be penalized or is some type of criminal who we should go after immediately, regardless of his or her financial situation, in order to get that money back. I prefer to continue to use the current wording, which is in the legislation, which says very clearly that when money is owing to the board, it will be deducted from payments that are already being made to the injured worker, and a schedule of payments will be established that will not make his or her financial situation worse.

I am concerned about how this is written and what signal it will give to board staff in terms of very aggressively and actively going after an injured worker who's received an overpayment who's probably received that because of a fault of a board staff person in the first place.

Mr Baird: I'd like to respond. Obviously, the government's view, if an overpayment is made, whether it's a staff error, a human error, what have you, is that it only makes good common sense that the board would seek to recoup those funds, as is the case with unemployment insurance, for example. This is just basically strengthening the board's ability to do just that.

The Chair: I don't know if we normally allow rebuttal, but if you have any—

Ms Martel: We disagree about what the intentions of the board are going to be, I think, at this point.

The Chair: Okay. Any other comments on section 3? Is it the favour of the committee that section 3 carry? All in favour? Contrary? Section 3 carries.

Going on to section 4.

Mr Duncan: Section 22.1 and the subsequent subsection 161(2), as well as the same sections dealing with material change and the employer community: It would be my very strong recommendation to the minister and the government that they withdraw these particular clauses and refer them to Mr Jackson for further study.

I wrote the minister to that effect on Wednesday or Thursday last week, and she indicated at the time that her officials were looking at this issue. Given the range of concerns we've had expressed about this, both by the employer community and the worker community, I would really strongly, in as non-partisan a fashion as I can, recommend that the government refer these particular sections to Mr Jackson as part of his review.

Mr Baird: I appreciate your motivations in dealing with this issue. Obviously, our view on material change in circumstances is very fundamental to controlling both worker and employer fraud, that the obligation would be there on both parties to report in a positive sense any change in circumstances that occurs. We can obviously differ on that; we just think that it's essential, in terms of clamping down on both kinds of fraud, that when you're stealing money from the WCB by failing to report such a change in circumstances, you're taking money away from injured workers.

That's our view. So again, I appreciate your motive in speaking to that point, but it's our view to proceed.

The Chair: Are there any other comments?

Ms Martel: I guess I find the reference to "stealing money" a little bit strong. I think the PA wants to think about this a little further.

The fact of the matter is, both the employer and the worker groups have made it clear that the definition, or lack of definition, around "material benefit" is of great concern to them. Neither the employer community nor the worker community seems to have any kind of sense or notion as to what that in effect means and what they are supposed to be responsible for reporting to the board. I think that's a serious issue when you have at least that point in common from both of the groups that came before us, which on most other issues were quite divergent and separate in terms of their response to this bill.

I don't think anyone is condoning stealing; certainly no one is condoning fraud, but the fact of the matter is, the two parties that have to deal with workers' compensation have told this government there is no good, clear definition, and without that you are going to be penalizing people who may not have any clue and not wilfully, not knowingly, be in contravention of the act.

I think Mr Duncan is providing you an out on this which would allow some better work to be done and to try and get some consensus about what a material change actually means, and I think the government would be well advised to take that at this point.

Mr Carroll: On that same issue, because I think we used that terminology both as it relates to workers and as it relates to employers, can we get a comment maybe from some of the experts at the foot of the table here about whether the terminology "material change in circumstances" does leave the door open, as the opposition members would believe it does, or in fact do we have some fearmongering going on here? Can we have an interpretation of "material change in circumstance" from your perspective?

Mr Mitchell Toker: My name is Mitchell Toker and I'm with the policy division at the Ministry of Labour. The term "material change in circumstance" will need to be developed by policy at the WCB. The intent, however, of the words "material change in circumstance" is to reflect that something significant has occurred or will have occurred that will impact, in the case of the worker, his or her entitlement to benefits or quantum to benefits, and in the case of an employer, their financial obligations to the board.

In the case of an employer, it would be something that might impact their classification as an employer. If they moved from an accounting company into manufacturing: material change in circumstance. A worker, for example, who returns to employment, that would have an impact on his or her entitlement and/or quantum to benefits.

So I guess my answer is twofold. Policies will be developed. The ministry will be working closely with the board in developing those policies and communicating them clearly to employers and to workers. And, two, just how I explained it, it needs to be significant and it has to impact entitlement, quantum or the employer's obligations under the act.

Mr Carroll: Okay. Just as a follow-up, in your professional opinion, will the average worker or the average employer have trouble deciding that something is a material change in circumstance?

Mr Toker: The board will have to communicate very, very clearly and consistently. In the case of workers, it will, for example, need to go out on a regular basis when workers receive benefits and it will need to explain what might be a material change in circumstance. The board will need to develop policies and communicate them so that it's as clear as possible.

Mr Baird: I was just going to answer Ms Martel's question, but you provided the answer.

Mr Duncan: I'd just like to say to my friends opposite, put yourself in the position of the nine business groups who spoke about that definitional concern and think about, for a moment, the somebody somewhere down at Front Street devising rules and regulations around material change and what that can do to a business or to a worker.

What we've said simply is that Mr Jackson will be bringing back his report, I assume, in the spring. My understanding is the discussion paper will be tabled later this week or next week. It would seem, given the concerns that have been expressed both by the employer community and the worker community, that we ought to think carefully about what the definition of "material change" is. Those of you who are lawyers will know and understand that that definition could be very, very significant. We've heard now not just from union groups but from employer groups, and a variety of them, about their concerns around that.

One of the reasons we're engaged in this exercise is because of the problems at the board, many of which have been created by the very policymakers who are going to be asked to define "material change." So I would suggest that it would be not only in the interest of the employer and worker community, it would be in the interest of the Legislature and the House to refer these particular four sections to Mr Jackson's review so that they can either thresh out more clearly what the Legislature intends by "material change," and with the government's majority they can put it through then without, in my view—by the time this bill is proclaimed and put into effect, Mr Jackson's report will be coming out, in any event.

So I think you're really potentially prejudicing employers, and we've heard that from employer group after employer group, by leaving the definition of "material change" in the hands of some anonymous officials at the WCB who will put their corporate spin on it, and who knows what they'll come up with. We've heard again repeatedly from the Human Resources Professionals Association, a whole variety of employer groups, about their concern around that.

Ms Barbara Fisher (Bruce): Just a point of process here, just because we're rookies over here—at least I'll speak for me. My understanding is at the point where "material change" is defined, it will be back for approval process. It doesn't just happen because somebody decides what the definition is. Am I right or wrong? At some point in time, does the definition of "material change" come for approval?

Mr Toker: I'm sorry; I was consulting. Can you repeat your question?

Mrs Fisher: At some point in time, does the definition of "material change" come before the committee with further amendments to other parts of the act under Mr Jackson or not? Does it come for approval or does it just get decreed somewhere and become fact?

Mr Toker: Once this bill becomes law, it will be incumbent upon the WCB to develop a policy. I might add, and I'm not here speaking of the Workers' Compensation Board, but what I can advise the committee is that the WCB has had for many years now an extensive consultation process where it consults with employers and labour and injured workers on all policies of significance.

Mrs Fisher: My question is, once that definition is created—

Mr Toker: The answer is no. Once the bill becomes law, the WCB will develop a policy, it will be approved by its board of directors, and it will become an operational policy of the Workers' Compensation Board. So the answer to your question is that neither this committee nor any other committee of the Legislature would review "material change in circumstance."

Mrs Fisher: But it will have to be adopted by the board of directors?

Mr Toker: It will go before the board of directors.

Mrs Fisher: So my feeling then is there's still the screening process somewhere where workers, employers and others—assuming a tripartite board—will have the opportunity to debate whether or not the definition is suitable. Based on that, given the fact that this is a governance change as opposed to a policy change, I recommend support of the motion.

Mr Baird: I would just speak to the same point again. The WCB will have to develop very clear policies on this area, which it will with every area of the act. They will not simply give copies of Bill 15, once it's proclaimed, to injured workers and employers. They'll have to develop very clear and specific policies, forms, leaflets, communication material to give to those client groups so that they can access both the responsibilities and the opportunities accorded under the act.

I think it's very important that the board have the flexibility to change those policies over time should they feel they have a need to. We've heard group after group after group come before this committee and say, "How come employers can get by without meeting fully their obligations under the act?" This gives the board the flexibility to deal with those who would rather duck their obligations under the act. I mean, there are very clear responsibilities, for example, for employers under the act, and I think this gives the board the flexibility. It gives them strengthened powers than they currently hold to meet that challenge.

Ms Martel: If I might, the problem is the employers now have a number of responsibilities that they should be undertaking that the board should be monitoring. We heard from groups time and time again that in fact the board is not following up on (a) employers who refuse to register, and (b) employers who refuse to pay their assessments.

We're talking about a new section now in the act. We're not talking about giving the board or officials at the board some added strength with this particular section to do something more. There's stuff that they're not doing now.

What we're saying, I think, the two opposition parties, is clearly you've had employers and workers coming before this committee to say to you: "We would like this defined before this legislation gets passed. We would like it defined, probably because there are fines and penalties attached to it and we don't want to be responsible for paying fines or penalties or finding ourselves in the position of being fined or penalized because we were not given or do not know or do not have a good definition of 'material change.'"

So I think when you see two groups who have come before this committee and said very clearly, "We have some serious concerns that in fact this legislative body is going to pass this section and we are going to let it go to the board and be determined by some bureaucrats over there who don't have accountability or responsibility back to this group or to this assembly," when people say, "You ought to take a second look," that's what we should do.

The two opposition parties recognize that clearly, even if it were to come forward under Mr Jackson's amendments, the government has the majority. The government will have its say and its way at the end of the day. What we are pointing out to you, however, is clearly a concern that has come from both parties that I think would take very little, frankly, for the government to address in an appropriate way.

Mr Duncan: Just in conclusion, because we've gone over it now, this isn't being offered up in a partisan fashion. It's just a very genuine concern that's been expressed by most of the leading representatives and advocates of both sides. I don't see any downside, from the government's perspective, of putting it over into Mr Jackson's report which will come out and which will give both employers and workers an opportunity to have more say in the establishment of whatever policies are established resultant from these clauses to the bill.

The delay of three months, I think, would be in the best interest of everybody to at least allow them some time to find out what the board's thinking is on the issue of material change. My experience in the past with the board on matters of policy, when the policies are developed, is there isn't nearly the opportunity for meaningful input that you have, say, at a legislative hearing, and that it's often very frustrating when you try to bring those concerns to the board. And again, I've heard that from employers time and time again.

Mrs Fisher: I just want to address one point here. I'm very cognizant of the fact that many of the parties, both employers and employees, who attended the hearings questioned what really the definition would be. However, just to come back to one point, I think there is an opportunity for the non-partisan politics to benefit in the creation of a reasonable definition here. If the board is made up of all parties, like is proposed, and if—I don't care whether it's a bureaucrat, in all due respect. I don't care whether it's a bureaucrat who comes up with the proposed definition or whether it's a politician; the bottom line is it's supposed to be the definition that's best for people.

I think, in a non-partisan way, that then when the board, which is created of all people and all representatives—the workers, employers and others—get this new definition before them, it will have to be approved before it becomes something that's acceptable to them to work with as well. I personally am feeling very comfortable that that board is going to be very capable of doing that, with all of those interested parties involved and in part of the discussion. Whether they draft it or whether they revise it in the end, it doesn't matter to me, as long as it's fair to the worker and to the employer in the end. So I think we are taking care of it by passing it.

Again, I come back to the point that this is a governance issue. We're talking about definition of governance, not the actual definition itself, and I think it can be taken care of at the next stage.

Mr Bart Maves (Niagara Falls): I'd like to agree with Mrs Fisher's comments but I would like to add that I believe it's incumbent upon the board to come to some clarity in this area in a timely fashion.

Mr Pat Hoy (Essex-Kent): Just very briefly, these circumstances of material change is a grey area. We've heard this from management and labour sides both. If we're going to decide that the Workers' Compensation Board can decide all of these issues on their own, why are we amending the bill at all? So I think we should clear up this grey area and, as our critic has said, it will come to pass that we get to look at what is "material change," and the stakeholders will know.

The Chair: Thank you. Are there any further comments? Seeing none, I put the question. Shall section 4 carry? All in favour? Contrary? I declare that section carried as well.

Section 5: Are there any comments, questions or amendments on section 5? Seeing none, all those in favour that section should carry? Contrary? Section 5 carries.

On to section 6. There are three amendments. We'll take them in the order in which they appear within the section, which I'm told is the appropriate procedure. The Liberal motion would come first, the one amending subsection (1.1).

1630

May I speak to that? I don't want to take too much of the committee's time. We support the multi-stakeholder model, and we did so in the run-up to the election and in our Back to the Future document. The purpose of the amendment is to give more specificity to the government with respect to the actual makeup of the board itself. Instead of leaving it open-ended, we are suggesting that at least two members of employers and two members who represent workers or workers' groups be a member of that board. Our view is—am I supposed to read it?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Duncan: I apologize.

I move that subsection 56(1.1) of the Workers' Compensation Act, as set out in subsection 6(2) of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

Composition

(1.1) The board of directors shall be composed of,

(a) the chair;

(b) the president;

(c) two members who are representative of employers;

(d) two members who are representative of workers; and

(e) three members who are representative of the public.

The reason we are putting these forward is we believe that there are specific and defined stakeholders: the employer representatives, worker representatives, as well as the broader public interest, which should be represented on the board. This is consistent with the position we took in the election, although it is different definitionally. You'll be familiar, I know, Mr Baird, because of the number of times you've held up that red book, that we were, in our election document, more specific and we recommended a larger board with specific representatives like from the OMA and other professional groups, but for the purposes of saying that we support the multi-stakeholder model but that we would like to at least define how many worker and employer representatives, we've put this amendment.

Mr Baird: Just on that point: Obviously this goes to the essence of a multipartite board. I think you'd run into a tremendous amount of problems defining who is a representative of employers. If you had someone with an insurance industry background who had held managerial positions before their appointment, I think you'd have a tremendous amount of disagreement—are they representative of employers if they come from a management position in the insurance industry, for example? So I think this is just further debate on the issue of a genuine multipartite board or a sort of bipartite-like board.

Mr Carroll: I'll be opposed to this amendment. We got a comment from one of the presenters about people coming to the board from some constituency, not for some constituency. It's a very small differentiation but I think it's a very important one. I think as soon as we stipulate in the act that some people have to be there on behalf of a particular group, it is very difficult for them to come and not be for that group. Actually, all people are representative of the public. Whether they're workers or whether they're employers they all represent the public, so I think the open-ended model where everyone comes in the best interest of the Workers' Compensation Board, rather than in the best interests of workers, employers or somebody else, will give us the best chance at a board that is there to exercise its best expertise on behalf of all injured workers and all employers. For that reason, I will be opposed to the amendment.

Mr Duncan: If one looks at the composition of any board of directors in the private sector, you will see that the board is, in fact, made up of stakeholders. It's often composed of its bank, of its consumer groups; there are loads of instances of its major suppliers, of its major clients. That's the norm on most corporate boards. To suggest that certain groups don't have an interest in the functions or the affairs of the corporation is to simply not understand how virtually most private sector boards operate.

Take ManuLife insurance, for instance. The representatives on that board are composed of their bank, composed of their major suppliers, composed of their major clients. To ignore clients and suppliers and others who have a very direct interest in the affairs of the board is, in our view, to take an overly paternalistic view of how the board ought to function. Workers do have a say.

Our fear, quite frankly, with the wording of the bill as it stands is that workers will be left out. We believe it's the intention of your government not to have workers represented, and we think that would be a serious mistake. To not have a client group, a major client group that the board services, represented at the board level, is, in our view, just a very bad mistake in judgement. We think you can have a multi-stakeholder model and at the same time provide for representation for those groups.

We agree that the bipartite model has not worked because it doesn't take into consideration the broader public interest. We've proposed an alternative which we think is balanced and reasonable in the circumstances.

Again I stress to you and to the government, if you look at the makeup of any board of directors of any major corporation, you'll find that their boards are composed of the principal stakeholders of that company. Even in a lot of large companies today there are union people on the board of directors, and we think it's a mistake in a publicly operated insurance scheme that there not be representation spelled out in the act with respect to the client groups and the major constituency groups.

Mr Maves: Following on the comments of Mr Carroll, the one group that did make that presentation said the representatives should be from the business or worker communities if there were going to be those two communities, not representatives of, and they said that it is a subtle but significant difference, and I concur with that because the two members who are representative of employers may handcuff those employers when making decisions on the board that they are representative of employers and therefore their opinions and the way they vote would have to be representative of employers. So for similar reasons to Mr Carroll, I would vote against this amendment.

Mr Hoy: I have some experience at having sat on a board, appointed by a minister of the Ontario government and all the stakeholders came from agriculture, all 10 of them. There was no mix of participants on the board and it happened to work well.

My point would be, what would be the harm where we have representation from employers and workers who, if they did get into this so-called gridlock that happened in the past, would be buffered by the other five seats on the board. Certainly I think the very nature of this board requires that employers and employees be part of that board.

The minister at the time who looked over the board that I was appointed to took an undertaking with the boards verbally—it was only verbally—that no past presidents of some such association were immediately appointed to the board, so we got a little bit away from that, politicizing it or making it from the employer group rather than of the employer group. In the other case it would be agriculture that you would plug in, but certainly I think you have to have the people who are most affected represented on the board in a fair and equitable way and then of course the offset is that we're proposing that there be five other people along with suggestions from your bill.

Ms Martel: I'm pleased to join in this debate on this particular section. It would be no surprise to anyone that I don't support the Liberal model of a multi-stakeholder group and I certainly don't support the changes that the government is making with respect to this section and moving from the bipartite model which we brought into place under Bill 165 to the changes that we see now under Bill 15. I want to make a couple of comments about that.

I found frankly that the minister's characterization of the bipartite model and the bipartite group was most unfair; in fact, I found it to be grossly unfair. She was very clear in her comments in the House to say, and I'll just quote again, "Unfortunately, the bipartite, labour-versus-management approach has paralysed constructive decision-making on very crucial administrative, policy and financial issues facing the board."

Part of the reason I spent some time with the delegations that were before us asking them for very specific examples about how and when the board had been paralysed was because I didn't believe the minister and I certainly don't believe her now given what I have heard from the deputations that have come before us. All of the employer community, to their credit, to be fair, used the same words in terms of characterizing the bipartite model.

Yet when we had two representatives from the worker community here before the committee, Ms MacKay from UFCW and Mr Martin from United Steelworkers of America, both of those individuals made it clear that their experience at the board had not been like that at all. Let me also add that we had Mr Dennis Schweitzer here as well from UTU who had been on the board in the lead-up to the more formal organization that was done by order in council in April. None of those worker reps who sat as members, who were involved in decision-making, could clearly give us any example where the board had been either paralysed or anything else as the minister wanted to characterize it.

It is true that when you have two groups who represent the workplace parties, as labour and management do, that you will have to have give and take, that they won't always agree 100% on every issue. But the fact of the matter is, at the time that the board was fired by this minister, a couple of things were happening. Number one, for the first time the board had an operating surplus. Number two, for the first time in 10 years we actually had a down payment on the unfunded liability. Number three, you also had at the board an agreement certainly by the worker reps that they agreed to the financial package that had been put in place by Mr Copeland, who is still there, that would have seen the unfunded liability be reduced by the year 2014, which is the same year that it will be reduced under this bill by this government. So you had some very progressive measures that had taken place, despite the fact that the group represented on the one hand, business and, on the other, labour.

I frankly have found it very offensive to be reading time and time again in employer briefs that the people who have to be selected to serve on the board somehow have to be qualified experts, have lots of expertise etc, to somehow suggest that the people who were there before, appointed either by labour or by business, weren't.

I think that those 10 members whose names were put forward by their two constituencies, labour and business, were qualified, capable, competent people who took their responsibilities seriously, who were very much aware that they were in charge of a massive corporation that provides benefits to workers in this province and assesses employers for payment of the same and who were undertaking that work in a very serious way.

For the life of me, I cannot understand why the minister would summarily dismiss them in the way she did and I can't understand why the employer community would come and, by inference and suggestion in their briefs, make it appear as if the people who were there were not qualified. I am sure that the business reps who were on that board would have been quite unhappy by how some of them came to be characterized in the briefs of some of their colleagues from business.

I clearly support the bipartite model. Obviously our government was in place and I was a member of the cabinet that put that in place. I think it's ridiculous that we would move back to a multistakeholder board model, the same kind of model that got us into the unfunded liability mess that we are in today, because in the same year that that group was in place under the last Tory government, the unfunded liability jumped over $3 billion in a single year, the worst jump in the history of the board to date. I think that we should go back and put back in place the same bipartite model that was in place, that was working up until the time that the minister fired these folks.

So I will say clearly to people who are here, I asked very specifically time and again for all of the groups to give me examples and they couldn't, and that's because there aren't examples of how this group was paralysed. At the end of the day the only reason we had this bill before us is frankly window-dressing for the minister who broke the law by firing these folks because the law that was in place said that the administration at the board had to be bipartite and we find ourselves in a position of dealing with Bill 15 today which does nothing but justify the minister's unlawful action.

I think it's shameful that that's the position we find ourselves in today, and I certainly think it was shameful that those people were dismissed in the way they were and now suffer under some of the accusations that they have repeatedly from the employer community that somehow, somewhere, they weren't doing their job and they weren't qualified to be there in the first place.

Mr Duncan: I just want to appeal to the government members of the committee, if I can. I know that in your mind you hope this never happens, but let's envision a situation where there's a government that is not disposed to even listen to the views of the business community. Your government, having set this clause into the Workers' Compensation Act, has now created a potential animal that may not even have representation from the employer community. It leaves the government, leaves the Lieutenant Governor in Council, tremendous discretion with respect to the composition of the board.

While your party is in office and your government's in office, your friends in the employer community are trumpeting this, and it's all been very well orchestrated, but I urge caution to those delegations and I urge caution to you that you're setting up a board structure that could some day backfire on you, and I think that would be most unfortunate. As a matter of public policy the wording in this section of the bill creates, in my view, a section that thoughtful members, regardless of political stripe, ought to look at very carefully.

We are as a committee, as I understand it, supposed to make comments on these things, and I would suggest to you again that looking at it from the employers' perspective, while it may give some very short-term consolation vis-à-vis their views or their perception of what has happened in the past, you're creating a statute that is going to be very unwieldy in the future and could leave them exposed to a situation or a government that's not as disposed to listen to their points of view as the current government is.

I urge my friends opposite to use caution. We suggest very strongly that while we support the multi-stakeholder model, there ought to be more specificity with respect to the composition. If you don't accept this resolution, I would urge you to urge your minister to look at that whole issue, because what you're setting up here in the hands of another government or in the hands of someone else with a different agenda could be very detrimental to the business community.

The Chair: I'm going to alert everyone again that we have a two-hour time frame and we're on our first amendment. I would remind everyone that initiative was given three-party support. Please make your comments with that in mind.

Mr John O'Toole (Durham East): I unfortunately will not be supporting the proposed amendment to subsection 6(2). First of all, in terms of Mr Duncan's comment with regard to the composition of public boards, their motive is profit and they need to reflect the marketplace they're in, and I think they take those appointments as an important representation of their constituent group, whereas this board has a public mandate in the interest of injured workers. I think that's really what this government's trying to say.

As to the second part by Ms Martel, I tend to override any of her statements with the statements made by most of the businesses in this province, who are saying we have the highest premiums and the highest benefits and that needs to be addressed. Furthermore, the Provincial Auditor's report indicated there was need for reforms, and I think Bill 15 is addressing that need for reform, so I will not be supporting these recommendations.

Mr Baird: I'll speak very briefly because I don't want to belabour the point, but I wanted to respond to the member for Sudbury East's comments about the minister.

With great respect, you can't have it both ways. You just complained about 20 minutes ago that the previous board did nothing to go after employer fraud. This was the bipartite board that you put in place; you were in government for the last five years. If nothing happened, as a member of the cabinet you would have to take some responsibility for it.

To characterize the release of all members of the board, from both business and labour background, as somehow solely against labour is to read something that simply did not take place into the minister's comments, and I think it's an unfair characterization.

As to employer fraud, you complained that nothing was done to address employer fraud while half the board were representatives of employers. I suppose the point you've raised could be one we could all consider. We had one member of the former board who came before this committee and said that an unfunded liability of $11.4 billion was not a problem.

Mr Maves: On operating surplus, I believe that $400 million transferred over into the operations side from the investment fund could account for quite a bit of that.

Second, with regard to whether there was gridlock, quite a debate raged here on the financial improvement package and whose fault it was, the employer side of the board or employee side of the board, that that package got held up. I think it was Mr Mahoney who was pretty adamant about saying it was the employer side. To me, it didn't matter whose fault it was, one way or the other. What it represented was gridlock and that's why that bipartite board didn't work.

Ms Martel: I'd like to remind the parliamentary assistant that the bipartite board that was put in place under this government went into effect on August 6, 1995. That group was in place less than six months before the minister fired them, but in that six-month period they managed to have an operating surplus at the board for the first time. They managed to get the unfunded liability down even by $100 million, and they also managed, at least on the worker side, to agree to a financial package that would have wiped out the unfunded liability by the year 2014.

The mess that has been created at the board for some long time now is not going to be fixed in six months, but I certainly think that, to their credit, that group of folks came a long way in that short period to get things under control, to get the unfunded liability going in the opposite direction for a change, to get a surplus for the first time in 10 years, and to get some agreement to move forward on a package that would do what this government is now trying to do with this legislation.

Second, with respect to Mr Martin's comments about FIP or with respect to the unfunded liability, no, he said it wasn't a crisis. This government has been trying to use this bill to make it out to be a crisis, and it isn't a crisis.

Time after time, the deputations who came before us made it clear that the board itself has over $6 billion in assets; that they have never had and do not now borrow money; that the unfunded liability is representative of payments that would be due if injured workers had to receive those payments all at once, which is not the case in the province of Ontario—they are not all going to ask for their payments tomorrow; that in fact the bipartite board recognized they had to deal with the unfunded liability and were doing just that at the time they were let go.

I want to repeat that I think the employer representation of some of the folks on that board was unfair, both of the worker reps and of the business reps. I was very surprised that they would have said some of the things they did about their colleagues. But I repeat that I think the minister's characterization was very unfair, because clearly what we had before this committee in deputation after deputation was not one employer group that could give us one single concrete example of deadlock and two worker representatives who gave us clearly a different story.

The Chair: If there are no further comments, I'll put the question now. Shall the motion as read by Mr Duncan to amend subsection 6(2) carry?

All those in favour? Contrary? The motion fails.

The next amendment is proposed by the third party.

Ms Martel: I move that section 56 of the Workers' Compensation Act, as amended by subsection 6(2) of the bill, be further amended by adding the following subsection:

"Same

"(1.2) At least one half of the members appointed under clause (1.1)(c) must be representative of workers."

Mr Chair, I think that in my comments to date on the bipartite board I have made my point.

The Chair: There are no new comments arising out of what's substantially the same topic?

Mr O'Toole: If I may, I need a clarification as I'm a sub on this committee. I'm just wondering if perhaps one of the staff people could define—I mean this sincerely—what they mean by a "worker." Is that someone who is a member of a union? How do you define that?

The Chair: It might be more appropriate to ask the person making the motion.

Ms Martel: I think I should answer, because I don't expect the staff to respond to my amendment. We are assuming that under this we would be looking both at organized labour and the injured workers' groups in the province to be able to have half the representation on the board.

Mr Baird: I have a question. That would only cover the 30% or 35% of workers in Ontario who are unionized, so the 65% or 70% of workers who are not unionized would not get any representation?

Ms Martel: You see, the difference between your view of the world and mine is that I believe that unionized workers and the gains they make in terms of health and safety, employment, wages, salaries etc benefit all unorganized workers.

The Chair: No further comments? I'll put the question on the amendment as proposed by Ms Martel.

All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The motion fails.

There is another amendment pertaining to this section, also from the third party.

Ms Martel: I move that subsection 56(2) of the Workers' Compensation Act, as set out in subsection 6(2) of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"President

"(2) The Lieutenant Governor in Council shall appoint the president on the recommendation of the chair and the members described in clause (1.1)(c)."

If I might just explain this, under Bill 15, the bill before us, it is the Lieutenant Governor or indeed the government, at the end of the day, who chooses the president. The Lieutenant Governor has only to consult with the chair and the members on the board of directors about who will be chosen as the president. Our amendment would have the Lieutenant Governor appoint that person who is chosen as president by the chair and the members of the board.

Mr Duncan: The ability of the Lieutenant Governor in Council to appoint the president is a fundamentally important prerogative of the government. I'd like to remind the members that our government appointed one Robert Elgie in a very non-partisan fashion. Dr Elgie performed admirably for many years. I know the minister was going to announce her appointment last week or was getting it ready, and I hope the appointment of the new president, when it comes about, and I expect it to be fairly soon, will be somebody of a very high calibre. The minister has indicated to me that she's looking for somebody and indicated that they may in fact have somebody.

Again, our experience in government was that we appointed a very respected individual and we were glad to have had that opportunity and to have had Dr Elgie's service in a very non-partisan fashion over the course of some six years that he served as chair of the board. I think and we believe that the government, the Lieutenant Governor in Council, needs this power, as they've always had, to appoint a president of the board.

Mr Carroll: I'm a little confused; I don't understand all the legalese. Do both of these not say that the Lieutenant Governor in Council will appoint—do they not say the same thing?

Ms Martel: The government bill, as it currently stands, has the Lieutenant Governor choosing the chair of the Workers' Compensation Board. The amendment I am proposing has the board of directors itself choosing the chair, as was the case under the bipartite model. Under the bipartite model, after the five directors from labour and the five directors from business were appointed, it was up to them to choose the president.

Mr Carroll: You're talking about the president.

Ms Martel: Yes, I'm making the distinction between the president and the chair. The chair will be a Lieutenant Governor appointment as well, under your model; both positions would be under the bill that's currently before us. The change I am suggesting is that it would not be the LG who would choose the president.

Mr Carroll: How can we do this for the first president when we don't have a chair and members of a board? How can the Lieutenant Governor in Council consult with the chair and the members we don't yet have before appointing a president?

Mr Toker: If you look to subsection (2.1) below, it says that subsection (2) does not apply with respect to the first president.

The Chair: If there are no further comments, I'll put the question.

All those in favour of the amendment as proposed by Ms Martel? Contrary? That motion fails.

One more amendment, Ms Martel, on that section.

Ms Martel: I move that subsections 56(5) to (10) of the Workers' Compensation Act, as set out in subsection 6(3) of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Transition

"(6) The termination by the Lieutenant Governor in Council on November 1, 1995 of the appointment of each member of the board of directors then in office shall be deemed not to have occurred if a court makes a final determination that the termination was not authorized by law.

"Same

"(7) If the termination of the appointment of each member of the board of directors is deemed not to have occurred, the following amendments to the act shall be made:

"1. Subsections 56(1) to (2.2), as re-enacted by subsection 6(1) or (2) of the Workers' Compensation and Occupational Health and Safety Amendment Act, 1995, are repealed.

"2. Subsections 56(1) and (2), as they read immediately before they were re-enacted by those provisions, are re-enacted and in force.

"3. Section 59, as it read immediately before its repeal by section 8 of that act, is re-enacted and in force.

"4. Subsection 60(1) and (2) are repealed and re-enacted as they read immediately before their amendment by section 9 of that act and they are in force.

"5. Subsection 65(2) is repealed and re-enacted as it read immediately before its amendment by section 10 of that act and it is in force.

"Commencement

"(8) The amendments described in paragraphs 1 and 2 of subsection (7) shall be deemed to have been made on November 1, 1995. The amendments described in paragraphs 3 to 5 shall be deemed to have been made on the day on which the Workers' Compensation and Occupational Health and Safety Amendment Act, 1995 received royal assent."

If I might explain this section, members will know that as the bill currently stands before us, it makes it very clear that the termination of each of the members who were fired by the minister, in contravention of the act that was in place, cannot be overturned in law, and it says very clearly under sections 6 and 7 that no proceeding, in terms of trying to have the members themselves take some proceeding in court to get themselves reinstated, shall be acknowledged. In fact, the whole purpose of this bill is to make sure that is not permitted to happen.

What we are saying in our amendments is that we disagree with the fact that the minister broke the law that was already in place and is now using Bill 15 to justify the breaking of the law, and that members who were board members at the time that they were fired should have the opportunity to challenge summarily being fired in a court of law, if that court of law agreed and a judge made it very clear that the law had been broken by the minister, that those folks actually should have their positions back and the bipartite model, which was in place, should be reconstituted and reinstated.

All the sections that then follow speak very clearly to policies and procedures that are going into effect now, as we speak, even though a new board has not been put in place and the law hasn't been changed to cover the breaking of the former act—also would be termed null and void if a court proceeding determined that the minister was wrong and the government was wrong and the folks had to be reinstated.

We feel very strongly that the minister should never have fired those folks in contravention of the act that was the law of the province in the manner that she did, and those folks should at least have an opportunity to challenge that in court. If they win in court, then the bipartite model should come back into effect and that's what we're proposing in these sections.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Martel. Any comments? Seeing none, I put the question on the amendment as moved by Ms Martel to subsection 6(3).

All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The motion fails.

Seeing no amendments proposed to sections 7 through 11—I beg your pardon, forgive me. If there are no further comments on section 6 as an entity, and seeing none, it's kind of relevant we pass that section, given the debate we've had.

All those in favour of section 6? Carried unamended, as commented on? Contrary? The motion carries.

Seeing no proposed amendments for sections 7 through 11, are there any comments, questions or amendments to those sections? Seeing none, I will put the question.

Shall sections 7 through 11 carry? All in favour? Contrary? Those sections carry.

The next amendment we have receipt of is from the third party as well.

Ms Martel: I move that section 12 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Repeal

"(4) This section is repealed one year after the date on which the Workers' Compensation and Occupational Health and Safety Amendment Act, 1995 receives royal assent."

As it stands in the legislation that is before us now, the Minister of Labour is now given the authority to issue policy directives and objectives to the board of directors at the Workers' Compensation Board for an indefinite period of time.

Under Bill 165, which we passed, we gave that discretionary power to the minister for up to a year and then said that very clearly, after the point in time, after a year had passed, when the new board was in place and up and running, the Minister of Labour should no longer have that discretionary power to issue policy statements. What we are seeing with this amendment is that we don't believe that any Minister of Labour, and we included our own when we moved this Bill 165, should have the unilateral right to do that for an indefinite period.

Any new government obviously will want to put its stamp on any of its agencies, boards and commission, and that will happen, and that is probably an appropriate thing to do in a democratic institution like the one we operate under. However, we don't believe, and I clearly don't feel now, as I represent the party, that any minister, regardless of political party, should continue to be able to exercise that authority for an indefinite period of time.

If you're going to put a board of directors in place that you trust and that you hope will carry out its responsibilities in the best and most effective way, understanding the responsibility it has have to the corporation, after a certain point in time it shouldn't have to take direction from a Minister of Labour with respect to a number of outstanding issues. They will deal with those issues in a manner which is best both for injured workers and for employers who share the system.

I would like to see that discretionary power, which appears to be unlimited at this point in time in Bill 15, actually restricted and we revert back to what we had in Bill 165, which would have limited it to a year.

Mr Duncan: I just want to go on record that I don't support the NDP amendment, and to members of the government, I'll refer you to section 65.1 of the Workers' Compensation Act, which reads: "65.1 (1) The minister may issue policy directions that have been approved by the Lieutenant Governor in Council on matters relating to the board's exercise of its powers and performance of its duties under this act."

Frankly, as an opposition party, I relish the fact that the clause be left in the Workers' Compensation Act, because the whole notion of schedule 2 agencies, which the board is, saw them being at arm's length from the government. As long as this clause is in the bill we will be able to say to your minister directly, on any matter: "Minister, you have the authority to act on it. It is not appropriate to say this is a matter for the Workers' Compensation Board." As an opposition party we rather relish that, and I should say, as I said to the parliamentary assistant and as I said to the minister, I suspect you will rue the day that you left this particular clause in the bill.

It is, in our view, contrary to the nature of what were formerly known as schedule 2 agencies. I don't know if they still are, but we suspect that you will rue the day that this clause was left in the bill and we advised the minister that we thought that it's not necessarily in your best interests. However, if you want it there, it's there.

What it does is it says you folks have the power to override the board, and so any time there's a problem at the board—and there will be problems, no matter how well qualified the people you put on the board are—it's going to be with the government, and if the government fails to take action, the government will be accountable for it.

We don't feel this strongly about this section, and as an opposition party I can tell you we're quite glad to have it there. It allows us to question the minister directly about the affairs of the board.

Mr Baird: Our friend from Windsor is looking forward to holding this government accountable, which I think is quite admirable. I think it's the government's intention that this power would be seldom used, but there would be a necessary element of our ability to be accountable to the people of Ontario, whom of course this board works for. That would allow the government the ability to act on those seldom and rare cases.

I guess that's a fundamental distinction between our party and yours. We seek the accountability. We want to clean up the WCB and don't want to scapegoat with an answer in question period. I think the intention is there to get a greater degree of accountability to be used on what is likely a rare occasion.

The Chair: Thank you. If there is no further comment, we'll put the question.

All those in favour of Ms Martel's amendment to section 12? Contrary? I declare that amendment failed.

Is it the favour of the committee that section 12 carry? Contrary? Section 12 carries.

Moving on to section 13, I see there is an amendment. 1710

Mr Duncan: I move that subsections 65.2(1) to (2.2) of the Workers' Compensation Act, as set out in section 13 of the bill, be amended by striking out "the minister" wherever it occurs and substituting, in each case, "the Legislative Assembly."

Do you want me to speak to that?

The Chair: Please.

Mr Duncan: We believe that the memorandum of understanding ought not to be just with the minister but with the Legislative Assembly of the province of Ontario. Again, I counsel my friends opposite that, remember, you're writing a statute; you're passing a bill that will affect the function of the board and its relationship not only to the government but to the Legislature beyond this mandate, and our fear, again, is that by vesting most of the powers that are outlined in the memorandum of understanding with the minister, you are overlooking the Legislature and the legitimate role the Legislature may have to play in a body like the Workers' Compensation Board.

Let's take the notion of the minister deciding where the value-for-money audit is going to be conducted every year. Let's just for a minute say that you've got a government that's in power that isn't sensitive to the perspective of the business community and there's a concern around the way fraud is being pursued. That's where you want the value-for-money audit but the minister really doesn't want to deal with that, so the minister appoints the value-for-money auditor to look at the purchasing department of the Workers' Compensation Board.

In effect, by adopting this type of wording around the memorandum of understanding, it's the view of the official opposition that again you are vesting too much power with the minister of the day and not enough with the Legislature. We think the Legislature and the members of the Legislature who get the calls in their constituency offices from the business community and from the injured worker community ought to be the ones the board is accountable to.

It can be argued, and I'm sure the government will, that indirectly, through the minister, the board is accountable to the Legislature. I would suggest to you as long as you have a government that's friendly to your perspective, this clause works well; when you don't, and that's the vast majority of people—the vast majority of people are concerned with who the government is or they're concerned with the proper functioning of the board and its relationship to the broader public interest—I would suggest to you that the terminology in this section around the memorandum of understanding is fraught with danger.

Mr Baird: With respect, the Minister of Labour is accountable for the Workers' Compensation Board to the Ontario Legislature. I think that is most appropriate and members of the Legislature can hold him or her accountable for the ongoing activities at the board.

For example, the memorandum of understanding is between an agency and the minister, not the agency and the Legislative Assembly, and that's important to remember with respect to memorandums of understanding. So it would be, I think, completely inappropriate with the memorandum of understanding between the agency and the Legislature when it's not; it's with the minister. So both, I suppose, with accountability in the previous amendment and responsibility, there's a balance there.

Mr Carroll: I'd like to thank Mr Duncan for his concern about the wellbeing of the members of our party in the future. It's very honourable of him to be so concerned about us. I'd like to ask him at the same time if he thinks that this taking away of power from ministers should apply to all ministries or just this particular minister. It seems a rather strange request he's making, and I would like to know whether or not he would intend that this would carry through all ministries, that we take away all their power and let the Legislative Assembly be responsible for all of the ministries.

Mr Duncan: May I respond? If you read section 13, it deals with a specific document, the memorandum of understanding. It is our suggestion that indeed this bill is all about accountability. You've talked about accountability. Why not be accountable to the elected representatives of the people? Why not, in as many instances?

I know that you want to simply do whatever you're told to do by your government, that you won't sit here and objectively look at the issues in the bill, even in a non-partisan fashion, where concerns are raised by virtually every interest group, again around the definitions that we talked about earlier. So yes, if you're intent on coming here and just do whatever they tell you to do, raise your hand and do it, then that's perhaps the way we should govern ourselves.

But with respect, you've talked about accountability. Why wouldn't you want it to be accountable to the elected people? Why not to the assembly? I'm dealing with this specific clause, and this bill is about accountability. Anybody who has been down at 400 University or anybody who has been up on Bloor or down at that new building knows full well that the minister's a shield. Frankly, from our perspective, that's great for the next four years, that's really good. You've set it up so that your minister and any future minister is completely, in your words, "accountable sometimes"—sometimes, I think you said. Maybe it wasn't "sometimes"; it was when you want them to be accountable.

Mr Baird: On rare occasions.

Mr Duncan: You want to be accountable on rare occasions. Here you talk about accountability. If you can lay aside and look at this in an objective fashion and look at what's in the public interest, and we can differ on that, but to suggest that our amendments aren't done in any way but to suggest that we agree with the need for accountability and have it at the Legislature—I mean, how many times has this committee studied WCB bills? How many times have there been special hearings? What we're saying is, let's make that a permanent feature of the way the workers' compensation system operates.

Our fear, from your perspective or from the perspective of members—and your party's been very good and done a terrific job at representing the interests of the business community. You campaigned on that, you were clear about it, you've made no bones about it. What we're suggesting to you, however, is that if there's another government in power that isn't as sensitive—and that has happened—to the business community—

Ms Martel: Name names, Dwight. Come on, name names.

Mr Duncan: The Liberals, of course. You know, us wild-eyed left-wingers. But you're setting up legislation and public policy that, in our view, is flawed and that, I would think and I would argue, the business community ought to be concerned about.

Mr O'Toole: Listening to Mr Duncan, in the previous issue under section 12 we were looking at the questioning of the power of the minister and he was endorsing that. I would remind him that what we're saying here is that the minister, after all, is accountable. It's a specific focus point for responsibility to direct policies and to redirect the actions of the board.

That's really what this government is about. It's making sure that there isn't some vague reference to the Legislative Assembly. Of course we're accountable, and any issues or concerns we have, we should address the minister with those issues and concerns. They are the single point of entry into the system, and that's why I won't be supporting this amendment. I think you should reconsider what you said initially on the previous amendment.

Mrs Fisher: I just would like to also register a comment, and that is that I think Mr Duncan said it best when he said, "Although it might be noted that, in essence, some would argue that they are accountable to the Legislature." They are. I think your point's well made, so why argue it? I think that in the end they are accountable to the Legislature as a minister, and this is one step up the line, to the final line, which is the Legislature in total.

Secondly, I would hope that all parties represent the business community, not just one.

Mr Duncan: We are being entirely consistent in our amendments in sections 12 and 13. We said, very tongue in cheek, that you are going to rue the day. You know, there's a history around the Workers' Compensation Board that has the board very, very separate from the Legislature, reporting through the minister, and—I forget your terminology—on rare occasions you want the minister to be accountable. You said on rare occasions you want the minister to be accountable. What we're suggesting to you is that vesting all of this power in the minister is, in the long term, a mistake.

Mr Jerry J. Ouellette (Oshawa): I just think that an elected body, a majority is elected by the people of the province in order to be accountable and that the reason we appoint ministers is to make those individuals accountable. At such time that the electorate of the province no longer believes that those representative groups are accountable to the people, they would elect another government. In that sense, I don't feel that I can support this motion.

Mr Baird: I would wholeheartedly agree with my colleague the member for Oshawa that the Minister of Labour is accountable every day for the activities of the Workers' Compensation Board and correct the record.

The Chair: If there are no further comments, the question is put by Mr Duncan, that section 13 be amended. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment fails.

Seeing no amendments proposed for sections 14 or 15, I would ask if there are any questions, comments or amendments to those two sections. Seeing none, all those in favour of sections—

Interjection.

The Chair: I beg your pardon; I did it again. Forgive me, folks. Is it the favour of the committee that section 13 shall carry? Contrary? Section 13 carries.

The clerk is earning his pay here today, for sure.

Back to the original question, are there any comments or questions for sections 14 or 15? Seeing none, all in favour of sections 14 and 15 carrying? Those contrary? Sections 14 and 15 carry.

Mr Duncan, would you care to speak to your next motion?

Mr Duncan: I move that subsection 77(3) of the Workers' Compensation Act, as set out in section 16 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Same

"(3) The Legislative Assembly may determine, by resolution, which program is to be reviewed."

The Chair: Any comments to this amendment?

Mr Duncan: Briefly, because I referred to this earlier, but I would again suggest to you that it is in the interest of accountability that the Legislature, or a committee of the Legislature, be the body that determines what part of the board be reviewed. Again, I give you my example. I know this would never occur with your government, but let us say that there is a future circumstance where there is an item that really is bugging the Legislature or members of the opposition, or even indeed backbench members of the government, because I know in your deepest, darkest thoughts you have to question and be concerned about the policies your government is introducing. But let's say that there is an issue of burning interest out there and that the minister quite deliberately doesn't want to have a value-for-money audit done. Let's say you have a situation where you have an entrenched government that just likes the status quo and doesn't want change, doesn't want to make things work better and its interest is in defending what's there already.

I would suggest it would be in the broader public interest if the Legislature had the power to appoint these value-for-money audits, and not simply the minister. I would remind you again that in the future there will be circumstances where it won't necessarily be in the minister's interest, particularly given the fact that you've now given the minister the power to direct the affairs of the corporation. You've given the minister the explicit authority to go in and do something. So let's say that over the course of time the minister doesn't do something and a problem arises. Then it will be in the minister's best interests not to have it audited. So I would suggest to you it's in the broader public interest to have the Legislature determine where those value-for-money audits will happen and not the minister.

The Chair: Any comments? Seeing no comments, we'll put the question. All those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The amendment fails.

Ms Martel: I move that subsection 77(3) of the Workers' Compensation Act, as set out in section 16 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Same

"(3) Subject to subsection (3.1), the minister may determine which program is to be reviewed.

"Same

"(3.1) An experience and merit rating program established under subsection 103.1 must be reviewed for any year in which the refunds made under the program are greater than the surcharges made under it."

I want to explain this one to people. We know already, when the section passes, that in fact at least once a year the minister will determine what kind of program is to be reviewed. What we are suggesting is, because we heard this at many points in time from the worker community in particular, there is a concern from the worker community that in fact under the experience rating system as it now stands there is much more money that goes out to employers in the form of rebates than the amount of money that comes in as penalties. But we also know that there are a number of penalties assigned to employers which are not paid. Again, in some of the briefs that we heard that point was very clear.

If I might, in 1993 the board paid out $216 million more in rebates than in fines collected, and in 1994 $280 million more in rebates back to employers than in fines that should have come in. What we are saying is that, over and above the single program or any program that the minister chooses to review, in a year where the rebates that are given out to employers exceed the amount of money that comes into the board in the form of penalties a review of that experience rating program also occur that same year.

The reason we're moving that is because we do want to get at the unfunded liability, like everyone else does, and part of the problem around the unfunded liability has been the inability of the board up to this point to be really aggressive in going after employers who, for whatever reason, do not pay the board what is owing. Under this particular section, we're saying that in a year where the rebates are more than the penalties that come in a review of that also take place to determine why that is so and what other action the board should be taking to deal with that.

Mr O'Toole: Just in response, I won't be supporting this, and the reason is I think the new legislation addresses, with penalties, those people who are not contributing to the system or are perhaps fraudulently reporting incidents within their workplace. So I think the new legislation adequately addresses, and in fact the whole experience rating system will become a much more important part of, the value-for-money audits. If that could indeed be a focus of the minister, I wouldn't perhaps omit that opportunity for her or whoever the minister is to do that, but I think the current wording adequately addresses both the workers and the employers who may be abusing the system.

In fact, right now the evidence is that technically the premiums and those benefits to defraud the system are driving the whole system underground. What I've seen in the workplace, where I have worked and been involved in WCB, is every opportunity perhaps is in the employer's best interests to kind of make the information less obvious, to look as if they're improving.

Ms Martel: But that is a part of my concern. The workers' group would have come forward and said that what the experience rating system does is just that, as employers then try and hide or paper over injuries that occur in the workplace. They do that either by having workers come in and sit around at work and have them try and claim disability benefits that the company might have agreed to with a carrier, or in fact have the employer claim it as a no-lost-time claim and, even though they are actually off, not have them off at home but sitting somewhere in the workplace, not doing any work either, because they're not fit to.

What the workers' groups were trying to say clearly to this group is that the down side of the experience rating system as it currently stands in place is that it does for some employers, not all, encourage them to hide accidents so that the assessments that they have to pay are reduced. What I'm trying to say is I think that there's probably a point to that and it probably does happen from time to time with some employers. The way we might get at that very issue is by also encouraging and ensuring in fact that the board, in those years where the rebates that are paid out are higher than what comes in, is forced to look at those employers, is forced to get at that issue again.

I don't see anything in the bill that is currently before us which specifically would deal with the experience rating system and getting at whatever kinds of problems or abuse, if you want to use that word, might be in that current system.

Mr O'Toole: It's my understanding that is addressed in the current legislation, and in terms of material change, the responsibility is on both parties, if there is a change, to be forthright about it. In that respect, failing to do that, there are penalties, whereas before that was not the downside risk. I think there are improvements in the legislation, so I won't be supporting this amendment.

Ms Martel: I don't think the issue has anything to do with material change. Right now, with or without any changes, there are employers who will use the experience rating system to hide the fact that workers get hurt. I'm not talking about a material change and employers shifting from schedule 1 to schedule 2 or shifting from a manufacturing trade to something else; I'm talking about those employers who get a benefit back, a rebate back from the experience rating system because they are not providing the board with proof that people have been hurt on their premises. They're bringing those people into the workplace and having them sit there all day and not claim compensation benefits so that at the end of the day they can have a reduced premium that they pay to the board.

The single way I think you can get at that is by having a particular focus, in the year where there is a surplus in rebates, on the experience rating system to see what those employers were doing and to understand why it is that we have such an excess.

In 1994, the $280 million represented more than the board paid out that whole year to workers who were temporarily totally disabled. So if we could get some of that money back into the pot every year on an ongoing basis, that would go some small way too, I think, to dealing with the unfunded liability problem.

Mr Duncan: Just a point before we vote. Subsection "(3) Subject to subsection (3.1), the minister may determine...." This is the same clause that's already in the bill. Because this is contrary to what we just voted on, I wonder if we can separate out the two clauses. One clause is already present in the bill, correct?

The Chair: Except it's amended by the words "3.1." So it is a substantive change.

Mr Duncan: Okay. It's just that I would prefer to be voting—I guess you have to vote for them.

Ms Martel: Just vote against mine and then move the one piece yourself.

The Chair: Are there any other comments? Seeing no further comment, the question's been put by Ms Martel.

All those in favour of the amendment that's been proposed? Contrary? The amendment fails.

Now section 16 itself. Is it the favour of the committee that section 16 carry? All those in favour? Contrary? The section carries.

Seeing no amendments proposed for sections 17 through 27, I would invite any comments, questions or amendments.

Mr Duncan: Sections 17 through 24 deal with a number of issues related to information requirements. When I addressed the Legislature, again I stressed to my friends opposite that the government has stated its commitment, its desire, if you will, to make Ontario a more investor-friendly place vis-à-vis cutting red tape, whatever that means.

We had the Corporations Act before the Legislature today that the government brought forward, campaigned on, in the interests of making Ontario a better place to invest. I know that members of the government, as members of our party, have heard from businesses everywhere that the amount of red tape, the amount of bureaucracy they must deal with in government, is stifling and costly, and that in order for them to function well they must have a reduction in the red tape. I spoke to Frank McKenna at some length about this issue, and he told me whenever they modelled Ontario against New Brunswick, New Brunswick won every time.

My fear with these sections—and we were originally going to propose amendments to repeal them or to remove the sections but we were advised that they may be out of order—is that I envision our friends down at the board getting these clauses of the Workers' Compensation Act and translating them into a policy, and a policy means more paperwork. I really have some fear around this and about the type of paperwork it could create for employers. Those of you who have operated businesses and who have represented businesses know that every time the Workers' Compensation Act is amended and add something, the officials, the public servants at the Workers' Compensation Board go to it in terms of creating paperwork.

So we flag our concern. We will vote against these sections, as I said in debate, because we think they run contrary to what your government is trying to do vis-à-vis red tape and paperwork everywhere else. We really urge the government to be cautious and to think about what you gain—a cost-benefit analysis, what do you gain versus what it costs in terms of red tape to businesses. It is our humble suggestion that what you gain by doing this doesn't outweigh the cost to business and the amount of red tape and paperwork you're creating.

Mr Baird: I will just speak very briefly to those comments. The Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations, through its Clearing the Path initiative, I hope will expedite and speed up the process for business registration. One of the key components of that, of course, would be to register for WCB, which I think is an important initiative which has been significantly expanded under Minister Sterling from its introduction from Minister Churley.

Mrs Fisher: I would be the first to agree that one of the things we are trying to do as a government is to reduce that red tape and to eliminate the barriers. However, we also are responsible enough to realize that all employers should be somewhat engaged in workers' comp, and I think this is one way of ensuring that that responsibility is held fast by the employers. I don't think it creates anything new. Just because you have a policy development or a policy implementation doesn't necessarily mean new red tape or additional red tape.

I think that having sat through the numbers of days of hearings and listening to all sides of it, labour was very expressive about those who were avoiding that type of registration, and we fully support full registration by all employers. The sections that we're talking about right now certainly provide that that must happen.

Although I agree with Mr Duncan that this government doesn't stand for red tape—as a matter of fact, its elimination of red tape to small business—I fully endorse this because it then encourages and makes the responsibility to the employer to be sure they're registered.

Mr Duncan: Again, I just caution, I find it amazing, because I know the government's committed to eliminating red tape. Again, you've been very clear about it. What did you call that initiative you've got going?

Mr Baird: Clearing the Path.

Mr Duncan: Clearing the Path. Today we're throwing some scrub brush on the path, and tomorrow the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations is going to come and take the scrub brush off.

I would refer the members to the very clauses in the bill. You always go back to first source. They taught me that a long time ago. Section 17, amending subsection 108.1(2) of the bill: "When registering....the board may require, an employer in an industry included in schedule 1 shall provide such information to the board as it may require to assign the employer to a class, subclass or group."

Again, I just imagine all those folks down at the board who do this, who write forms for a living and try to get in the way of business in this province, sinking their teeth into this and trying to come to terms with it. I would humbly suggest to the government that you are really doing something that you've really strongly fought against, and you've done it quite well, as evidenced by the numbers in the assembly. I would say to you that you should consider this very carefully.

We can't support it because we agree that we ought to be clearing the path—is that what we're calling it these days?—not throwing scrub brush on it. I would be very nervous about sending this stuff down to the folks at the board who make a living out of creating paperwork for businesses. What you're doing is you're directly running in conflict with what your other ministries are doing.

The Chair: Are there any other comments on sections 17 through 27? Seeing none, I'll put the question—

Mr Duncan: That was 17 through 24, wasn't it?

The Chair: No, through 27. All those in favour that sections 17 through 27 shall carry? Contrary? Those sections carry. Which takes us to another motion. Ms Martel.

Ms Martel: I move that subsections 13(3) to (6) of the Occupational Health and Safety Act, as set out in section 28 of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"Transition

"(3) The termination by the Lieutenant Governor in Council of the appointment of each member of the board of directors as it existed on October 22, 1995, shall be deemed not to have occurred if a court makes a final determination that the termination was not authorized by law.

"Same

"(4) If the termination of the appointment of each member of the board of directors is deemed not to have occurred, the following amendments to the act shall be made:

"1. Subsection 13(2), as re-enacted by section 28 of the Workers' Compensation and Occupational Health and Safety Act, 1995, is repealed.

"2. Subsections 13(2) to (8), as they read immediately before they were repealed by that provision, are re-enacted and in force.

"3. Subsection 14(1), as re-enacted by section 29 of that act, is repealed and re-enacted as it read immediately before section 29 came into force, and it is in force.

"4. Subsection 16(8), as it read immediately before it was repealed by subsection 30(1) of that act, is re-enacted and in force.

"5. Subsection 16(9), as re-enacted by subsection 30(2) of that act, is repealed and re-enacted as it read immediately before subsection 30(2) came into force, and it is in force.

"6. Clause 65(1)(b), as re-enacted by section 32 of that act, is repealed and re-enacted as it read immediately before section 32 came into force, and it is in force.

"Commencement

"(5) The amendments described in paragraphs 1 to 3 and 5 and 6 of subsection (4) shall be deemed to have come into force on August 23, 1995. The amendment described in paragraph 4 comes into force on the day on which subsection 30(1) of the Workers' Compensation and Occupational Health and Safety Amendment Act, 1995, comes into force."

1740

The purpose of this section is to again draw attention to two things: One, that the minister, in contravention of a law that was in place at the time, also dismissed members of the health and safety agency in this province, who had been duly constituted, certainly under our government when we were there. She has, in this legislation, Bill 15, attempted to both justify that and protect herself by arguing that the law will not recognize any court proceeding, either done by any of those members who were in place at the time or anyone else who wants to challenge what was done, and that regardless of what the law says or what a court would find, all of those court rulings would be null and void.

Secondly, we are also putting this forward again because we believe, as we did with the bipartite model at the Workers' Compensation Board, that there should be a bipartite model at the health and safety agency, and that the training that was well under way—over 30,000 people in the province—when those people were dismissed, was in fact training that workers in this province would have benefited by and from.

We are very concerned with respect to the fact now that we are not sure what kind of other model might replace that particular model. We certainly know that under this particular section, the agency will be composed of one single member, the executive director, and that person will be appointed by the government through the Lieutenant Governor in Council, and we will not have an equal representation of workers and employers, as we did when the bipartite model was in place.

We believe as we do fundamentally with the Workers' Compensation Board that that is the best model to use to deliver health and safety in the province of Ontario, that it was working, that people were being trained, and it was one that we should return to.

The amendment clearly says that as a matter of course people should have the opportunity to challenge the breaking of the law by the minister in court, and that if they so win their challenge in court that in fact the bipartite model would be reinstated and all of the responsibilities in exercising the power that those folks had before they were dismissed would be returned to them.

Mr Baird: I think it's important to put on the record why the government revoked the order-in-council appointments of the board of directors of the Workplace Health and Safety Agency. There was a tremendous amount of problems going on at the board, and the fact that there were these problems is acknowledged by a court who ruled when the Ontario Federation of Labour challenged those actions in court. The court ruled that these problems were significant and the minister acted fully and legally within her responsibilities under the act. The court upheld the actions of the government in accordance with the act. I think it's very important to put that on the record. I won't repeat all the same arguments, because this is basically a mirror amendment to the board of directors of the WCB.

Mr Duncan: Of course, the real issue here is the Workplace Health and Safety Agency. You will no doubt know that we spoke against disbanding the agency, which did run contrary—

Mr Baird: Before the election?

Mr Duncan: No, not before the election. We changed our view, and I said so quite publicly. I shouldn't say that. I should say that the previous caucus had changed its view because it was in fact a Liberal government that created the Workplace Health and Safety Agency, as I recall.

There were two reasons why we did that, both of which came out three years subsequent to our Back to the Future document. The first was Dr Tuohy's report, which came out in February of this year, and in Dr Tuohy's report, there were some 28-odd recommendations that were made to the previous government that addressed some of the problems that were present at the board.

As members of the government are no doubt aware, there was a sunset clause in the Occupational Health and Safety Act with respect to the agency that would've kicked in in 1996. Now Dr Tuohy recommended that the one-year clause be extended to allow her recommendations to be dealt with in a substantive way by the board of the health and safety agency.

The second issue that caused us to rethink our position was the August 28 letter by the auditor who is from one of those big accounting firms on Bay Street—I think Bill Farlinger's partner, if I'm not mistaken—who said that this agency is being well run. He served on it. He said it's had some problems, but he says overall it's doing a good job.

So we looked at that and, like thoughtful people anywhere, we would take into account the evidence that was put in front of us and we would say, well, Tuohy, who by the way is very strongly linked to the management community, was saying, "Give it another chance."

Among her recommendations were the removal of the bipartite board and establishing a new board. Finally, as an employer, I can tell you that we used the services of the agency. We came into compliance on April 1, as we were supposed to. Frankly, when I first was made aware of everything we had to do and all that, like most employers, I kind of went aaargh, you know, costs, paper work, all of that. But we sent our employees and we sent our management people for the courses and by gosh they were good and they worked.

So taking all of that into consideration, we did change our position. We did. We recognize that there were significant problems at the board level. I saw a number of problems. There was the perception from the management side that they weren't being listened to by the minister on any decisions. I mean group after group after management group that I met with this summer told me that.

On the other hand, we saw what we thought were some beneficial results, number one. Number two, we saw Dr Tuohy's report and we saw the letter from the auditor, Bill Farlinger's partner, I believe, who signed it and—

Mr Baird: Which firm was that?

Mr Duncan: One of those big accounting firms that support you guys. You know, they all supported you.

In any event, what we said was, given all of this information, let's act on Tuohy's recommendations. Frankly, we'll support this amendment because we think the way you handled the whole thing was inappropriate. It wasn't based on evidence, it was based on ideology, and we reject that kind of thing and we'd ask the government to revisit it carefully as Arthur Gladstone is considering what to do with this agency.

The Chair: Any further comments? Seeing none, I put the question. As moved by Ms Martel, all those in favour of the amendment? Contrary? The motion fails.

Section 28 itself. Shall section 28 carry? All those in favour? Contrary? The section carries.

Seeing no amendments for sections 29 through 34, are there any comments, amendments or questions on those sections? Seeing none, is it the favour of the committee that sections 29 through 34 carry? All in favour? Contrary? Those sections carry.

Shall the long title of the bill carry?

Interjection: I'd like to put on the record that the Liberal member voted for 29 through 34.

Mr Duncan: Please record me in opposition to that.

The Chair: No, it was not a recorded vote.

The long title. Shall the long title of the bill carry? All those in favour? Contrary? That carries.

Shall Bill 15 carry? All those in favour? Contrary? That bill carries.

Shall Bill 15 be reported to the House? All in favour? Contrary? The bill shall be reported.

Thank you all for your input. I appreciate very much the decorum that typified our activities these last few days and weeks. Thank you all. The next meeting of this committee shall be at the call of the Chair. The meeting stands adjourned.

The committee adjourned at 17:49.

Consideration of Bill 20, An Act to promote economic growth and protect the environment by streamlining the land use planning and development system through amendments related to planning, development, municipal and heritage matters / Projet de loi 20, Loi visant à promouvoir la croissance économique et à protéger l'environnement en rationalisant le système d'aménagement et de mise en valeur du territoire au moyen de modifications touchant des questions relatives à l'aménagement, la mise en valeur, les municipalités et le patrimoine.

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): Good morning, everyone. The hearing of the standing committee on resources development into Bill 20 will now commence the first of our three weeks. For the edification of those speaking to us here in Toronto, the hearing times have been determined based on the number of people who inquired prior to the deadline of February 5 and made representations to speak to the committee. Accordingly, to accommodate everyone here in Toronto, the speaking time will be 25 minutes.

First off this morning, though, there will be a requirement to adopt the subcommittee report. You've all had an opportunity to read it this morning, if you didn't get a copy on Friday. Do we have a motion to adopt the subcommittee report? Barb Fisher.

All in favour? Carried.

MINISTER OF MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS AND HOUSING

The Chair: The second order of business: It's our pleasure to welcome Minister Al Leach, who will make up to 30 minutes' worth of comments, to be followed by responses from each of the two parties. Good morning, Minister.

Hon Al Leach (Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing): Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. I'm very pleased to open this committee's public hearings on Bill 20, the Land Use Planning and Protection Act. I'm also pleased to hear that everyone who's asked to appear before you has been scheduled and nobody's been turned away.

I'd like to take a few minutes to set the stage for your discussions over the next couple of weeks. I'd like to begin with a general picture—the purpose of the bill, the philosophy behind it—and then I'll touch briefly on the three main components of the bill: the part that deals with the planning process, the part that deals with apartments in houses, and the part that deals with development charges.

First, the big picture: This bill was introduced to honour a commitment made in the Common Sense Revolution, a commitment to remove barriers to economic growth that have killed jobs and kept Ontario back. Before June 8, municipalities, developers and other interested parties told us the planning system wasn't working, that it was stifling economic activity. They said getting through the approval process took too long and cost too much. They also said that it kept too much planning power at Queen's Park, away from local governments that best understand local conditions.

Bill 163, the former government's planning reform bill, was supposed to let municipalities make decisions, but municipalities told us it didn't. They said changes needed to be made.

The bill you are considering here, the Land Use Planning and Protection Act, fixes these problems. It does three important things:

First, it creates a system that's faster, cheaper and more understandable, a system that's guided by clear, concise policies, policies that deal with issues that really should be under the jurisdiction of the province.

Second, it lets municipalities make local planning decisions. They are the people who best understand local circumstances.

Third, it protects the environment while clearing away obstacles to growth.

Let me just touch on some of the highlights. First, this legislation means planning decisions will no longer have to "be consistent with" provincial policy statements. Instead, they will once again have to "have regard to" provincial policies.

Let me explain why we're doing this. When decisions have to be consistent with provincial policies, it leaves very little room for municipalities to interpret provincial policies and take into account local circumstances.

Does this mean we don't think provincial policies are important? Of course not. Years of experience show that planners and decision-makers, and that includes the Ontario Municipal Board, understand the "have regard to" provision. They do take provincial policies seriously. But at the same time, we think local decision-makers must have discretion and flexibility. Kenora is not the same as Cornwall, and downtown Toronto is not the same as Grey county. Local decision-makers need to be able to meet their own community needs.

Another provision gives counties more powers to approve subdivisions. That also improves local flexibility. Regional governments already have these powers. There's no reason for the province to duplicate work already being done at the county level, and frankly, we can no longer afford duplication of any sort.

As I said a moment ago, it takes far too long to get a decision under the present system. This legislation shortens time frames for processing applications; it cuts many time frames almost in half.

Let me just mention a couple of other legislative changes that will make the system more efficient.

One change will make the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing the only provincial ministry that can appeal a planning decision to the Ontario Municipal Board. The province will speak with one voice on planning matters. This will avoid the absurd situation of two or three ministries appearing at the OMB, all taking different positions and all being funded by the taxpayer.

Another will allow the province to exempt municipalities from the need to get approval of their official plans and amendments. We can also authorize upper-tier municipalities that have approval authority for local official plans and amendments to exempt those local decisions.

I see this simple process as a sign of our commitment to municipal accountability. We will soon release, for consultation, options for implementing this "exemption" provision.

There is one other legislative change to the planning process I'd like to mention. We are making a few changes designed to streamline the Ontario Heritage Act, which is administered by the Ministry of Citizenship, Culture and Recreation. These minor changes will simplify and speed up land use decisions under the Ontario Heritage Act. They respond to a number of long-standing complaints by municipalities and other stakeholders.

With respect to the broader review of the Ontario Heritage Act being done by the Ministry of Citizenship, Culture and Recreation, we recognize that significant changes to the legislation are needed. I know that my colleague, the Honourable Marilyn Mushinski, is very hopeful that she will be able to address this important issue when the legislative agenda allows.

Ladies and gentlemen, this legislation sets out the nuts and bolts of how planning decisions will be made. But ultimately, planning is driven by values and it's through provincial policy, not legislation, that the government communicates its values.

So even though it isn't part of the legislation, the policy statement released for consultation in January is an important part of Ontario's planning process. It sets out our vision of the sort of results that we would like to see on the ground. The proposed policy statement is about half as long as the existing statements. It would let municipalities make local decisions that reflect local needs while protecting the environment. For example, wetlands will continue to be protected. In a significant wetland south or east of the Canadian Shield or in the habitat of endangered or threatened species, development is not permitted.

Other natural heritage features and areas will also be protected. In these areas, development will be permitted only if it will cause no negative effects. We want these natural features protected for their long-term environmental, economic and social benefits.

The proposed policy statement addresses urban sprawl. It suggests new growth should go into existing developed areas wherever possible. It restricts development on the fringe of urban settlements. For example, very-low-density rural residential development is not appropriate in fringe areas that may be needed for urban expansion.

The proposed policy statement also asks municipalities to ensure that development is cost-effective and won't require high costs to service.

We've also heard lots of complaints from rural areas that economic development was being shut down by the previous government's policies. We believe that some development in rural areas is desirable, as long as it's cost-effective. For example, some commercial or industrial development in a rural area may support the rural economy without harming nearby urban areas.

The policy statement has been released to all major groups interested in planning. It is available from my ministry and on the Environmental Bill of Rights registry. Although the consultation on policy statements is separate from these hearings, I expect you will hear presenters talk about the policy statement and the legislation together. As part of our extensive consultation process, we will certainly take into account any comments we receive at these hearings.

I would also like to mention some changes we are making to the way we do business. Again, this is not actually part of the legislation you'll be considering, but you are considering the whole planning system, and the planning process only works as well as the administrative systems that make it go.

That's why we are making administrative improvements. These will streamline planning review and approval, reduce costs and make the system more locally responsive. For example, provincial agencies will review fewer site-specific applications such as subdivision plans and some official plan amendments. This will begin in April for regional municipalities and, over time, in other municipalities. This will strengthen local decision-making and it will enable regions to further streamline the development approval process.

While ministries will no longer review these applications, they will provide access to information, training and expertise where it's needed. Regions should be able to review applications they approve without additional costs by making use of in-house expertise and peer review.

Let me mention one other administrative improvement we are proposing. One of the most frequent complaints I've heard about the planning system is the need for municipalities to deal with several different ministries at the same time, and we're fixing that.

Where the provincial government is the approval authority, provincial reviews will be coordinated through new one-window procedures. This one-window planning service will give municipal, private and public sector clients one-stop access for provincial input, review and appeal services. The Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing will be the main contact for municipal staff on planning matters and this will mean faster decisions.

By this April 1, some parts of the province, including regional municipalities, will have access to a one-window service that includes the major ministries with an interest in land-use planning. As the ministry develops its capacity to provide planning services on behalf of other ministries, this one-window service will be expanded across the province.

I'd like to turn for a moment to another part of Bill 20, the part that deals with apartments in houses. I believe that municipalities have the expertise to decide what kind of housing is best for their communities. We are restoring authority to municipalities to decide where new apartments in houses are to be allowed, what type of houses they are to be allowed in and what planning standards will apply.

The wellbeing of tenants and homeowners is important to the government. Municipalities have asked for improved ability to register units and inspect them for safety. By giving them this power, Bill 20 will enhance the safety of people living in apartments in houses.

Bill 20 contains provisions that will grandfather apartments in houses that have existed legally before the introduction of this bill. Tenants will still have the right to complain about unsafe conditions and owners can legally upgrade.

The new section of the fire code that sets requirements for houses with two residential units continues to apply. Owners of such units have until this July 14 to comply with those requirements.

Another part of this bill deals with the Development Charges Act. Development charges add to the high cost of housing. In fact, the Urban Development Institute says development charges now add $15,000 to $20,000 to the cost of an average single-family home in the greater Toronto area. We intend to take a good look at the Development Charges Act over the coming year.

The idea will be to finance public infrastructure for growth in as fair a way as possible. We also want to reduce the cost of new housing and business construction, and we want to make sure development charges don't deter development. We'll consider and review ideas and input from all stakeholders. We intend to introduce a new Development Charges Act this fall. Bill 20 includes interim measures to allow us to get on with this review.

Some municipalities have development charges bylaws that will expire soon. Bill 20 lets municipalities extend these bylaws. In the meantime, municipalities can lower their charges, but they can't bring in new ones or increase their existing charges. Any increases after November 16, when the bill was given first reading, need special approval. This might be given, for example, where a major development is ready to go but can't go ahead without a new or area-specific development charges bylaw.

Bill 20 will also make municipalities more accountable for development charges revenues and expenditures. The way it is now, treasurers must present a summary report of development charges accounts to council each year. This bill goes further. It proposes that treasurers include in that report all revenues and expenditures related to each service covered by their bylaw. Also, treasurers must send me a copy of the report within 60 days of it going to council.

I'd like to sum up by repeating a few points I made in December when this bill received second reading.

One very important goal of this bill is to streamline the planning process. A streamlined process will mean faster decisions. That will cut the cost of development. Construction will be able to proceed, creating jobs and economic activity. Developers won't have to sit on valuable land, paying high carrying costs while waiting years for a decision.

At the same time, planning and development decisions will be made by those closest to the community. We will stop looking over their shoulders. We will let them get on with the job of making the right decisions for their communities. Provincial interests will be protected by the policy statement and through early involvement by provincial staff in developing municipal planning documents. The revised policy statement recognizes the diversity and the needs of municipalities. It will ensure that good development projects can move quickly.

Over the next couple of weeks, this committee will hear from many people and organizations. Some may express concerns about environmental protection. I can assure you that we are not backing off environmental protection. As the Premier has said, we can have the toughest environmental regulations in North America, but why does it have to take three years to say yes or no? Bill 20 will change that.

Bill 20 will put in place a system that delivers good planning, good decisions, in an efficient, cost-effective way.

I'd also like to point out that the parliamentary assistant for Municipal Affairs and Housing, Ernie Hardeman, will have carriage of the legislation as it goes through committee, so that all the members are aware of that.

The Chair: Thank you, Minister. As mentioned previously, the two opposition parties will each have up to 30 minutes to respond. We'll start with the official opposition.

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and The Islands): Just so I'm clear on it, are we allowed to ask the minister questions at this stage? Is that what you're suggesting? That's the way we worked it on the Bill 26 committee.

The Chair: That's certainly within the purview of your 30 minutes.

Mr Gerretsen: Thank you. I have a number of questions. I concur that one of the problems with the whole planning area has always been the question of timing as to how long it takes to get whatever is before a council approved. It hasn't got that much to do with the actual time limits that are set out in the act, but is more from a practical viewpoint as to how long it actually takes for a council to react, a planning staff to react, the various ministries to react etc. Anything that can improve that system, having built in and made sure the safeguards are still there to ensure that the general public has its say, is certainly something we can support.

The question I have, though, is that in your Common Sense Revolution, if I recall the document correctly, you said that you were going to scrap Bill 163 outright. It almost seems to me as if you've taken the Liberal position that was taken during the campaign that we're going to make some changes to Bill 163 rather than scrap it outright. Would you agree that you're not really scrapping the entire bill, but you're just making some changes to things that you felt weren't workable?

Hon Mr Leach: No, our position has been that we always intended to scrap those portions of Bill 163 that didn't work, and that's what we've done. We've taken a look at all of the pieces that we were convinced could be improved or changed and we have scrapped those portions, as we said we would.

Mr Gerretsen: I take it then that the statement that was contained in the Common Sense Revolution that Bill 163 would be scrapped should have said that some sections of 163 would be scrapped. There was an error in that particular document.

Hon Mr Leach: I wouldn't concur with that. I think we're doing exactly what we said we were going to do.

Mr Gerretsen: Let me ask you this. Bill 163 hasn't been in operation that long, and in dealing with the whole notion that decisions have to be consistent with provincial policy or have regard to provincial policy, has the ministry actually conducted any studies of any applications that have come in since Bill 163 has been proclaimed where that has been a problem? From your own comments in your speech here, you indicated that really the OMB quite understands what provincial policies are intended to do in the whole planning process, etc, and I'm trying to get to the idea of, has it actually been a problem since 163 has been in effect?

Hon Mr Leach: It's irrelevant really, because it's a total change in philosophy. We believe that decisions on planning should be made as close to people as they possibly can. The closer to local municipalities you can get where basic decisions are made, the better the decisions will be. "Be consistent with" is a top-down, Queen's Park approach that says, "You'll do as we tell you." "Have regard to," in my view, says, "Municipalities, you're responsible for the planning decisions in your area, but please have regard to the total provincial picture." It's a substantial change in philosophy.

Mr Gerretsen: How can you ask a municipality that's mainly concerned about how it's going to govern within its own jurisdiction to have regard for the entire provincial scene, as you just stated?

Hon Mr Leach: We put out a policy statement that outlines the important issues that the province is concerned with. As I mentioned, municipalities are not the same around the province. I think that Kenora is a whole lot different from Kingston and that duly elected municipal councils or regional councils or county councils are those that are elected to carry out that planning function, and they should do that, but they should do that having regard to the overall provincial scene.

Mr Gerretsen: Just so that I understand it correctly, they have to take the overall provincial scene into account, but if they then want to disregard it because of their own local situation, they can do so in their planning documents.

Hon Mr Leach: They have to have regard to it, but we want them to take local conditions into consideration. We think local conditions are important. We think there are key provincial areas that we want all municipalities to have regard to. It has worked well in the past and I believe it'll work very well in the future.

Mr Gerretsen: Can you outline some of these key areas that every municipality ought to have regard to?

Hon Mr Leach: They're in the policy statements. The policy statements have been put out for consultation.

Mr Gerretsen: In other words, those statements aren't complete as yet, they're out for consultation and they could change from time to time. Is that what you're suggesting?

Hon Mr Leach: Obviously it's kind of a chicken-and-egg situation. Do you have the legislation? You have to have the legislation so that you can determine what the policy statements are going to be. We've drafted a policy statement and we sent it out in January for all of the stakeholders to have an opportunity to review and comment back on. Those comments are due by March 4. I think that gives everybody an opportunity to review the legislation in conjunction with the policy statements so that they can make informed decisions on where we want to go.

Mr Gerretsen: All right, and let's say those policy statements get adopted and municipalities have regard to those. What happens in the future, though? Is the suggestion that the province can at any time unilaterally change some of these provincial policy statements without any input from the general public or municipalities?

Hon Mr Leach: Obviously, provincial policy statements can be revised at any time, but they would not be revised unless there was consultation with the public and the stakeholders involved, just as we're doing at the present time.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm curious with respect to a comment that's on page 4, about the sixth paragraph or so, where you say:

"We also heard lots of complaints from rural areas that economic development was being shut down by the previous government's policies. We believe that some development in rural areas is desirable, as long as it is cost-effective.

"For example, some commercial or industrial development in a rural area may support the rural economy without harming nearby urban areas."

I assume that we're not just talking about the potential of harming urban areas, but also the potential of harming agricultural areas. Is that just an oversight? I'm curious why that statement is in there the way it is.

Hon Mr Leach: It takes both into consideration. Obviously, you're not going to allow development in an urban area that has detrimental effect on prime agricultural land, but you also wouldn't want to allow commercial or industrial development in a rural area if it was going to have a detrimental effect on a nearby urban area that perhaps already has serviced lands etc, etc.

Mr Gerretsen: The next question deals with two paragraphs just below that where you say:

"I'd also like to mention some changes we are making to the way we do business. Again, this is not actually part of the legislation you'll be considering. But you are considering the whole planning system."

I guess what I'm getting to is that it reminds me a little bit of the Bill 26 debate, to the extent that a lot of people liked the title to it and what they perceived to be the thrust of the legislation. It's the same thing here that there seems to be—I'm sure that the development industry, for example, thinks it's a great idea to sort of get things moving along etc and yet those particular process items are not really dealt with in the legislation at all. If you felt so strongly about it, why wouldn't you include that in the legislation?

Hon Mr Leach: There are a couple of instances that I think you're referring to here; one is the one-window approach to government, and the other is the exemption. I think that one window is something municipalities at all levels would encourage. One of the largest complaints we've had is having to go from ministry to ministry trying to find out what the overall government policy is going to be. What we're saying is that it will be one agency's responsibility, one ministry's responsibility to make sure that the provincial government has its act in order.

Mr Gerretsen: I can see that and certainly the one-window approach I think is of benefit to all, to the extent that everybody will know who the key player is and who in effect you go to if something isn't working out. But how about the actual time periods it takes to approve various processes? I know we've got time periods of 30 days being cut back to 20 days and that sort of thing, but that's not the real problem.

From a practical viewpoint, no developer will take his council to the OMB because it hasn't reacted to something immediately. They will usually want to play ball for a certain period of time, because they don't want to jeopardize the council's attitude towards their development. The same thing when something comes within the ministry. I know from past experience it has sometimes taken three to six to nine months to get, let's say, a subdivision approved.

What plans or processes are you putting into place within the ministry so that people will know where they stand quicker than they currently do? Sometimes it seems to the general public and to those people who are interested in a particular development that these files sit on people's desks for months and months and months and nothing happens to them, and you better not complain about it too much or else it may even take a longer period of time. What I'm getting at is, what's happening within the ministry to ensure that those processes will actually move along at the rate at which business would do its business?

Hon Mr Leach: What we're doing is we're coordinating the activities of the other ministries. This has been a large part of the problem, as you've pointed out, of getting a subdivision approved, taking six, seven, eight, nine months, sometimes even longer, because of having to approach different parts of the provincial government, and files sitting on one ministry's desk until they are convinced that another ministry has looked at it. The responsibility of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing will be to coordinate the activities of other ministries to ensure that doesn't happen. The whole thrust is to streamline the process and eliminate those unnecessary delays.

Mr Gerretsen: What I'm asking you is, what administrative procedures have you put into place within the ministry itself whereby in effect the other ministries will have to react or make comment on particular proposals a lot quicker than they have for generations in the past?

Hon Mr Leach: There is a deputy ministers' committee that has been established to develop the protocol of how various ministries will respond to the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing. That process is in place at the present time and is being further developed.

Mr Gerretsen: Are you prepared to share that process with the Legislature and the general public? When people deal with government, their main complaint is that it takes too long for people to react to things.

Hon Mr Leach: Obviously, we are. The whole process is so that the municipalities, the general public, all other agencies in government know what the process is. When the deputies' committee has its protocol established—they're in the process of doing that at the present time—it will certainly be shared with all of the stakeholders, all of the players, all of the municipalities and all other agencies of government.

Mr Gerretsen: Just a couple of other comments. I don't know how much time I've got left. Dealing with the housing situation, the basement apartments etc, they were certainly a major problem across the province and a very difficult thing to deal with. I think the last government dealt with it in a realistic way. We have thousands of these units, and you're either going to put people out in the street or you're going to legitimize them at some point in time.

I find it very strange for a party that is very much in favour of private property rights, as certainly your party has been over the years and in your Common Sense Revolution, that now you would allow municipalities to once again step in and tell a man or a woman whose home has always been regarded as their castle—and under the current law they can do with it what they want as far as establishing a second unit in the building is concerned—you're now basically saying, "If your municipality feels that it's not appropriate to have basement apartments or second units in large buildings," for example, "it can outlaw them," not the existing units but any new units. Doesn't that run contrary to the notion that a person should be able to do with their own property what they want?

Hon Mr Leach: What we're doing is putting the authority, the autonomy and responsibility to the municipalities, where we believe they belong. I don't think that Queen's Park should sit here and say that in the city of Timmins second units are allowed as a right without taking into consideration any effect on the community, without taking into consideration any effect on your neighbours or any inconvenience they might face, but just as a right you can do that.

It has been proposed that a minor variance be taken all the way to the OMB, yet you seem to be going to the other end of the spectrum by saying, as a right, you should be able to build a second unit on a house without taking into consideration what kind of havoc you could be creating for your neighbours.

Mr Gerretsen: No, Minister, I'm not saying anything at all. I'm just questioning you as to your whole party's philosophy. In this particular case, you seem to be limiting a person's right to do what they want with their property when over the years I've heard nothing but statements about how government should get off people's backs. It seems to me that you're allowing at least municipal government to get on people's backs again as far as their own housing is concerned.

Hon Mr Leach: I think municipalities are the right level of jurisdiction to make those decisions. I know in the city of Toronto, for example, they've been very, very liberal in their approach to second units. That's small-liberal.

Mr Gerretsen: The other question I have deals with the Ontario Municipal Board and the question of appealing decisions relating to minor variances. Although I suppose in principle it would sound like the right thing to do, there are also situations, particularly in smaller municipalities where, as a result of personality conflicts or whatever, someone other than a municipal council ought to be the final arbiter, as it were, to decide these matters.

By eliminating minor variances from the OMB completely, you in effect are denying, it seems to me, situations where there could be these kinds of personality conflicts or whatever. You're not allowing somebody else to make the final decision when for whatever reason the council and the individual who's applying, or the people who are opposed to it, cannot agree to an equitable solution.

Hon Mr Leach: Municipal councils, local councils, are duly elected by the population to carry out their responsibilities. I think they do that quite well. Just by the very nature of the term itself, minor variance, if a duly elected local council doesn't have the right to make a decision on a minor variance, then I don't know what else they could be responsible for if they're not perceived to be responsible enough to deal with that type of issue. It seems to me we give them far larger responsibilities to deal with.

Mr Gerretsen: Let me suggest to you what I think the real problem is in that regard, particularly where you've got a minor variance of a six-inch overhang of a building or a side yard requirement or whatever. The problem has not been the fact that the final arbiter is the OMB; the problem, in my view, has been the fact that once the matter was referred to the OMB, it would normally take—and I realize the time periods have been speeded up over the last little while, but it would simply take too long to get that matter resolved.

It seems to me that one of the things you may want to consider is to set up a small group within the OMB that could be dealing with minor variances in a very quick and expedient fashion. I realize full well you don't need the same length of preparation time for all the parties involved if you've got a major development or whatever, a subdivision, that has been referred to the OMB, or you've got a situation where really quite often it's one neighbour against another and for whatever reason they're appealing.

Of course this would never come out verbally, but for those people who have been involved in these situations, we've all seen it happen where really the reasons why appeals are being launched in these minor variance situations have very little to do with what's actually being proposed. It seems to me if those matters could be dealt with quickly—all right, initially by council, but there are situations, I'm suggesting to you, Minister, where the council, for whatever reason, personal or otherwise, may not do the right thing.

We all make mistakes, and it seems to me to have a final arbiter in case like that which is totally removed from the situation but which can react quickly to a particular request—and it may still refuse it or accept it etc—if that matter could be handled more quickly by the OMB, I think that would resolve the problem, and I'd like you to take a look at that.

Finally, the Development Charges Act. I find it rather interesting that you're taking a look at the Development Charges Act and presumably there will be changes coming within the next six months to a year. I know this has been an ongoing area of great interest and with a great variety of opinion between the development industry and municipal councils as to what should be included in these charges.

I'm just curious, if you're doing this review already at this time, why you found it necessary to not allow municipalities to impose more stringent fees or more stringent charges than they currently have within their own development charges bylaw, which seems to run counter to the whole notion that you've been talking about for the last six months about giving municipalities more power, more authority, more freedom to act. Yet in this particular area you felt, "They can pass whatever they have and extend it, but they certainly can't impose any further charges," which in a particular municipal situation may very well be justified. Doesn't this sort of run contrary to what you've been preaching on this issue?

Hon Mr Leach: No. It's a temporary situation while we're reviewing the Development Charges Act. There is an opportunity for any municipality that feels that it has a justifiable reason for increasing its cost to make an application for approval and we would deal with it on a one-off basis. I think it's appropriate that we hold existing procedures in place—and by the way, as you're well aware, creating a development charges bylaw is a very expensive process.

What we wanted to ensure was that municipalities didn't embark on a very expensive process under one set of rules when there was a review going on that may change those rules. As a result of many of the municipal bylaws reaching a point where they were going to expire, we wanted to give them an opportunity to extend the bylaws that they have. They can reduce costs if they wish or extend their existing requirements, or, if there's a very special need, they can make a request for that special need to be dealt with, which I think is a very fair and appropriate way to go.

Mr Gerretsen: But of course you realize, if it's not paid through the Development Charges Act, whatever the costs are that the municipality incurs by this, it would have to come out of the general taxpayers revenue fund from a municipality.

Hon Mr Leach: That may well be the case. What we're planning to do is review the Development Charges Act to try and reach consensus between developers and municipalities and all of the other stakeholders as to what's appropriate, what is fair, what is the most equitable way to deal with new development and the charges that apply to them. The Development Charges Act has been in place for in excess of five years, and I think a review after five years is an appropriate way to go.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Gerretsen. That's your 30 minutes. We now move to the third party.

Ms Marilyn Churley (Riverdale): Thank you for joining us this morning, Minister. I have a number of questions and, I can assure you, some comments. I just want to start by asking you, given that the Sewell reforms and the new planning bill haven't had an opportunity to show any results as yet, who did you listen to, who did you consult with during your campaign and otherwise across the province, given that the act had no opportunity whatsoever to prove itself, to see where amendments might be needed etc? Why did you need to scrap the whole thing?

Hon Mr Leach: Because it's a basic difference in philosophy. We don't think that the planning process should be controlled by Queen's Park. The term "be consistent with" says, in my opinion, in our opinion, "Do as you're told by Queen's Park." We believe that municipalities should have the autonomy to make decisions on development that best suit local needs but keeping the basic philosophy of the province in mind, "having regard to" the overall picture.

It was a matter of a basic difference in philosophy. I think the consultation that was done by the Sewell commission was excellent.

Ms Churley: But I submit to you, Mr Minister, that one of the major issues which kept cropping up over and over again during that consultation was that "shall have regard for" wasn't working, and I submit to you that the reason why this government determined to go ahead with "shall be consistent with" is just the opposite of what you're saying.

You're talking about philosophy here, and that's all very nice, but this wasn't necessarily the NDP philosophy. This was agreed to. There was of course some objection in some corners precisely because the opposite was happening in many areas, and that is, there was such confusion. And I submit to you that there will be more delay and more frequency and length of OMB hearings because of this, because if the province is to step out as much as possible, which we agree needs to be done, then don't you think that the clearer provincial policy is, within that context, the more consistency you're going to have and therefore fewer OMB hearings, the less confusion?

Hon Mr Leach: No, I don't agree at all, and I don't agree that there was consensus on the—

Ms Churley: Oh, no, I didn't say there was consensus.

Hon Mr Leach: Or anywhere near it.

Ms Churley: Certainly there's obviously some disagreement in this room at the moment.

Hon Mr Leach: There were very strong views on the "be consistent with" because it is just perceived to be a ham-hammered approach by Queen's Park to control the development throughout Ontario, and as I mentioned earlier, our communities are totally different. The situation that applies in Sudbury would not necessarily apply in downtown Toronto.

Ms Churley: Well, absolutely.

Hon Mr Leach: What we want to do is to ensure that those communities have control of their destinies as far as development occurs, having regard to what the overall provincial picture is.

Ms Churley: I don't think there's any disagreement that the provincial policy needs to have the flexibility for different communities to adapt to that kind of overall view from the province. I don't think there was ever any question of that, that the provincial policy would absolutely nail down, every step of the way, the planning process for communities. That's a ridiculous suggestion, that anybody was suggesting that.

Hon Mr Leach: Well, a lot of people have suggested that that's the case, that the provincial policy statements that exist are very complex, are very detailed, and, along with having to be consistent with those policy statements, gave the municipalities little or no flexibility to deal with local issues.

Ms Churley: I just want to ask you what you meant when you spoke to the Canadian Bar Association when you said the policies themselves are weighted too heavily towards protecting the environment.

Hon Mr Leach: We felt, I think, that the protection of the environment is extremely important, and the policy statement that we have out for consultation and the legislation we're proposing strongly protect the environment. But I do believe that it was tipped a little too heavily in favour of the environment and didn't take into consideration the economic realities of continuing to develop the province in a timely fashion and an appropriate fashion.

Ms Churley: Why then would you, if you were concerned about protecting the environment—for instance, in significant wetlands, you've changed the map. Why would you take out much of eastern Ontario, which has one of the highest, or the highest, percentage of wetland resources remaining? Why would you eliminate that?

Hon Mr Leach: The Canadian Shield area is looked upon by most as being the most appropriate line across Ontario. There's a major difference in wetlands on the Shield and north of the Shield from those south and west of the Shield.

Ms Churley: So you decided that the wetlands in eastern Ontario therefore aren't as important to preserve.

Hon Mr Leach: No. You can't undertake any development that would have a negative effect on a wetland. You still have to show that any actions that you're proposing to take will not adversely affect the wetland in question.

Ms Churley: How would one have to show that? Whom would they have to show it to, since it's not on the map?

Hon Mr Leach: You would have to demonstrate that there is no negative effect.

Ms Churley: I see. Why would you eliminate the policies that sound pretty motherhood to me, especially when words are used like "promote" the most efficient modes of transportation and "reduce" the need for the private automobile by giving "priority" to energy-efficient, low-polluting travel such as walking, bicycling and public transit? Why would you take that out of the policy statements when it's really motherhood? It's not saying one has to; it's talking about promoting it.

Hon Mr Leach: In the policy statement that's out for consultation at the present time there's still a policy statement on transportation that talks about—

Ms Churley: Well, all I know is that in this particular one it was taken out. Perhaps you can find it for me in your grey book, because I haven't—

Hon Mr Leach: There is, in transportation in the policy statement, which of course isn't part of these deliberations, but it's going to be intermingled with it, I'm sure.

Ms Churley: Perhaps I can move on, and if it's found, you can tell me where it is. Again, I'd like to ask the question on elimination of the policy—

Hon Mr Leach: It's on page 4 of the policy statement, just for your information.

Ms Churley: Can you read it? Does it read the way my question was posed?

Hon Mr Leach: "Transportation systems will be provided which are safe, environmentally sensitive, and energy efficient and which optimize the use of transportation infrastructure and services."

"Transportation corridors and infrastructure corridors: Corridors and rights of way for significant transportation and infrastructure uses will be protected."

Ms Churley: The same thing—and correct me if I'm wrong—the elimination of the policy to conserve energy, resources and building materials and in the transport of those materials by, where feasible, reusing, recycling and renovating. Do I understand that is in your policy statement?

Hon Mr Leach: It's very difficult to do that in land use policy.

Ms Churley: So is it in there or not?

Hon Mr Leach: In the existing policies?

Ms Churley: Yes.

Hon Mr Leach: In the proposed policy statements? No, it's not.

Ms Churley: So you did take that out. Why did you take it out?

Hon Mr Leach: Well, because it's very difficult to control. We felt that the policy statements that are existing in the existing Bill 163 are too restrictive. When they're there in conjunction with the "be consistent with," they're too detailed; there's very little flexibility for anybody to deal with them. We wanted to provide as much flexibility as we possibly can while still protecting those environmentally sensitive areas.

Ms Churley: I don't know who would have talked you into removing that. It just seems to make perfect sense that in this time of resource consumption—when we know that Canada is one of the highest energy users in the world, why you would take out a policy that would promote energy conservation just doesn't make any sense to me.

Hon Mr Leach: Energy conservation doesn't necessarily fall hand in hand with land use planning. We just felt that the complexity of the policy statements that were in place under Bill 163 was far too restrictive when it was taken into consideration with "to be consistent with." It just didn't give anybody any flexibility to deal with many issues.

Ms Churley: I would suggest to you that that's one of the problems with government in the past. Government attitude towards environmental considerations, separating environmental considerations out of planning as a whole, is partly why we're in the mess we are today in terms of some environmental problems that we have. Our government tried, and it's very difficult to do, to get all ministries and all stages wherever possible to look at the environment, that it has to become a component of planning and possibly every other area where we do things. I'm really disappointed to see that your government is moving away from that concept. You say, "Well, it doesn't fit in with development." Development and the environment are so incredibly linked in so many ways that to separate it out is sure to cause serious damage to the environment.

Hon Mr Leach: No, under Bill 20 there's absolutely no move away from environmental protection. The environmental protection aspects of Bill 20 are still extremely strong.

Ms Churley: Mr Minister, I'm glad you're being told that and it may be nice for you to believe that, but—

Hon Mr Leach: I know that.

Ms Churley: —you're wrong. When you look through your new proposed bill, the environmental protections that were set after the Sewell consultation—as you know, there was extensive consultation across the province, and perhaps for the first time the environmental point of view was taken into account. I know that some municipalities and some developers didn't like that.

Hon Mr Leach: And land owners.

Ms Churley: And in some cases land owners.

Hon Mr Leach: And private citizens.

Ms Churley: And there were some compromises made about that. But, Mr Minister, you have taken almost every single environmental protection aspect of that bill out and have filled it in with weasel words about environmental protection, but there's practically no environmental protection left in this bill. I personally find it really shocking. You gut most of the natural heritage policies. You're gutting policies to curb urban sprawl. There's a weakening of agricultural land policies. This is a bill that—it's a planning regime where practically anything goes. It's full of environmental double-speak. There's lots of nice language about environmental protection but there's nothing in it to back it up.

Another concern that I have is a real concern about public consultation. I'd just like your comments. Do you personally feel that people are going to have enough time to respond to proposals that are out there under your new bill?

Hon Mr Leach: Yes, I do. The policy statement has been out since early January for consultation and comments by all concerned.

Ms Churley: I'm sorry, I guess I wasn't clear. Sorry to interrupt. The public notice and appeal periods are reduced to 20 days for notice of an official plan and for filing an appeal of an approval decision. So if you add a weekend into that and if you have slow postal service and maybe holidays, people could be left literally with just two weeks to review complex documents. I really have concerns about—

Hon Mr Leach: It's just a matter of filing the appeal. Usually, anybody who's involved in a development that's going through the municipal process or going on to the OMB or has a chance to go on to the OMB is involved enough that they're following the process. We strongly feel that the time frames in Bill 163 are far too long. I guess the number one complaint that we've heard from most involved, the municipalities and developers, is that the process to get through to get a decision made is twice as long as it should be. We're proposing that the time frames that are there now be cut just about in half, almost in half.

Ms Churley: I'd like to ask you a couple of questions around the Development Charges Act. My colleague from the Liberal Party touched on that. I would agree that there are some problems with that act. My concern here is that the development in suburban areas can cost a lot beyond hard services, and I'm sure this is a concern of yours as well, that somebody eventually has to pay for those services, and the possibility of taxpayers having to pick up the tab at the end of the day. Yes, we'd have cheaper housing. It will cost the developer less, it will cost the buyer less, but at the end of the day, somebody has to pay for it. I'm concerned that it could mean fairly substantial property tax hikes. I'm sure that's a concern of yours as well, and I'm just wondering if you have any ideas how to deal with that.

Hon Mr Leach: What we want to do is review the act. That's what we're proposing. The act has been in place for in excess of five years; I think it's appropriate that we look at it. I think there's going to be substantial debate as to what the most appropriate development charges process is. We'd like to ensure that all of the stakeholders have an opportunity, now that the bill's been there five years, to comment to us, to say: Does this work? Is there a better way to do it? What's an appropriate charge? We'll take all of that into consideration and write a new act.

Ms Churley: So you yourself don't have any really pre-conceived ideas at this point about what should be in it, what should be eliminated?

Hon Mr Leach: No, I'm open to discussion. My personal view is that we may have gone a little to the extreme in some cases on charges for soft services but, generally, I'm open to comment from all of the stakeholders, and whatever is deemed to be the most appropriate procedure is what we'll implement.

Ms Churley: My colleague has disappeared; I thought he had some questions. I'll keep going until he arrives back.

The basement apartment issue, when we introduced our position on it, was controversial; I know that. One of the reasons I fear it is controversial is that there are certain municipalities that choose to eliminate the possibility of basement apartments for reasons that aren't very community-oriented, I suppose, and I'm sure you know what I mean: the ability to keep poor people out, to have the kind of neighbourhood that is not attractive to poor people. I'm really concerned about that, and that of course leads to the fear that—one of the reasons why we changed the law around that was a very clear indication that there were a lot of illegal basement apartments, that people do it anyway, especially these days.

Often people need some help to pay their mortgage. It's a way of the private sector. It seems to me to go along well with the Tory agenda. It's a way that the private sector can create affordable housing without it costing the government anything at all. One can then feel assured that the basement apartments in existence are legal and up to safety and fire standards. I'm afraid we're going to go back to a situation where there will be more danger with illegal basement apartments. Some communities will disallow it for reasons that I think you and I would both object to.

Hon Mr Leach: We're not proposing to eliminate basement apartments, we just feel that municipalities should have the right to approve one. To have the sole right to go in and build a second unit in your home without any consideration to neighbours, community or anything else, just go and build it without taking any of that into consideration, is not the right way to go. There's nothing in this legislation that stops basement apartments. All we're saying is that local municipalities should have the right to approve it. Earlier, our colleague from the Liberal Party was talking about taking minor adjustments to the OMB. You know, you take a minor adjustment all the way through to the OMB, yet we expect to give individuals the right to build a basement apartment that could create all kinds of difficulties for neighbours, for the community or whatever, without even having to say good morning. I just think that if you want to put a second unit in your home, you should apply for approval of the municipality to do that. The city of Toronto, for example, as I mentioned earlier, has had a very liberal approach to second units for many years and I'm sure they will continue to.

Ms Churley: Coming back to environmental protection, because it's a major concern of mine, "have regard to" as opposed to "being consistent with," what if municipalities do ignore a fairly major policy statement from the government that could be detrimental, and you can see clearly it could be detrimental, to the municipality? What would you do?

Hon Mr Leach: We have the right to appeal if we're of the opinion that the municipalities completely ignored the policy statement and ignored the provincial position. We have a right to appeal to the OMB any municipal decision.

Ms Churley: Can I just ask you what role the Minister of the Environment played in drafting this legislation?

Hon Mr Leach: All of the ministries had an active part in this legislation.

Ms Churley: This legislation impacts significantly on the environment. Can you be specific about what you see as environmental protection in this bill? What would you say if you were asked, what's the most important environmental protection—

Hon Mr Leach: This bill isn't proposing changes to the way that we protect the environment.

Ms Churley: It absolutely is. It waters it down considerably.

Hon Mr Leach: I maintain that there are still very strong environmental protection aspects in this legislation.

Ms Churley: Like what?

Hon Mr Leach: On public notice. We still have the same protection of wetlands.

Ms Churley: No, you don't. You're misled if you think that, by staff. You don't have the same protection. All of that protection has been watered down, and you will hear more and more of that as we progress. I'd like to ask you—

Hon Mr Leach: We're still saying that you can't do anything with wetlands or any of the other environmental aspects if it has any detrimental effect on the issue at hand, whether it's a woodlot or whether it's a wetland or anything else. If it has a detrimental effect, then you cannot do anything with that.

Ms Churley: I will say that it'll be proven to you and to this committee over the course of these hearings that the environmental protection aspects of our bill have been significantly watered down, that it's going to have some very serious implications in terms of protecting the environment. If you're convinced of that, are you willing to reinstate some of the environmental protection aspects that have been taken out.

Hon Mr Leach: I guess one of the things that we've taken out is the word "all" in "all uses of wetlands," because if you eliminate all uses of wetlands, nothing can happen at all, whereas if you keep the "any uses" aspect in, it gives you the right to keep anything that would be detrimental to a wetland out, but some existing uses may be acceptable. There have been uses of wetlands, for grazing cattle or whatever, for years. By having the word "all uses" you have to stop all of that, and we just didn't think that was appropriate.

Mr Howard Hampton (Rainy River): I want to ask you about the one-window approval authority. And I apologize, I wasn't here for some of this. I was here for most of it.

What is going to happen, let's say, where you've got a development proposal that involves development near significant natural environment features and the Ministry of Natural Resources, let's say, raises an objection, but it's the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing that I take from this has the final say?

Hon Mr Leach: We're there to coordinate provincial positions, not dominate them. This is very similar to what your party wanted to bring in on one-window shopping on Bill 163, and apparently it didn't get it. It's a coordinating function rather than a control function. If there are important environmental issues or agricultural issues, all of the expertise from those various agencies would be brought forward to the OMB, but we would like to go with one coordinated provincial position rather than having three or four provincial agencies presenting different positions to the OMB, all at the taxpayers' expense, dragging on the process far longer than should occur.

Mr Hampton: You're saying it's strictly a coordinating function, so therefore if the Ministry of Natural Resources, let's say, has a significant objection, if it feels fundamentally that the development proposal will have a negative impact on those natural environment features, the Ministry of Natural Resources would itself be able to make public its criticisms and its opposition?

Hon Mr Leach: As I said, we want to coordinate the provincial position, we want to show leadership on it. There is a provision to exempt any agency and allow it to go to the OMB if we choose to, but I think it's important as a province and as a group of ministries that we take all of the positions of the various ministries into consideration and form a position before you go to the Ontario Municipal Board.

Mr Hampton: That's what I'm trying to determine here. What does "coordinate" mean? It means one thing if the Ministry of Municipal Affairs makes public the views of, let's say, MOEE or the Ministry of Natural Resources on a particular development proposal. In other words, if MNR's objections, its concerns, its criticisms are made public, I guess I could accept that definition of "coordination," but if it means that MNR's views, the ecologists, the biologists, the people the province hires to look after the natural environment, to know about these things—if it means they can't voice their views, if it means that MNR's position doesn't get heard, then I think "coordination" here is being used in a way that most of us would object to.

Hon Mr Leach: There's absolutely no intent to stifle any of the ministries on any of the issues, regardless of what it is. It's a matter of coordinating so that we're all singing out of the same hymnbook. There have been many documented incidences where various ministries have gone to the OMB with positions without having any idea what the other ministries of the province are doing. What we think is that there should be a coordinating effort to make sure that we all know what's going on before we go and extend an OMB process for perhaps months or even years because we didn't even take the time to coordinate our own position.

Mr Hampton: I think you're glossing over a significant problem here.

Hon Mr Leach: I've been there. I was a provincial—

Mr Hampton: Yes, I've been there too, and I saw instances where, for example, the Ministry of Finance thought something was an excellent idea, because the economists in the Ministry of Finance rarely ever lift their heads above Bloor Street. Then when it got out to the folks in OMAFRA or it got out to the folks in MNR or MOEE who know something about what happens north of Bloor Street, the roof caved in.

Hon Mr Leach: That's exactly what we want to do. We want to ensure, if somebody comes forward with a proposal, that we involve all of the other ministries of the province to make sure that they do have input, so that somebody doesn't show up at the OMB without another ministry such as MNR even knowing that there's a position being put forward.

Mr Hampton: So let me ask you the question again.

Will we see in the future, under this legislation and the associated policies, ministries like the Ministry of Natural Resources, the Ministry of Agriculture and Food, the Ministry of Environment and Energy being able to make their views public, their experts being called, being available, being able to take positions in opposition to the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing?

Hon Mr Leach: Obviously, we're going to rely on the expertise that's in all of the ministries that you mentioned in formulating a provincial position. I would hope and I'm sure that the expertise of all of the ministries that you mentioned will be called upon at OMB hearings. What we're trying to do is to ensure that we go into an OMB hearing with all ministries of the province knowing what the position of the others are, and that hasn't been the case in the past.

Mr Hampton: And if they don't all agree? Who prevails?

Hon Mr Leach: We should work out a provincial position on any issue before we get scrapping at an OMB because we didn't know what the other guy was thinking. Certainly we should be able to work out our provincial position between ministries before we go and create great expense for the taxpayer on prolonging OMB hearings because we can't agree with each other.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Hampton. That's the 30 minutes for the third party. Thank you again, Minister, for making yourself available this morning. With that, we will move on to hearing presentations from individuals and groups.

GREATER TORONTO HOME BUILDERS' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: We're slightly ahead of schedule, but it's my understanding that the representatives of the Greater Toronto Home Builders' Association are with us already. Good morning. Again just as a reminder, you have 25 minutes available to you. You can devote as much of that time as you want to a presentation and the balance will be divided equally among the three parties for questions.

Mr Tom Stricker: Thank you, Mr Chairman. Good morning, members of the committee. For the record, my name is Tom Stricker and I'm here today in my capacity as president of the Greater Toronto Home Builders' Association. Joining me is Peter Langer, past president of the association.

The GTHBA is the voice of the residential construction and renovation industry in the greater Toronto area. We represent roughly 850 member companies involved in every aspect of residential development and building.

This year marks the 75th anniversary of the association, and we are immensely proud of our history of advocacy on behalf of the new home buyer.

Today, we're here to talk about Bill 20 specifically, but I would like to start by speaking briefly about the economy in general and the relationship between planning policy and economic development.

Peter will then speak to the details of the bill and offer some constructive suggestions for further improvement.

Just before we turn it over to you for questions, I will conclude with some comments about the development charges aspect of the bill.

On the economy, I think it's fair to say that the people of this province have experienced some very difficult economic times over the last several years.

While it's encouraging to learn that the export sector of our economy is rebounding nicely, the domestic sector has yet to show any significant signs of emerging from the depths of the recession.

The development and building industry operates primarily within the domestic economy. It uses locally manufactured products and materials, it employs local tradespeople, and the final products are purchased by local consumers. It is by far the largest industry within the domestic economy and has the potential of generating hundreds of thousands of person-years of employment every year.

You would think that in the context of the challenging economic circumstances we find ourselves in, the public and the media would embrace anyone who would be willing to take a risk in the name of job creation. Amazingly, however, an attitude continues to persist in certain vociferous circles that development is inherently bad and that it should be prevented wherever possible, or at least taxed and regulated to the point where there are no profits left at the end of the day to reinvest. As a result of both circumstance and attitude, this industry has been devastated. I honestly can't figure out this mentality, especially today.

We know that the population of the greater Toronto area is expected to grow to more than six million people over the next 25 to 30 years. The intent of Bill 20 is to ensure that we can efficiently manage that growth while balancing the interests of the industry, consumer and public at large. And that's what planning policy is all about. The government has taken a bold step forward in the name of job creation with Bill 20. We embrace that leadership.

At this point, I'd like to turn it over to Peter to talk about some specifics.

Mr Peter Langer: Thank you, Tom, and good morning. The Greater Toronto Home Builders' Association has been active on the issue of planning reform since the establishment of the Commission on Planning and Development Reform roughly five years ago. From the initial draft through to the commission's final report and on to the consultation process on Bill 163, we have been active participants and we've been offering a very consistent message: The process needs to be streamlined and the inherent costs need to be reduced.

Over the course of your hearings, you are likely to hear a lot of concerns raised by certain what I would call selfish interest groups about how Bill 20 will destroy the environment and undermine the social fabric of the province. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Bill 163 destroyed the balance between economic and environmental interests that were reflected in the previous planning laws, while adding layers of confusing prescriptive policy and unnecessary guidelines. Here are the guidelines that were dreamed up for Bill 163. Does this look like streamlining and efficiency to you? It's well over 600 pages of—well, it makes great bedtime reading.

Despite the spin that was put on the Bill 163 package by the commission and dutifully reported by much of the media, there never was a broad consensus of support for that legislation. In fact, after beating our heads against the wall for three years trying to convince the previous government how its proposals would dramatically increase the cost of development in this province while severely restricting consumer choice, we stood together in September 1994 with the Association of Municipalities of Ontario, the Urban Development Institute, the Canadian Institute of Public Real Estate Companies, the Ontario Home Builders' Association, the Metropolitan Toronto Board of Trade, the Ontario Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Bar Association in opposing Bill 163. Indeed, if there was any broad consensus, it was a consensus against those measures.

The reason that we support Bill 20 is that it restores the balance between economic and environmental interests and restores integrity to the process. It will allow for good projects to go ahead in a timely fashion to meet the needs of future generations.

Please don't be misled by the scaremongering critics who will tell you that these changes will lead to air pollution, groundwater contamination, higher property taxes, urban sprawl and all the other myths that have been perpetrated in the last number of years, because while Bill 20 streamlines the process and balances competing interests, there is still lots of legislation and policy left intact to ensure that public interests are protected.

Don't forget, as was discussed previously, that all the other ministries will still be involved. We will still have provincial policy statements—they will be shorter and simpler, as we understand—and we will have public meetings on official plans, official plan amendments and zoning bylaws.

Finally, we have the local councils themselves, who are faced with the daily task of balancing the interests of proposed developments with the interests of their existing residents.

Quickly, I'd like to run through what we specifically like about Bill 20:

Enthusiastically, we support the replacement of the words "be consistent with," with "have regard to." The "be consistent with" clause, read in conjunction with the reams of policy and guidelines generated under Bill 163, was going to have the immediate effect of dramatically and arbitrarily restricting the supply of land available for development, while driving up prices in the process.

We wholeheartedly support the elimination of the requirement to hold a public meeting on a plan of subdivision. The public has always enjoyed and will continue to enjoy under Bill 20 the opportunity to provide input at the official plan and zoning bylaw stages of the process.

We support the streamlining provisions in the bill in terms of the shortened time frames proposed for various development approvals. There simply has not been enough discipline in the system up until now and we cannot afford that any longer.

There are a couple of concerns that we have that we'd like to table with you today.

First, one of the problems of Bill 163 that remains with Bill 20 is the issue of appeals from minor variances. Prior to Bill 163, committee of adjustment decisions could be appealed to the Ontario Municipal Board. This appeal provided proponents with an impartial forum where planning issues could be argued and objective decisions reached. The first reading version of Bill 163 eliminated appeals to the board, however, by the time the bill was passed, the right to appeal minor variances had been restored.

Under Bill 20, we seem to be caught somewhere in the middle. In cases where there is no committee of adjustment, the decisions of municipal councils are final and not subject to review. Where there is a committee of adjustment which does not include a representative of council, council can review the decision or direct the board to hear the matter on a fee-for-service basis.

This seems to be an attempt by the government to have its cake and eat it too, that is, to streamline things at the OMB while appearing to provide for a reasonable right of appeal. To the extent that the backlog at the board will be reduced, there will be an offsetting logjam, we fear, at council, so we may not have gained very much.

Our main concern, however, lies in the fact that we are being denied the opportunity to get a fair and impartial review of decisions and are faced with a situation where politics can prevail over planning, with local councillors sitting as both judge and jury. This is a serious concern of many of our members, particularly those involved in redeveloping and revitalizing existing neighbourhoods. We would recommend that the ability to appeal to the board be preserved.

One of the other problems that remains relates to the cutting of trees on private property. Bill 163 amended the Municipal Act to give municipalities the power to regulate the cutting of trees on private property, and this has not been dealt with under Bill 20. This kind of arbitrary power is inappropriate and creates the potential for abuse. In the extreme, it creates an incentive for land owners to cut down trees before they reach maturity, as defined in local bylaws. This provision is counter-productive and we hope that you will recommend its elimination.

Those are my comments at this point. I'd like to turn it back to Tom.

Mr Stricker: I'd like to conclude with a brief word about the development charges provision of Bill 20. The vast majority of local development charges bylaws in this area were set to expire in November 1996. Bill 20 prevents municipalities from increasing their current development charges while providing them with the power to extend their existing bylaws indefinitely pending a fundamental review of the act. I guess they can lower them, too, but I don't hear too many of them talking about that.

The industry supports the fundamental review of development charges, particularly the emphasis on higher degrees of accountability. The Development Charges Act was put in place in the midst of an unprecedented growth boom. I don't need to tell you how many times have changed. Accordingly, it is appropriate to look at the act. We accept the premise that new growth should pay for basic, necessary services. However, let's be clear: It is home buyers who pay development charges, and as the voice of the new home buyer, we want to make it clear that new home buyers should not pay more than their fair share.

We look forward to participating in the review process. That concludes our comments today. We have kept our remarks fairly general, knowing that the Ontario Home Builders' Association and the Urban Development Institute will be providing more detailed and technical comments later this week. Thank you for hearing us. We would be delighted to answer any questions you may have.

The Chair: We have four minutes for each caucus for questions. We will begin with the official opposition.

Mr Gerretsen: I've got a question about the Development Charges Act. I assume, since you people are in the private development business, that you're free-enterprisers who believe in the market system that prevails or seems to be sort of the foundation of our North American society.

Why are you so concerned that municipalities would in effect make the charges that they could charge under this act even more onerous in a time when there seems to be very little development going on? Wouldn't you think—and I assume that you people deal with municipalities on an ongoing basis—that most municipalities want to see growth in their community rather than the community next door, that if any municipality had very onerous charges under the act, they would probably do the right thing and decrease them in any event if they wanted to have any development take place in their municipalities?

Mr Langer: That would be rational thinking. Unfortunately—

Mr Gerretsen: You're saying local councillors are not rational, is that it?

Mr Langer: They may be rational in their own minds in some cases, and it's not a problem that's common in every municipality, and certainly some municipalities have recently reduced development charges and many municipalities don't have them at all. But in some municipalities, yes, there is an anti-growth, anti-development attitude that is prevalent at council and it may be a reflection of the attitudes of their existing constituents and those charges have not been reduced and in fact were increased not too long ago. It is used as a tool to slow down the pace of development.

Mr Gerretsen: I guess I'm always somewhat concerned about the inconsistency in a lot of the development industry's approach to this. On the one hand they're saying, "Government, get off our backs," but on the other hand they're saying, "We really don't trust the local municipalities and we need your help here to protect us from the local councils." It always seems to me that there's an inconsistency there, particularly when with most of these councils, the kind of business that you're in, you're working with them on a daily basis—maybe not with the councils directly, but certainly with the people who work for the municipalities. Do you have any comments on that?

Mr Stricker: I can comment on that. There are certain developers who want DCAs to be softer than what they are presently. There are some with the softs, as they are now, and then there are the hard services. We're all over the map on it. We're not going to deny that. But what we do say is that they are being used as a tool to prohibit development. In a lot of cases the money is being wasted. There are some funds that have overspent what they budgeted, and in fact if anybody stopped the clock right now, they'd be bankrupt.

So what we're saying is that municipal taxpayers, our future ones and the ones existing, can only afford so much and they have to pay the cost of operating those facilities, so everybody has to take a look at it again and see, do we put all these fancy rec centres in, do we put these art galleries and theatres and all the other things in that have been dreamed up over the last 10 years, or do you put it back to the municipal taxpayer—who all vote; our guy doesn't vote at that point in time—and let him decide whether that's a worthy thing for his community? That's what we'd like to see, that "necessary" be defined.

Mr Gerretsen: Just a very quick question. Would you agree with me that the main problem with respect to minor variances to the OMB is the time delay it takes for the OMB to deal with relatively minor matters and that they are different from major developments that obviously require a longer time for the OMB to deal with?

Mr Langer: I think I heard a reasonable suggestion a little bit earlier and I think the suggestion came from you. Certainly, time is one of our biggest concerns in the process at every single stage of the way. We think there should be a method that you can get an impartial hearing on the minor variance issue, and the suggestion of a special group within the OMB to provide that hearing in a timely fashion is a very reasonable one.

Ms Churley: Thank you very much for your presentation. Could you tell me how you define "certain selfish interest groups"? What's your definition of a "selfish interest group"?

Mr Langer: I think these are groups that are probably in a minority that have a particular interest. Maybe their interest is they just want to stop development. There are some we've heard from who would perhaps like to get on their bicycles and pedal backwards in time. They're not realistic and they're not in the interests of the broader community. That's how I would define them.

Ms Churley: Would you consider the Greater Toronto Home Builders' Association a special-interest group?

Mr Stricker: Let me answer that. Let me jump right in here.

I guess in a way we represent new home buyers. They don't have a lot to say right now; they're still living in rental apartments or with Mom and Dad or something. I guess we represent them. If there's something wrong with that, you know—

Ms Churley: No, would you consider it a special-interest group?

Mr Stricker: Yes.

Ms Churley: Yes, you would. A selfish one, or more there for the good of society?

Mr Stricker: No, we protect the guy who doesn't vote.

Ms Churley: For what?

Mr Stricker: We look out for the guy who doesn't vote right now, within that jurisdiction that you're speaking to, when it comes to planning.

Ms Churley: I know it sounds facetious, but I think it's a legitimate question, because this special-interest group thing has really gotten out of hand. It seems as though anybody who doesn't agree with you any more is called a selfish special-interest group, but you yourself, you're above it all, pure. I think we have to be really careful with that. I'd just like to comment that I have concerns about that kind of polarization of different points of view and different areas of expertise.

Mr Langer: Maybe we would be better to just talk about interest groups without any designation of "selfish" or "special."

Ms Churley: Perhaps that would be better.

Mr Langer: "Special" is not one that we invented. "Special" is one that has been used for political, ideological purposes for a long time.

Ms Churley: I just think that it lessens the validity of the debate, because environmentalists who have expertise in the area have really legitimate, important things to say and I think it's unfair—

Mr Langer: You're absolutely right, and it wasn't used specifically with environmentalists. There are legitimate environmental concerns. Our industry has often been cast as being somewhat anti-environmental, and I can assure you nothing is further from the truth. I don't know anybody who is anti-environment.

Ms Churley: I do, but anyway, I think my colleague wants to pick up from here. Thank you.

Mr Hampton: I've read a fair amount of material on this from different sides. In your submission here, you say, "We enthusiastically support the replacement of the words 'be consistent with' and support going back to 'have regard to.'" You take the view that this will speed things up. Some of the other reports I've read suggest that we're going to be headed back to protracted, site-specific battles each time a development application comes along, because you don't have any certainty upfront.

They're saying "be consistent with" gives you a pretty clear guideline of the test you have to meet. "Have regard to" doesn't tell you a lot about anything. Therefore, what's going to happen is, with "be consistent with," you know what you have to do upfront and you do that upfront planning, and that should result in less delay, less time.

I've read those. I've read them over a couple of times. I think the idea with those was—

The Chair: You've had your four minutes. Perhaps I could ask for a quick response.

1040

Mr Hampton: I think the idea with those was to be helpful and to give people some real guidelines. You think that going back to the old standard will actually result in less protracted hearings and disputes?

Mr Langer: Not necessarily in itself. The "have regard to" regime existed for a long time and there is a body of cases that give it very clear definition. There may have been some rare examples of its abuse, but I think it was a system that generally worked. The "be consistent with," together with the policy statements and all of this stuff, was leading us into a regime that was going to be terribly confusing, very time-consuming and very expensive. That's really where the nub of the problem lies. We also agree that there should be some flexibility in considering these things at the local level. Every community has its own different attributes, and the policies should be read within that context.

Mr Ernie Hardeman (Oxford): Good morning and thank you for the presentation. I just wanted to go back quickly to the appeal of minor variances. You suggested in your presentation that the policy seems to be somewhat wanting to have the cake and eat it too, that in areas where there are no members of council on the committee of adjustment, the council would be the final appeal; in areas where members of council are on the committee, there would be no appeal.

I just wanted to ask, in the first scenario of the two, where no members of council are on the committee of adjustment, would you see that as an appropriate appeal mechanism as opposed to putting it to the OMB and taking a lot of time and money on all applications? Would locally elected officials be an appropriate appeal mechanism if they were not involved in the original decision?

Mr Stricker: I think the applicant or the objector, depending on who's debating the item, is too close to the council and generally they'll know them. They can't distance themselves or be, I think, fairminded generally. They'll favour one or the other. I think they should consider it perhaps, and if they can't come to an agreement, it can go to OMB. That could be considered. But we still feel that OMB has a more impartial view and is not familiar with either the applicant or the objector. Quite frankly, they could play hockey together or be friends, and that's the problem.

Mr Bruce Smith (Middlesex): I want to come back to one particular point that my colleague Mr Hampton had raised. At the outset, I would have to say I'm pleased to see that you've recognized the importance of balance between the economics and environmental interest that we're trying to achieve in this bill. As proponents of a potential development application, do you have any concern that the change in wording from "be consistent with" to "have regard to" would compromise the type of environmental considerations that you would consider in a normal planning application?

Mr Langer: Would going from "be consistent with" to "have regard to" compromise environmental concerns?

Mr Smith: Yes, if we were to change that.

Mr Langer: No. There are lots of standards, some more clear than others. There's lots of legislation that requires environmental consideration for those few people who may not have the environment at the top of their mind. I think the protection is there and it's adequate. This does bring a balance back into the system, though, so that the planning system cannot be abused by those who would cloak themselves in the guise of environmental protection while their real agenda is to just stop development.

Mr Smith: One last quick question. On page 4 you alluded to your support for the streamlining provisions of the bill. In any way do you feel the time frames that have been established compromise the ability of a municipality to respond to them adequately?

Mr Langer: I don't think so. There is probably some concern and there may have to be some re-engineering at some of the municipalities in order to accommodate those time frames, but I think that's fairly positive. It creates a little bit of tension in the system, some discipline. It does force decisions in a more timely manner, and clear decisions, so you know where you can go from there. One of the big problems we've been having is applications have been sitting around and moving here and moving there, and time and time and time goes by. It's one of the significant differences that we have between our system here and in the United States, for instance, where we are losing a lot of employment opportunities. It's inherently costly to take five or six years to get a major subdivision approved.

The Chair: Thank you very much again, gentlemen, for taking the time to make presentations and answer questions here today.

KARL JAFFARY

The Chair: We're going to change positions here. Apparently, the next group had some confusion as to the starting time. Fortunately, we have the subsequent presenter, Mr Karl Jaffary, and I see you have an associate as well, Katherine Latimer. Thank you very much for saving us the inconvenience of a break. Good morning. We have 25 minutes, to be divided as you see fit between presentation and questions.

Mr Karl Jaffary: Good morning and thank you very much, Mr Chairman. I have distributed a letter with the substance of my remarks, so I'll take you through that fairly briefly and then be happy to answer questions.

The first thing I wanted to say was a very, very strong congratulations to the government and to the ministry for bringing this legislation forward. I'm just surprised that such an amount of detailed work could be done as quickly as it was done. In very general terms, I find the recommendations to be extremely good. We're happy with the bill. I'm happy with the bill. I'm going to suggest a couple of things that I think could make it a little better but, overall, pass it and I'll be saying hurray. It's a lot of good moves in the right direction. That's the general thrust and the most important thing I wanted to say.

I think Bill 163 went off the track in a number of places, and rather than just restoring what it was before, you have not only got it back on track but introduced some very significant improvements. The direct appeal from a failure to pass an official plan going directly to the board rather than going to the ministry seems to me to be highly desirable, and there is a number of other instances like that which I'm very supportive of.

I have said that there are a couple of things that might be improved, and the first area I want to discuss is the committee of adjustment appeals to the Ontario Municipal Board. Committee of adjustment appeals to the municipal board at the moment number about 14% of the board's work in caseload number and only 5% in terms of the time the board sits hearing. I get those figures from the chair of the board. I'm concerned that for that amount of time-saving, really, all appeal rights will be lost, and in some circumstances all appeal rights could be lost. If a member of a municipal council is appointed to the committee of adjustment, that means there's no appeal. Municipalities, as we speak, are thinking about appointing members who will never attend any of the meetings, and that will mean there will be no appeal right and they won't have to worry about it. That seems to me to be unfortunate.

On the other hand, the whole municipal council hearing an appeal is in some cases going to be quite workable. I think largely here of smaller municipalities and rural municipalities. I have no problem about the municipality taking that function on to itself when it wants to. I think, however, that trying to ask a municipal council in a large municipality to conduct appeals is not going to be workable. You won't be able to comply with the rules of the Statutory Powers Procedure Act appeal. An appeal from a committee of adjustment on a major density matter can take a full day, can easily take several days. When you get a council like the city of Toronto, with 16 members used to operating in a forum not unlike your own where people can wander in and out, but unable to do that on an appeal—everybody would have to be there for all of it—you're either going to be putting the council under a great deal of strain or trying to ask appellants to move their cases forward more quickly than perhaps is appropriate.

I like that idea in the bill of councils being able to refer the matter to the OMB and of councils having to pay for it if they refer it to the OMB. That seemed to me perfectly sensible. If it's the council that has passed this bylaw that is difficult to live with, perhaps it's the council that should pay for the hearing. I was taught many years ago by the city solicitor in Toronto that the purpose of the zoning bylaw was to make sure that no one could actually build anything without getting council's specific approval. If a municipality uses the zoning bylaw that way and that gives rise to appeals, perhaps the costs of the appeal should be borne by the municipality. But my suggestion is that the municipal council should either hear the appeal or it should refer it to the OMB at its own cost, but it should do one of those two things. The option of having a member of council be a member of the committee of adjustment, with no appeals, seems to me inappropriate.

Even Bill 163 talked about eliminating appeals from committees of adjustment, and a number of people in the municipal bar said, "That just means that instead of going to the committee of adjustment, we'll all have to apply for a zoning change." There is some concern about that. You get an appeal from a zoning change, and the expeditious and useful work that committees of adjustment now do, it seems to me, should not be sacrificed and have people seeking zoning bylaw changes that will be more complex and more time-consuming, if that can be avoided. But I think we do need to give a right of appeal.

The second area I want to discuss with you is the time that is frequently consumed in fulfilling the conditions of subdivision approval, and I think time that need not always be spent. In some municipalities, particularly regional municipalities, it is a practice on the part of the regional municipality of being unprepared to even address the fulfilling of conditions of approval until all the other conditions by the area municipalities have been fulfilled, and the area municipalities' conditions will often involve the posting of security for the construction of underground works and things of that sort.

A client for whom I regularly appear has had millions and millions and millions of dollars in letters of credit posted with local municipalities in circumstances where he cannot get the regional municipality to even address the drafting of the agreement that will be a condition of final registration. Here's the regional municipality really getting in the way, and I suppose I should be addressing them rather than you. I quite agree with the thought that municipalities should be masters in their own houses, but the regional municipalities have not been helpful in moving registrations along quickly.

School boards have caused even worse problems from time to time. A very usual condition of a draft approval will be that the developer enter into agreements with the school board relating to the school sites that have been designated on the plan. What the agreement is is usually a difficulty in arriving at an option price and evaluation, and the process can go on for months and months and months.

With the OMB's backlog of work, you try to meet with the school board. If you then think you aren't getting anywhere with an agreement and you want to appeal that condition to the board, you look at another eight months to a year of delay, so you are pushed hard to deal with the school board, although very frequently, something that said that the developer will not build anything else on those sites for 10 years and if they can't come to an agreement the school board will expropriate the sites would be totally fair to all parties. I think everyone would rather do an agreement than have an expropriation. But it is difficult if you are leaving this power of controlling the timing in the hands of any body, and the school board has been in some cases as remiss in being concerned about the speed at which approvals come as has been the regional municipality.

In trying to find a solution to any of that as far as your bill is concerned and trying to think as well of your desire to keep local autonomy strong, the only suggestions I can come up with would involve giving the minister some right to issue discretionary directions as to how conditions should be fulfilled. One of the few, if I can put it that way, positive things we saw with the last government's administration of the Planning Act was the appointment of the provincial facilitator, who most of us found to be doing a useful and helpful job in moving things forward, obviously a job of facilitation and attempting to arrange meetings.

It seemed to me that that experience is something you might be able to build on a little. If you got to a situation where the minister had the right to issue directions, the minister might come up with a standard form of agreement on school sites and direct that people either follow that agreement or move forward somewhat more expeditiously on their negotiations. You could certainly get a ministerial direction to regional governments that once a plan of subdivision had been approved, with conditions, it should immediately begin work on drawing the agreements that would satisfy the conditions.

It's that kind of thing I'm thinking of. I suggest no major change in the legislation to deal with that kind of thing except perhaps the possibility of ministerial direction with an aim to more rapid fulfilment of conditions. Those are my remarks. I will end as I began, with congratulations for the bill. If there are any questions or anything I can help with further, I'd be delighted to do that.

Ms Churley: I liked your comment about your old sparring partner, John Sewell. I just wanted to ask you, with the very short time, a general question. A major reason why our party, when in government, went—and we didn't go out looking for trouble, believe it or not. There was obviously a need for planning reform. We heard from all kinds of sources, including municipalities, that there were substantive problems, and we responded to that.

Obviously, there was not an overall consensus; there are people who prefer this mode. But there were problems in the past that resulted in very bad, piecemeal planning—and I think you would agree with that—including the Toronto area, as we well know. That is my concern, and that is why I have concerns. I think we're going in a negative direction here. We disagree.

Do you have concerns? For instance, in the past there has been, because of bad planning, contaminated water in areas because of inconsistent planning. That's one of the reasons I believe that consistent overall provincial policy, of course with flexibility built in for different areas, is important, to try to avoid that kind of urban sprawl and contamination of water and other problems which result from piecemeal planning. Can you comment on that?

Mr Jaffary: As I recall, the terms of reference of the Sewell commission were to do two things: one was to streamline the system and the second was to essentially look at municipal conflict of interest. This was a period when you had various local councillors being accused of being involved in goodness knows what. Those were the reasons the government felt a need to act.

Ms Churley: No, no. There were more than that.

Mr Jaffary: That was what the terms of reference said. I certainly think provincial policy is an important tool and provincial policy statements are a good thing to have. They're often useful, and I think the board has dealt with them quite effectively. I know that the Ontario Municipal Board feels, and I feel, that when it confronts an environmental problem it deals with it very effectively. The difficulty always seemed to me to be environmental problems that had slipped past and that nobody had properly identified when the approvals were taking place. What Bill 163 essentially did was give that responsibility to the local government. I would have thought the local government always had that responsibility; it just hasn't always behaved with it perfectly, and I suppose it never does.

The question of the shape of this region is something now on the government's plate. Clearly, consistency of local plans with regional government plans is an important issue, and we now finally have a regional plan in the region of York, and that's useful. But what the shape of regional government even will be, I don't know. I quite believe there should be planning at a regional level.

I remember being taught at law school that the proper area for planning is the area next-largest from the area at which the planners have most recently failed. So you keep looking at bigger and bigger areas until you get to province-wide planning, and then you go back to neighbourhood planning. All of these are very important things to do, and it's important for the planners at each level to know what their responsibilities are. Certainly something like contaminated water is a very important consideration.

Mrs Barbara Fisher (Bruce): Welcome. It seems to me that through the course of the next few weeks we're going to be debating the question of "shall have regard to" or "shall be consistent with" with certain presenters. Do you feel there's a negative impact towards environmental concerns by reverting to the process that had been used for a very long time where it relates to "with regard to" as opposed to "be consistent with"?

Mr Jaffary: I think not in the slightest. The words "have regard to" came from, I believe, the British Town and Country Planning Act of 1947. That act calls for development plans, and actions are to have regard to development plans. But those plans do not have the force of law in the same way that an Ontario official plan does. We have official plans that have the force of law, and of course everyone must be totally consistent with them; you can't pass a bylaw or do a public work otherwise.

Provincial policy statements have caused a problem, because if you have a policy statement saying "protect agricultural land" and you have a policy statement saying "foster low-cost housing," and somebody proposes low-cost housing on agricultural land, what do you do?

What you do when you have a rule of "have regard to" is essentially leave it with the decision-maker, the local council or ultimately the municipal board, to weigh these things in context and come up with a proper solution.

If what you say is "be consistent with," and then if you say "always be consistent with the environmental one rather than anything else," you will find situations that the drafters of the policy statement never intended that will be standing in your way.

It is my belief that the phrase "have regard to" has been a workable phrase. I have watched both elected officials and Ontario Municipal Board members wrestle with it, and I can think of no case where I have seen important public policy swept out the door or badly disregarded. I think it gives the test that is the most workable test.

Mrs Fisher: My second question to that: You referred in your presentation a little bit to minor variances in committee of adjustment and then to council vis-à-vis the question of whether or not it should be appealed to the municipal board.

Mr Jaffary: Yes.

Mrs Fisher: Where there's not a member of council on the committee of adjustment, a decision can be made. It's done, and there's no appeal process. Where you go to a situation of council, you raise the flag of the possibility of the demand on time, if you will, at a council level, as opposed to the minimized demand of the full load of the OMB. Would you think it could be appropriate to have a committee of council, as opposed to all of council?

Mr Jaffary: There is a section in the Municipal Act that says that when councils are required to have a hearing, those can be held by a committee of council that then reports to the full council. I must say I haven't addressed whether this particular legislation ties in with this and gives that right, but I would find that a perfectly acceptable way for council to handle it.

I was speaking to one of the mediators on staff at the municipal board who was talking about going to smaller municipalities and how welcome it is, when he goes, that he says, "I'm from the municipal board" and everyone—ratepayers, councillors—think of him as an impartial person who can now resolve this matter. You do get into situations where the council is not viewed by some of those before it as being impartial, but I have to come down by saying either the council should conduct an appeal, and if the council is totally impartial, then you do a rezoning and go to the OMB, and I think doing it with a committee is quite acceptable, or it should go to something like the OMB. I think the OMB is all we really have.

Mr Gerretsen: In dealing with this whole issue of "being consistent with" and "having regard to," would you not agree, though, that the bottom line on it is that councils can basically disregard provincial policy? They can take a look at it and then disregard it and have their local situation in effect decide the issue.

Mr Jaffary: The question I then ask is, who's to stop us? If the local municipality decides to ignore provincial policy, what do you do about it? Do you go to the courts and try and argue before a judge that this is unlawful because they've disregarded policy? That is not usually a good thing to bring up. The courts are not much into these policy matters.

Or do you go to the municipal board, and who is it who goes? Almost all the situations I've run into that have been held up after the fact as being situations of bad planning, bad environmental planning, whatever, have been situations where everybody at the local level was in agreement and the matter sailed through without any objection. I venture that it will sail through without objection as easily with "be consistent with" as it will "having regard to." What you really want is some series of tests that will let anyone who finally comes to adjudicate on the matter decide it fairly, and I think that will almost always be a balancing case.

Mr Gerretsen: In dealing with the other issue, the committee of adjustment appeal to the OMB, would you agree with me that from a practical viewpoint the amount of time that it takes to get a minor variance matter heard by the OMB takes about as long as to have a zoning matter heard by the OMB? I'm not talking about the hearing time. I'm talking about the time between the appeal going in and the matter actually being heard by the OMB.

Mr Jaffary: That would be the case for a major one.

What the board has been doing in the last few years is scheduling a number of hearings at one-hour intervals on ones that it thinks can be resolved quickly, and the time limits are dropping quite dramatically. The board is able to get some of those on quite quickly, but delay time in getting to the board continues to be a difficulty. I wish there was something we could do about that, but I don't have an answer for you.

It's not so much the time getting to the board that's the difference with the rezoning; it's that if you apply to the municipality for a rezoning, you often go through a six—to eight-month process—in the city of Toronto, a minimum of a year—before the staff reports on your rezoning. If you apply to the committee of adjustment, you're before the committee in a matter of three weeks and it's that time you're saving.

Mr Gerretsen: You've raised a very interesting point there, not only with respect to the length of time that it takes the municipality to react to a development plan but also quite often the time that it takes the province to react to a subdivision plan. Would you agree with me that the time periods as proposed in the bill to a certain extent are almost immaterial and that what you're really dealing with is, from an administrative viewpoint, the length of time that a municipality or a ministry wants to deal with the matter, which the legislation itself really doesn't address, that it's more the administrative practices at the two levels?

Mr Jaffary: That's true and the legislation can really only give you a backstop.

Mr Gerretsen: Right.

Mr Jaffary: What an applicant will frequently do is make his application—subdivision, official plan change, whatever it is—give the municipality as much time as possible to consider the matter. Then, if you think you're going to get turned down or something else, you file your appeal.

Often, the original work of putting the material in has been done by the landowner without a lot of advice. By the time a lawyer or a professional planner comes into it and finds he's being turned down, he also finds that the original application was probably not put together wonderfully. What you have to do is start again, still knowing you're going to get turned down, but at least on the second application you can then file a proper appeal.

The time limits there can be important to you, but most of the delay is generally administrative delay in the amount of time it takes to process these things. Certainly a subdivision and a rezoning take a good deal more time than a minor variance.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Jaffary. We appreciate your taking time to make a presentation before the committee today.

SAVE THE OAK RIDGES MORAINÉ COALITION

The Chair: Our next group is Save the Oak Ridges Moraine. Everyone has their handout. Good morning. Welcome to the committee. We have 25 minutes to be disposed of as you see fit. It may be divided between presentation and questions.

Dr David McQueen: We're very grateful for this opportunity to appear before you. Let me identify the two of us. We may have some reinforcements coming in during the period of the presentation. I'll tell you about them if that happens.

My name is David McQueen. I'm an emeritus professor of economics at York University and co-chair of the STORM Coalition. STORM is an acronym for Save the Oak Ridges Moraine. On my left is Dorothy Izzard, past chair of STORM and a long-time member. She will be speaking to some of the points that we wish very briefly to raise with you. The matters that are before you, which basically are land use planning in Ontario, have been some of the most thoroughly studied and consulted-about matters in this province in the last several years.

We had, first of all, a major consideration of what planning is all about in the Watershed and Regeneration reports of the Crombie Royal Commission on the Future of the Toronto Waterfront. Then of course we had the Sewell commission's very extensive hearings, again with a great deal of public consultation. The Sewell report, as you know, led on to Bill 163, and there again, the hearings on that bill were protracted, detailed and afforded a maximum opportunity for everyone interested in land-use planning, including ordinary citizens and developers and municipalities, and anybody else who wished to be heard had ample opportunity to do so.

We are, I'm afraid, very struck by the speed with which this accumulation of very serious research and investigation and consultation into the Ontario planning situation is effectively overturned, much of it by Bill 20.

I'd just like, by way of a brief introduction here, to read you a few passages from the concluding section of the Crombie commission's report entitled Regeneration:

"We are responsible for the consequences of our own actions—to ourselves and to other people, to other generations, and to other species. The ethic that justifies moving in, using up, throwing away, and moving on is no longer acceptable...."

"Our current path is unsustainable. Both our economy and our environment are under stress; we are sacrificing the future to mask the reality of the present. It is the commission's view that, done effectively and imaginatively, the process of regeneration will not only contribute to the husbanding of our resources for economic recovery, but will also give us places where unique features are enhanced rather than homogenized and where 'development' and 'conservation' become kindred ideas that bring us together."

That's one of the key messages we'd like to convey to you this morning. We do not believe that there is a set, pitched battle between economic development and the environment. The difference is only between well-planned economic development, in relation to land use and environmental considerations, and badly planned.

This is one of the principal things we'd like to say to you: Consider again how much went into these previous reports on planning in Ontario and what justification there can be for overthrowing, as this bill does, largely by omission, by subtraction, so much of the work that has gone before.

A very key part of this revision is that the wording "be consistent with," which briefly resided in the Ontario Planning Act, has been removed and we're returned to a very ambiguous set of words—"shall have regard to." We hardly know, and I don't think anybody quite knows, what "having regard to" really means in terms of the actions which municipalities take in areas where there are provincial planning policies in effect.

The Sewell commission looked at this very closely and determined that you'd had regard to provincial policies if you hadn't simply dismissed them out of hand. "Be consistent with" is much more powerful. It means that the message which the province is sending through its policy statements is meaningful; it means that people have to do something about it. "Have regard to" has no force of that kind at all, so far as we can see.

On items 4, 5 and 6 of our brief, of which I believe you all have copies, I'd like to turn matters over to Dorothy Izzard.

Mrs Dorothy Izzard: The matter of municipalities no longer needing to do a comprehensive land use plan is very worrying. It means there is no broad framework in which to plan. Instead, planning can much more easily be done on an ad hoc, piecemeal basis, which is not planning at all.

We are also concerned that in item after item in Bill 20 the notices for appeals for almost any kind of public participation have been shortened, the number of days cut from 90 to 60, cut from 50 to 20 in item after item. This I know is meant to streamline a process, but is it eliminating the kind of public consultation which could make eventual decisions much more firm? Is it adding to the problem?

The public consultation as referred to in item 6—I'm going to get a little personal here. I've never been a member of any political party. I have at election time looked to leadership qualities, philosophy and local support. Therefore, I have studied before going to the polling booth and it's always been my impression that the Conservative Party, particularly provincially, has stood for defending property rights. I am a property owner, doing it the hard way. My husband and I, temporarily working in another province, invested in Ontario, purchased a home which is now 50 years old, paid off a mortgage. I am an ordinary homeowner and I am sure there are hundreds of thousands like me in Ontario.

Does this mean that according to section 44, my neighbour can apply for a severance and receive it without my having any official information? Does it mean that my neighbour on the other side can apply for a subdivision without any notice to me? Is this really protecting the ordinary citizen who does have property rights? Just a question.

While I'm asking questions, we have the provincial policy statement. It's been well distributed, but it says that it is intended that these policies come into effect when Bill 20, the Land Use Planning and Protection Act, is proclaimed. Is there to be public consultation? If so, will it make any difference if these are to come into effect? We are not speaking to them today. We were given no such direction. But we have grave concerns about a policy statement coming into effect the minute

Bill 20 is proclaimed. Perhaps that's a question you can answer for me.

Dr McQueen: I'll just pass on to item 7. As long as I've ever been concerned with planning matters in Ontario—this is not an exclusive statement, but there have been three ministries which have had built into their mandates major responsibilities in the area of land use planning. These are the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing, The Ministry of Natural Resources and the Ministry of Energy and Environment.

Under the single-window approach which is proposed in Bill 20 in the interests of streamlining processes—by the way, I would like to mention that we are by no means opposed to reducing the length and complexity and expense of many of the procedures that have been in effect in Ontario during this time. Nevertheless, it seems to us very odd that under Bill 20 only the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing will be allowed to make appeals to the Ontario Municipal Board on such matters. What's going to be the role of the Ministry of Natural Resources and the Ministry of the Environment and Energy? They do have mandates which impinge very clearly on matters of land use planning. How are they going to be inputting into this overall process?

I'd widen that. I'd say the question arises not just in relation to appeals to the OMB but in relation to the whole land use planning policy that is to be implemented. We would greatly appreciate some clarity on that point.

We do expect to be making further public representations about Bill 20 and the proposed provincial policy statements as time goes on. These things have come at us very rapidly. They are very long, they are very complex and we intend to use more time to get to the bottom of things and find out more of the detail of what is proposed. I'll hand you back to Dorothy at this point.

Mrs Izzard: If you thought I had created a diversion away from the issue of the environment, that is not so. Every land use decision in Ontario affects the environment, the economy and the lives of the people of Ontario.

The issue is not the economy versus the environment. The two go together. In fact, I think we are neglecting some great opportunities for ecotourism in Ontario. It is a matter of whether jobs and prosperity will flourish best in a context of good land use planning with a long-term plan, a comprehensive plan with a vision.

Dr McQueen: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman. We're open for questions and answers at this point, at your discretion.

Mr Doug Galt (Northumberland): Thank you for a most interesting presentation and also for having concern for a natural resource such as the Oak Ridges moraine. It's certainly a very impressive piece of geography here in the province of Ontario.

Let me first assure you that this government is very committed to the environment. We're bringing in some tough standards, for everything from landfill sites on, to ensure that the environment is protected, standards that were not in place with the previous government. We're not about to bend on protection of the environment.

I also agree with your comment that we do not have to have a battle between economic development and environmental protection. They must work together. They have to go together. I fully agree with you and indeed with your comment about ecotourism. I just noticed recently the top 10 countries in the world for tourism. Canada did not rate into those top 10, and with what we have here, we certainly should have been. It's an area we can take advantage of and not do any harm to our environment.

My first question relates to undue haste. There are 12 days of hearings. The hearings have been advertised and we're receiving every individual—group, person—who applied, as I understand it. I'm wondering how much more time we should be giving after we've advertised and we're going to listen to all groups. Do you have any comments on that?

Dr McQueen: I think one of the comments we have relates not just to time but also to the complexity and detail of this bill. Given that, more time certainly, and given also the fact that it goes in such an opposite direction in many respects from these massive, well-consulted-about documents put out by the Crombie commission and by the Sewell commission. I think just on the grounds of the mass of material that's here, a longer period of hearings would have been appropriate. I must say we appreciate the first part of your remarks, Mr Galt.

Mr Galt: Thank you. The second question relates to property rights, relates to good planning, investment for future generations. I'm concerned about wetlands. We're going to protect wetlands and also the adjoining lands around them.

There are a lot of land owners, particularly farmers, who are extremely upset with the legislation in Bill 163. They were never told, they were not consulted and the land was literally taken from them with no compensation. They feel it was very unfair of the government to do that when they had paid for these lands.

Yes, we should be protecting those lands; there's no question. Maybe somebody should be prepared to pay those farmers for those lands and take them over as a park or controlled lands by the province, a municipality or groups such as your own. How would you feel if you were a farmer owning some wetlands or adjoining lands and they were taken from you, if you were never told you have no future rights to those lands?

Dr McQueen: Mr Galt, are you saying it is possible in this province for the government to expropriate land and give no compensation whatsoever?

Mr Galt: That is what has happened, sir.

Dr McQueen: It has certainly not come to our notice. Dorothy, do you know—

Mr Galt: It has to the farmers, let me assure you.

Mrs Izzard: I have been, until very recently, owner of a farm in an area that does include grade 3—that's not the word—wetlands. There was absolutely no indication that would ever be taken from me.

Mr Galt: Not taken in ownership but taken in rights to use.

Mrs Izzard: That's something quite different.

Mr Galt: That was what I was referring to: rights to use, not by title.

Mr Gerretsen: Just following up on that last question, although you didn't raise it in your comments: When we're talking about the right to use property, if that's what Mr Galt is talking about, in effect, this act also is now telling homeowners that they can no longer use that property in order to build a second unit within their house. So there's definitely a total inconsistency by the government here as far as that's concerned. What's good for one is not necessarily good for the other. That seems to be the approach that's being taken here.

I'd like your opinion as to what you feel this notion of "having regard to" rather than "being consistent with" provincial policies means. The way I read that is that a municipality basically has to take it into account, but then if it totally wants to discount whatever the provincial policy states, it can do so without any impunity at all. Is that your understanding?

Dr McQueen: Nobody's studied this matter of the wording here more thoroughly than did the Sewell commission. I would just like to read you a brief excerpt of what they say in their final report about it:

"The current section 3"—that's before the revision—"states that all planning authorities 'shall have regard to policies.' Courts have interpreted this to mean only that a decision-making body cannot dismiss a policy out of hand. This status might be appropriate for very detailed policies, which include the ways in which policies will be implemented, but it is much too weak a status for policies that are more general in nature and do not include details of implementation."

There's further prose here which I think you might find interesting.

Certainly, in all the appeals and other things with which our organization was concerned, it was never clear to us, nor indeed to the Ontario Municipal Board, just what the hell it did mean.

Mr Gerretsen: Yes. I'd just like to make one very quick comment with respect to the subdivision that may be built on the property immediately next to you if the property is properly zoned without a public hearing. I think what's happened here is that the ministry, as it did in Bill 26, listened very carefully to what the Association of Municipalities of Ontario had to say over the last number of years and basically said, "Well, I guess we're going to give them what they want." But the one thing they totally forgot is the rights and the opinions of the general public out there, which may be quite a bit different from the opinions their own municipality may hold at any given time. Do you have any comments on that?

Dr McQueen: I not only agree with you, I have here the fact sheet—media kit issued by the Ministry of Municipal Affairs. One of the statements here is:

"Introduction: A coalition of municipal leaders, planners and developers, the people who actually use the land use planning system, say the current system hurts Ontario's competitive position." It goes on from there.

Mr Gerretsen: That's right.

Dr McQueen: This leaves us completely out.

Mr Gerretsen: About 99.9% of the rest of the people are the general public who are saddled with whatever development occurs as a result of that coalition.

Dr McQueen: I think everybody deserves a hearing on land use matters.

Mr Gerretsen: Yes. Thank you.

Mrs Izzard: Particularly when it's a local matter.

Ms Churley: Thank you very much. Before I move to my colleague, who I understand has a series of questions, I just want to answer a couple of your questions very quickly so you know the answers.

Public meeting requirements are removed for subdivision plans and the persons who will be entitled to notice that an application has been made with—be left to set out in regulation, which of course can be changed. So that there will be some regulations on that.

But overall public notice and appeals periods are reduced now to 20 days. That means of course that decision-makers will be less well informed as to community information and concerns. So overall there's just shortened time frames and less accessibility for the public, including you, as a land owner, to have a say in what happens.

Mrs Izzard: Yes.

Mr Hampton: I want to go to your point number 7, "Unclear roles of natural resource and Environment ministries." You both, I take it from your comments, have had some experience in terms of dealing with the Oak Ridges moraine.

Mrs Izzard: Yes, indeed.

Mr Hampton: What has been the role, historically, of the Ministry of Natural Resources and the Ministry of Environment and Energy staff? What do their biologists and ecologists do in terms of evaluating proposals and so on and so forth?

Mrs Izzard: We have counted on them very much in terms of assessment, in terms of hydrogeological studies, assessment of the vulnerability of sensitive lands, the identification of natural heritage areas that must be protected. We have found both ministries very supportive and MNR particularly, locally in each of its local offices, extremely helpful in regard to the Oak Ridges moraine.

Dr McQueen: I can speak to that too. I know on a couple of hassles we had the expertise provided by the field staff of MNR. It was absolutely indispensable. They have the scientific knowledge and it would be very difficult for us to find it anywhere else.

Mr Hampton: What are your worst fears then in number 7, if we go to a single-window approach where Municipal Affairs and Housing makes the final decision or has control over what happens?

Mrs Izzard: Simply, from my point of view first, that environmental aspects will be second rate, and will be somewhat neglected.

Dr McQueen: I don't think we're necessarily against the single-window approach as such, but we'd like to be much firmer on exactly how MNR and MOEE feed into the decision-making process here and I don't think that's clear at all at this stage.

Mr Hampton: and where MNR and MOEE have real concerns about the development proposal—do you have a suggestion as to what the process ought to be so that those concerns can be made public?

Dr McQueen: How would you like to leave that question with us? That's something we'd like to discuss and perhaps come back with some ideas about it. It needs some thinking through.

Mr Hampton: I might ask you to think about something else. MNR has about 4,500 employees now. Within the next 15 months, I understand 2,000 of those employees are to go out the door. Perhaps you could give us some indication of your views of how well equipped MNR would then be to protect some of these sensitive environmental, natural environment issues and how well equipped MNR and MOEE will be to even comment or do the analysis?

Mrs Izzard: Clearly, they would be operating at less than 50% of their present ability. We would be losing. Ontario would be losing and the environment would be losing.

The Chair: Thank you all and thank you for taking the time to make a presentation before us here today. We appreciate the opportunity to ask questions.

Members of the committee, that concludes the agenda items for this morning. This committee stands recessed until 1 o'clock.

The committee recessed from 1140 to 1302.

ONTARIO SEPARATE SCHOOL TRUSTEES' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Good afternoon, all. Continuing with our hearing on Bill 20, the planning act, the first group this afternoon is the Ontario Separate School Trustees' Association. Good afternoon, gentlemen.

Mr Patrick Meany: Mr Chairman and members of the standing committee, my name is Patrick Meany; I'm president of the Ontario Separate School Trustees' Association and a trustee of the Dufferin-Peel Roman Catholic Separate School Board. With me are Patrick Daly, our first vice-president, who is also a chairman of the Hamilton-Wentworth RCSS Board; Patrick Slack, our executive director; our deputy executive director, Earl McCabe; and Ed Gera, planner for one of our member boards, Hamilton-Wentworth.

The Ontario Separate School Trustees' Association represents 53 Roman Catholic separate school boards from all regions of Ontario. These boards provide Catholic education programs and services to nearly 600,000 students.

The Ontario Separate School Trustees' Association has reviewed the policy statements published by the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing and Bill 20. In the context of the Land Use Planning and Protection Act, the legislation known as Bill 20, OSSTA wishes to provide this committee with the following observations and recommendations.

Under the Education Act, RSO 1990, school boards have the authority to select and acquire by purchase, lease or expropriation school sites within their area of jurisdiction. School boards are required by the Education Act to "provide instruction and adequate accommodation during each school year for the pupils who have a right to attend a school under the jurisdiction of the board," subsection 170(6). This obligation is not a matter of discretion.

Each school board provides this ministry with a multi-year capital expenditure forecast which outlines the board's capital projects. Most boards rely heavily on ministry money to finance their capital projects. In most cases, funding of these projects comes after residential projects are built and occupied; in some cases, this may be more than 10 years later. Meanwhile, the board must accommodate new students in portables or bus them out of the area.

Policies and acts pertaining to land use have a direct impact on the operations of school boards. The proposed streamlining of the planning process would result in an increase in residential development that would only intensify this problem. School boards would be constantly trying to catch up, even more than now, to meet the pace of development. What is necessary is improved cooperation and coordination among the various ministries, local governments and school boards.

In the past, school boards in most jurisdictions have had input in various stages of the planning process—official plans, amendments, zoning bylaws and plans of subdivision. Urban and rural municipalities have consulted boards on matters that pertain to education. Cooperation between these two local elected bodies and their administrations has been to the community's benefit.

More recently, this pattern of consultation and cooperation has been broken. In some cases, school board have not been consulted on zoning bylaw amendments that increase the need for school facilities by increasing residential densities. In other cases, plans of subdivision have been approved over the objections of school boards. This occurs because the existing act makes reference only to "school sites" and ignores the fact that educational facilities will not be constructed for a number of years. The school servicing the area quickly becomes overcrowded and is unable to accommodate the additional pupils.

This is a disturbing trend which must be stopped. What accounts for the trend? Part of the explanation is in the appetite for land development by municipalities. The other part of the explanation is found in the fact that the Planning Act has relatively few references to educational matters. For example, an official plan must have regard "to the equitable distribution of educational, health and other social facilities." An official plan must have regard "to relevant social, economic and environmental matters." It is clear that the legislation intends the provision of education to be part of the planning process.

Since 1977, the Planning Act has been reviewed by two commissions and the present Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing. Both commissions have expressed the need for the Planning Act to address "issues of an educational nature," in particular, sites and school facilities. We have given some detail on this on pages 3 and 4 of our brief, with relevant quotations, including one from the government of Ontario, agreeing with the recommendations of the Planning Act Review Committee.

There exist provisions in the Planning Act for the dedication of land for parks, 5% or cash in lieu, and for widening of highways. Bill 20 will allow for the conveyance of land for public transit rights of way, in clause 24(2)(d)—all of this at no cost to the municipality or provincial agencies.

School boards, however, are treated differently. School sites are designated at the official plan stage—secondary plans. The municipality, by designating land for school purposes, has fulfilled the requirements of the Planning Act and proceeds to approve plans of subdivision in the area. Often, the land has not been purchased by the school board because the Ministry of Education and Training has not approved the purchase of land nor the construction of a facility to accommodate the growth. The result is that the existing facilities are overcrowded, with play areas occupied by portable classrooms. As more areas are developed, the problem increases. Elementary school pupils are transported, at great expense to the board—and the taxpayer, of course—to schools removed from the neighbourhood where the children reside. It is worthy of note, and a concern, that some students living in urban areas have received their total elementary education in a facility located miles away from their homes.

The problem is twofold:

(a) The approving authority approves plans of subdivision based only on the fact that land has been designated for school purposes. The act is silent regarding the adequacy of school facilities.

(b) The Ministry of Education and Training has not allocated funds to purchase the land and construct a school to service the area.

The only direct reference to school boards in the existing act occurs in section 51, which provides:

"In considering a draft plan of subdivision, regard shall be had, among other matters, to the health, safety, convenience and welfare of the present and future inhabitants of the local municipalities and to the following,

"(a) the effect of development of the proposed subdivision on matters of provincial interest as referred to in section 2;

"(b) whether the proposed subdivision is premature or in the public interest;...

"(j) The adequacy of school sites."

Note that clauses (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), (i) and (k) do not apply to school boards.

The flaw in the current approach to land use planning is that the process concentrates on the provision of hard services, such as water, storm and sanitary sewers, roads etc. When hard services are available, development usually proceeds. The provision of soft or human services, such as education facilities, are not usually given the same weight.

The position of the Ontario Separate School Trustees' Association is that land development is premature where social infrastructure—the soft services—is not available.

I would ask Mr Daly to continue from here.

Mr Patrick Daly: This submission summarizes the changes to the act and provincial policies. The reform—Bill 20—proposes to streamline the approval process for official plans, their amendments, zoning bylaws and plans of subdivision. In certain cases the consultation period is reduced from 180 days to 90 days, as outlined in subsections 22(8), (9) and (10). The decision regarding plans of subdivision can also be made simultaneously with the decisions regarding official plan amendments.

This streamlining of the process will make it more difficult for school boards to respond. School boards will not have sufficient time to review the application and comment on it. We go on to explain reasons for that.

Local municipalities must also take into account the concerns of school boards in approving official plans and their amendments, plans of subdivision and zoning bylaws. Our brief outlines how the interests of school boards can be safeguarded through clear and concise provincial policies and changes to Bill 20.

Regarding consultation, the existing act and Bill 20 give the approving authorities the power to consult with the public bodies that they feel may have an interest in the application. They are therefore an integral part of the planning process. Local school boards are required by law to provide education to students generated from new development or redevelopment, so it is also logical that any planning issues or proposals affecting residents or future residents of an area require their input.

Municipalities circulate official plans and their amendments, zoning bylaws and plans of subdivision to their departments, that is, traffic, roads, building, engineering, parks and recreation. It should also be mandatory that school boards be consulted on all planning matters. It is through this process that school boards will have the necessary input.

Therefore, OSSTA recommends that the following amendments to the sections of the Planning Act and Bill 20 be revised to require that school boards be consulted on all planning issues; namely, subsections 17(21) and (34), subsection 34(15) and subsection 51(23).

When blocks of land are developed or redeveloped, school boards are not necessarily asked for comments. Traditionally, school boards have never been consulted regarding a development under site plan control. However, certain design changes to the layout of the complex could assist school boards in providing better and safer service to the children of ratepayers. We go on in our brief to outline one specific example of a town house development where, had school boards been consulted, it would have been a much safer transportation means for students and would have made the process much simpler.

In this regard, therefore, OSSTA recommends that school boards be consulted on all residential developments under site plan control.

When reviewing plans of subdivision, the approving authority should take into account the adequacy of school sites and facilities. As interpreted by some authorities, the current Planning Act provides that where land is designated for a school site, the requirements of the act have been met. The plans of subdivision are then approved and development proceeds. What must be considered, however, is whether the school board owns the land or whether a neighbourhood school will be constructed and operational when the area is completely developed.

School boards have argued that the availability of school sites and facilities should be taken into account when reviewing plans. The approving authority has the power to stage developments so that growth is orderly and controlled. However, local municipalities do not consider the availability of school facilities when developing their staging plans since they are of the opinion that they have no real legislative obligation to do so.

The focal point of urban neighbourhood plans is the elementary school and parkland. The act has made provision for parklands to be dedicated or cash-in-lieu payments to be made by the applicant as a condition of subdivision approval. Development cannot proceed until that condition has been met. School boards do not have such power, but in lieu of this authority the adequacy of facilities as well as sites should be a part of the condition when reviewing a plan of subdivision.

If the existing school facilities are inadequate or do not exist, a review of the plan of subdivision should take into account the ability of the local school board to provide the necessary educational services.

When former commercial or industrial areas are redeveloped for residential use, that is, intensification, existing schools which service the area could experience overcrowding. Although the site may be adequate, the facilities might require upgrading and expansion in order to accommodate the growth from the redevelopment.

OSSTA therefore recommends that clause 51(24)(j) of the Planning Act be amended to add the words "and facilities" after the phrase "the adequacy of school sites."

Subsection 51.1(4), determination of value: Although land is designated for school purposes at the secondary plan stage, the Ministry of Education and Training will only fund site purchases after a significant portion of the neighbourhood is developed. The price paid by school boards has ranged from market value to highest and best use. It is not in the public interest for a developer to use the planning process to upzone a required school site and create value which then must be purchased by a school board at the newly inflated price. If a formula for the purchase of school land was part of the act, then the purchase of property would be made easier for all parties. The province, which as you know funds a majority of the purchases, would reduce its costs by paying a more equitable price for the land.

In this regard our association recommends that where a school board acquires the land zoned for school use, notwithstanding the provisions of any other act, it is entitled to acquire the land at its value determined as of the day before the day of the draft approval of the plan of subdivision or as of the day before the day of the passing of the bylaw, as the case may be.

The 5% dedication of land for parks or cash in lieu is based upon the total area of the plan of subdivision. It does not take into account the possibility that a portion of the plan could be designated for school purposes. The act is unclear as to whether or not lands designated for public use should be included in the calculations for the 5% dedication or the cash. Clarification is required so that applicants, public bodies and municipalities are aware of how the calculations are done.

Mr Meany: Thank you, Patrick. That concludes our formal presentation, and we are prepared to try to answer questions.

Mr Sean G. Conway (Renfrew North): Just two quick questions. First, on page 8 of your submission, Mr Meany and colleagues, do I take it that you really mean to suggest there that before any plan of subdivision is finally approved, there now ought to be some serious consideration of the adequacy of existing school facilities in the immediate area affected?

Mr Meany: The intensification part?

Mr Conway: That's right.

Mr Meany: Yes. There may be something there already, but it may not be adequate because of the additional numbers coming in.

Mr Conway: In areas of suburban growth is it your view that the same ought to apply there?

Mr Meany: Yes, because it's no good having land there, even if you could buy it, if you haven't got a building on it. As you know, boards don't always have the money to buy that—our boards especially.

Mr Conway: You realize that under the existing capital plan, that that recommendation is mischievous, to say the least, where the interests of the Ontario Ministry of Finance are concerned.

Mr Meany: You're using the word "mischievous" in quotes, I take it?

Mr Conway: Mm-hmm.

Mr Meany: It sounds pretty good to me, but it's certain we're for our own interests and for the interests of children. We have been worried, indeed way back, that children are moving into an area—I've done this myself with young children, and that's a long time ago—under the assumption that in an orderly, civilized country there would be a school, that education is as important as, say, the park. They're both important, but it's at least as important as the park. We're dealing with human beings. You go in there and, as I found, there wasn't a school. You're looking for a bus and sometimes it's hard to get buses too, and the rest of it is just a mess.

Mr Conway: We had a distinguished member of the upper Canadian bar here this morning, Mr Jaffary by name, quite knowledgeable in not only matters of municipal law but of municipal politics. In his letter to the committee, at the bottom of page 3, he stated that school boards are almost as good as regional municipalities in their indifference to the time pressures that developers often face in bringing a plan of subdivision to some kind of fruition. Do you feel the school boards with which you have some acquaintance are guilty of the charge?

Mr Meany: Not guilty, my lord. I think we all know that school boards move as quickly as they can. They have planners. Mr Gera can answer anything that's too complicated or technical for me, but we have good planners and we act in cooperation as much as possible with the municipality and the sister board. We know in advance what we're likely to have in the way of kids. The variation that actually occurs is not significant. Moving as fast as we can but without cooperation from those whose interests are otherwise, it's impossible to get the service.

Ms Churley: Thank you very much for your presentation. It's extremely helpful. I know when I sat on Toronto city council, I experienced at first hand what you're talking about. In our haste sometimes, particularly to develop good development, affordable housing, our school board was often before us: "Now, slow down. There's no plan for a school in this location." So I understand precisely what you're talking about and how on many occasions, in that haste, the school board and the needs of the children and schools are forgotten.

There are a couple of areas that you have quite clearly indicated are problematic for school boards. I'd like to talk about the one on page 6 of your document, where you express concern about time frame. It's my understanding that what this bill will do is restrict public involvement overall. For instance, the public notice and appeal periods are reduced to 20 days for notice of an official plan and for filing an appeal of an approval decision. If you add in weekends and perhaps slow postal service and maybe holidays sometimes that come in there, people could be left with literally a couple of weeks to review what is often a very complex document and to prepare submissions.

I think you mentioned government review periods are shortened. Review and approval of an official plan is now 90 days instead of the 150 days in Bill 163, which was shortened from the previous bill. The public meeting requirements are removed for a subdivision plan, and in regard to the persons who will be entitled to notice that an application has been made, that will be left to regulation, which can be changed frequently.

So I have some real concerns about public consultation here. I'm wondering—you proposed a very specific amendment here—if you could comment a little further on the implications to you if that time frame is shortened. What would happen?

Mr Meany: As far as the details of shortening the period are concerned, if we needed that, Mr Gera would be glad to do it because he has to wrestle with that. But, in general, what's happening is that in the pursuit of one public good we're doing public harm with this act in another area. That sums it up and we're asking that the committee make appropriate recommendations that would take into account the public good in the matter of children and with education as well.

Ms Churley: I can assure you that we will be looking to make some amendments in that area, which I hope the government party will accept. Thank you again for coming down. You can count on my support in these areas that you brought up today.

Mr Trevor Pettit (Hamilton Mountain): Good afternoon, gentlemen. You mentioned earlier about the streamlining, how it will affect you. But on the whole do you agree or not agree that the new time lines will expedite the approval system even further?

Mr Meany: This is what I meant by pursuing one public good, but it should be done in a coordinated manner. It's like an army moving forward to attack something and leaving the artillery behind. The whole army will fail. If you don't have education, if you don't have kids properly educated and a place to educate them, it's a hurt to society as a whole. It's not really a political matter. I hope that the committee will see fit to make the necessary amendments to make the thing work right.

Mr Pettit: So you agree that it will expedite the system further.

Mr Meany: It will expedite part.

Mr Pettit: It's just that it'll be a little bit too quick for the boards themselves.

Mr Meany: A long bit too quick.

Mr Pettit: Is there any way that the boards themselves can streamline their system?

Mr Meany: Our systems are streamlined, as I explained in answering Ms Churley. But we have operate within a framework of legislation that requires us to deal with the municipality and with the various ministries, and that framework is so set up that it's impossible to go any faster than we're doing now.

Mr Hardeman: In your presentation you refer to the fact that we should not only address the need for the school site but the adequacy of the school in the area where development would be approved. Recognizing the problem we have with the development charges and whether they should or should not be allowed to apply to the school board, how were you proposing to deal with the issue of if the school site or the school facility was not adequate in the area, should we prohibit the development or should we look at other means of funding a school site?

Mr Daly: I'm not so sure that we're suggesting prohibiting, although in some cases that might be appropriate. What we're saying is that there has to be a better staging of the development, taking into consideration the adequacy of sites and facilities, not let the entire development proceed at once where there are no school facilities. If there was proper consultation with boards and the development were to be staged in over a reasonable period of time, then perhaps that would solve the issue. In some cases, if the ministry were not forthcoming with funds to build the necessary schools, it might be necessary to delay the development.

The Chair: Thank you very much, gentlemen. We appreciate your taking the time to come down before us this afternoon and make your presentation.

Has everyone noticed there is a gap in our agenda this afternoon, a group that cancelled at the last minute? I'm wondering whether the presenter scheduled to appear after that, Susan Smith, by any chance is in attendance yet. Seeing no indication, unless anyone has any other suggestions, shall we take a recess?

We'll take a brief recess until 1:50, at which time we'll hear from Ms Smith and subsequent presenters.

The committee recessed from 1329 to 1349.

SUSAN SMITH

The Chair: Seeing a quorum, we shall reconvene. Our next presenter is Susan Smith. Good afternoon.

Ms Susan Smith: Good afternoon. I have a cold, so please bear with me; I'll speak as loudly as I can.

I thank the clerk of the standing committee on resources development and the committee members for the opportunity to speak with you about Bill 20 and the most grave concerns I have about the bill and draft omnibus Provincial Policy Statement to replace what currently exists.

The majority government has been afforded the right to govern until early fall in the year 2000. However resilient the Ontario economy has been as experienced in my lifetime over the past 40 years, the changes this government is proposing to make to the Planning Act, as amended by the 35th Legislative Assembly at the end of 1994, seriously begs questions of this government's good faith to even aspire to attempt the responsible management of Ontario's economy.

I will address process, some specifics of Bill 20, and some specifics about the proposed policy statement.

I appreciate that the process here today permits this committee, with all the substitutions and interested people, to have due regard to what is presented to you by myself and others, that is, that you shall "look at" the information brought forward in this public consultation. That may be all one can expect of this process, but I'm here to tell you that I expect a great deal more. It's not acceptable to mirror the process at the local level, with proposed changes to no longer require a municipality's official plan to be consistent with provincial policy interests as set out in provincial policy statements.

I feel you ought to address the limitations inherent in the committee's title, as it is limiting to not make articulate distinction between renewable and non-renewable resource. Managing non-renewable resource is the greatest challenge facing anyone who manages Ontario's economy.

The goal of "promoting economic growth," you will be told by many, is a laudable one. "Boosting economic growth to create jobs" does not sound to have a vulnerable or questionable premise. The reason I quote the explicit language used in the government's communiqué press release of November 29, 1995, when Mr Eves pronounced the 1995 Fiscal and Economic Statement, is to demonstrate where the contradictions internal to the press release or "spin" on the political document seriously undermine your efforts.

Erik Peters, the Provincial Auditor, wrote of Bill 163: "Recent changes to the Planning Act contained in Bill 163 established specific roles and responsibilities for the province and municipalities, helping to eliminate the inconsistencies and unnecessary duplication in planning decisions."

On November 29, 1995, Eves announced the government is "adopting a single set of financial reporting standards, standards set by PSAAB," but then you are giving municipalities—and I quote again from the government's document—"more flexibility" as well as "fewer rules" by combining northern transportation assistance, municipal roads and unconditional grants into a single block fund. This appears to contradict the position that the government party took in opposition with respect to separating the accounting of capital dollars from strictly operating funds transferred to the municipality partners. Why and how do you need to keep a second set of books?

The government's zeal to pass Bill 26 expressed an enthusiasm to delete what is now in place in policy of provincial interest. That was articulated extremely well when it accompanied Bill 163. Commissioner Eva Ligeti voiced realistic dismay about the Ministry of Finance having regulatory exemption from the Environmental Bill of Rights legislation and from the registry. We already know this has happened. As well, it makes no sense to remove funding for energy standards development programming, which is directed at conservation and monitoring measures. It is irresponsible to not require permits in lands subject to the Public Lands Act.

I have briefly sketched the context, Bill 26, in which I examined Bill 20—very briefly.

Your process contrasts sharply with the almost four-year public consultation process started by the previous government in 1991 in order to refurbish the Planning Act. Your couple of weeks' consultation contrasts with years of repeated public input, including August 1994, when the municipality of London, as well as other members of the region's public, informed the standing committee examining Bill 163 about their experiences to that date with the local Vision 96 process to proactively engage in creating a new official plan.

I approach this Bill 20 and policy statement as one who has run for office in a large urban municipality, which acquired, through Bill 75, a much larger footprint. I refer you to the page at the back showing the "footprint" in the new ward boundaries, which do not recognize natural features for communities of interest. That's what I point out, that the footprint's significance is by no means one-dimensional. London has underground water flow all over the entire region, so any significant geomorphological feature, like a moraine, has dramatic impact—also on the ability to service and to retrofit. For instance, London cannot be retrofitted with a subway for transit support.

The London experience is of substantial significance to your deliberations, which is why I am mystified about why London was not chosen to be scheduled for an earlier date on your provincial tour. The London hearing is the day immediately preceding your first of two days set aside for clause-by-clause amendments. The day you do the amendments is the day that all members of the committee will have access to what's presented.

I can only hope that these 24 to 48 hours will be enough time for you to understand how this Bill 20 and its many inadequacies, not the very least of which is the policy statement, are sabotaging the potential of a sterling and visionary public participation paradigm called Vision 96. This public consultation process came about due to the previous Minister of Municipal Affairs' creative approach, the most significant aspect of which was the priority ordering of the goals and objectives to be attained by the Vision 96 process, to culminate in an official plan for the enlarged upper-tier municipality. These objectives and goals are contained in the August 3, 1993, schedule of a regulation set out by the minister for Bill 75. I'm sorry I don't have a copy appended; it would inform your understanding of Bill 163. Significant issues informing the economics of urban and rural form were addressed in the objectives, as were issues pertaining to the regional economy.

The London region is surrounded by great non-renewable resource of first-class soil on remaining farm land. There is currently an official plan amendment before the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing—and that's also appended in your document—for a development proposal that "eclipses in size any other development proposal in that community over the last six years." As of January 26, 1996, the municipal planning official in the municipality feels the proponent is caught in a "legislative net" designed more for regional municipalities such as Toronto and Ottawa than small cities. However, the municipal official's read on this is: "The development will go through. It's only common sense that it will go through."

The proponent is an experienced developer who has developed more than 10 large neighbourhoods in the community in the last 30 years, who feels the community's economic outlook still looks promising. Others in the community, frankly, take note of the proponent's confidence and enthusiasm as there was a layoff from two factories involving more than 500 full-time employees the same day the proponent announced her $140-million, 515-lot residential development project. The development totals 163 acres on two sites. One site abuts one of her earlier neighbourhood developments, and the other abuts the city limits with a right-of-way access to the land under cultivation.

Building could be completed in five years, according to the planner-consultant. I'll add that the planner-consultant is someone who can't practice a trade in London at the moment because there are certain controls with respect to the community deciding land uses for the future, at least 20 years.

The Home Builders' Association is on record that the project will create and keep numerous jobs as the local housing market is, in their subjective opinion, "good."

As she has had family members farming the land, she's very confident about getting the necessary proposals and is certain the land will be farmed until the homes are built. The province's approval is needed to make changes making the land residential. If it may only be a temporary catch that the province's approval is needed, and only a temporary catch that these two sites are prime agricultural land, I am completely confident to therefore ask you to amend the definitions section of the policy statement to remove from the definition of the word "development," "or works subject to the Drainage Act." I'm asking you to consider as a committee removing that.

I'm supportive of two-unit residential development receiving favoured or priority consideration over family homes. This tool to make most forms of infrastructure cost-effective and efficient—such as transit, some utilities, and I would also add perhaps schools—ought not be deleted from the much touted and downloaded toolbox. Considerable technical time was spent by the Alternative Development Standards Advisory Committee to devise and prepare guidelines that all community public and private stakeholders found acceptable.

As a stakeholder who reported to the Ontario Environment Network, I was appointed to a Ministry of Municipal Affairs and a Ministry of Housing committee which examined alternative development standards. This committee met throughout 1993 and 1994 and produced a guidelines document by March 1995, which was presented to the interministerial committee.

Municipal utilities and provincial associations of infrastructure providers, as well as the Urban Development Institute and the Ontario Home Builders' Association, were represented on this committee. I bring this to your attention to advise anecdotally of an interest expressed during development standards discussions of broader issues of land use planning with respect to land dedication for institutional uses in plans of subdivision submitted for approvals. Therefore, the relevance is more applicable to those proposed capital projects—for instance, in London, for the public board of education for new schools—scheduled for completion dates of 2001 through 2003 and beyond. There are two developments there known as Summerside and Killaly.

There were open discussions about institutional land dedications and the “opportunity” for “creative” ecology education projects like artificial wetlands to make use of the wet spots that are inappropriate for drainage even for residential purposes. The inclusion of areas prone to even conservative water retention are not at all appropriate for a school campus accommodating junior panel students. There is a school campus in the St Thomas, Elgin separate school board, originally in Yarmouth county, that had been agricultural land and that had been drained with the use of a Drainage Act application where water retention ponding was examined two years ago by members of the Kettle Creek Conservation Authority. It was observed that opportunities for creative orientation activities with first-year students, as well as opportunities for training competitive rowing teams, may be future advantages of these structures on school campuses.

Now some quick comments on the policy statement itself, as it was circulated to me for written input, from the customer services representative from the minister's office at 777 Bay Street, on the 17th floor.

Under section III, Policies, section 1, “Efficient, cost-effective development—developing strong communities,” in the section “In areas where growth is to occur: 1.1.1...promoted by” I would like you to amend (b) by adding the word “organized,” so it would read “strengthening the role of organized rural areas as the focus of growth for rural, resource, and resource-based recreational activities.”

I would like all of section 1.1.1(c) removed.

I would like 1.1.1(e) amended so that you remove the last line, which reads “based on housing market areas; and”.

In section 1.1.2, “Land requirements will be based on a range of land uses and densities which,” in part (a) I would like to replace the word “avoid” with “prohibit.” I would like 1.1.2(e) removed.

In section 2, Resources, 2.1, Agricultural Policies, I would like you to remove 2.1.1, 2.1.2, 2.1.3 and 2.1.5.

I will also comment that intervenor funding must be restored and natural heritage protection needs to be returned to the protection of provincial interest in the Provincial Policy Statement, and what is suggested through the process of Bill 20 and the attending statement is not acceptable.

In the definitions section of the policy statement, in “residential infilling” I don't like the 100-metre separation. I don't think it should be that far apart and I'm suggesting that you change it. I am not prepared to suggest more than a 25% reduction, but I am suggesting that you change that to never exceed 75 metres.

Under “redevelopment,” I have concerns that it only refers to residential development. In the city of London, we have a public secondary school, Beal Secondary School, which is redeveloping on land. The infrastructure that's in place that it makes use of is extremely valuable, and it doesn't make sense to exclude other kinds of development other than residential from the definition of “redevelopment.”

With respect to “natural heritage features and areas,” I'm questioning why you want to qualify “wetlands” with “significant.” The city of London's history is that 20,000 years ago it was under 2,000 feet of water. Two transcontinental glaciers that were coming across the continent very slowly bumped into each other in London and left moraines, left riverine corridors and vistas that have been part of human heritage history for a good period of time. Five hundred years ago, the Neutral Indians were living in a temperate climate at the far north end of the Carolinian ecosystem that was a veritable garden of Eden—and a forest of Eden. I feel any wetland is significant in this area.

London can never be retrofitted with public transit, like a subway, to make it cost-efficient. It has to have the land that is left planned extremely carefully. The extensive loss of wetland in southern Ontario is exactly that. Any wetland is significant, and I would like the word “significant” as a qualifier removed from that part of the definition.

In the “multi-modal transportation system” definition, I would like the wording changed so it actually integrates the components in the most sustainable configuration, not simply to list them. It's not even alphabetical; I have no idea why the listing was like that.

Under “established standards and procedures,” under “access standard,” I would like you just to reverse the order so that it reads “ensure safe pedestrian and vehicular movement,” not “vehicular and pedestrian.”

Under the definition of “development,” again, remove references to “works subject to the Drainage Act.”

As I travelled along one form of infrastructure on the Bloor line to get here today, I imagined what David Crombie's vision for enhancing and restoring significant and natural features in the Don Valley could have been.

I do not support the authority of the minister to restructure municipalities and issue regulations to inform any restructuring on the basis of this draft policy statement. The statement has no merit for replacing policy amendments put in place under Bill 163.

Incompetent planning over time expands exponentially the costs to taxpayers. The absence of competent planning for rural Ontario is evidenced in what this statement proposes in the bill for wayside pits and quarries policy, with the possible consequence of destabilizing or even polluting potential rechargeable groundwater supply. What kind of genius wants to build and develop in an area with no potable water supply? I guess someone determined to be enterprising with other people's money.

I grieve the implications and future results of these retrograde changes proposed. By comparison, it is merely discouraging to think of all the expertise, time and energy from public consultation—and you'll hear about that from the person who follows me—that is wasted by this Bill 20. Badly planned development is bad for sustained security, bad for the environment, bad for communities, bad for individuals and bad for the economy.

My greatest concern is reserved for changes proposed to the Development Charges Act to seriously restrict the levels of service provision developers can be asked to contribute. Under the proposed changes, they won't be required to pay their fair share. It's absurd for a government whose hallmark is claimed to be competent public fiscal management to propose changes that will lead to urban sprawl and unsustainable rural settlement—precisely the types of development that will require expensive and unnecessary public infrastructure costs. Bill 20 has the potential to seriously impair a municipality's ability to effectively manage local costs.

With the devolution, empowerment or disentanglement of services on an almost daily basis—I exaggerate; not a daily basis, but perhaps a weekly basis—how prescient could I have been to request a new development charges bylaw for London for 1995—I was requesting it in 1994—to reflect the existence of the London airport, knowing it would be devolved to the municipal authorities' shared responsibility. I hear David Collette, the Minister of National Defence, is considering proposing the same for armoureds in our communities across the nation. There's nothing in this to give us the tools to be able to pay for what we have to manage in our communities.

This policy statement seriously risks longer-term prosperity by compromising non-renewable resources, and I cannot fathom the rationale. I do not accept or understand the government jettisoning so much articulate and considered policy and at the same time stepping so far back from protecting provincial financial interests. I will be throwing my support behind any organization or coalition of organizations that advocates skilled management of the Ontario economy through competent planning.

I thank you very much for your time.

Mr Hampton: It's obvious when you read through the bill and when you read the policy statements that will be appended that what is happening here is not minor fine-tuning; there's some pretty drastic stuff happening. You obviously participated in the four-year consultation period and so on that happened with the previous bill, Bill 163. Generally, what do you think this will do to planning, especially planning outside the greater Toronto area?

Ms Smith: I can be corrected by other people, but my reading of this is that what happens here is that it's very open-ended and interpretive. What's being downloaded is—it's not a shopping list; it's pick or choose. The opportunity is there for the municipality to not use what was previously in place but to pick another way of doing it. I don't think the opportunity should be there for municipalities to choose another way of doing this.

The Drainage Act—it doesn't take a genius to find farm land, and we're really picking the wrong people to say that these are somebody's livelihood and their financial future. It doesn't take a genius to find farm land. You know, it's already graded; it's drained; it's graded. That's the easiest route to development, and it doesn't make sense. It's not cost-efficient for the public.

Mr Smith: Thank you for your presentation. I found it very technical, and I think it has particular application to the policy statement debate we'll probably have throughout the next three weeks.

As somebody who represents a predominantly rural riding, I'm most interested in your suggestion that a number of the subsections in the resources sections be removed. I wonder if you can share with the committee in a little broader context your rationale for removing those agricultural policies.

Ms Smith: My rationale is because what is in place now is acceptable, and this isn't acceptable. It's too interpretive. I think farm land should be treated as industrial land. Farm land should be industrial land. A farm retirement lot—well, maybe, but maybe not. People who are in a position to be doing that often don't occupy the same residential housing 12 months of the year. These don't make any sense to me. What particularly doesn't make sense is that in 2.1.3, you articulate a planning horizon of no more than 20 years. That's nuts. I don't mean you personally. But this policy doesn't make sense. A planning horizon for farm land of 20 years? I don't understand that.

Mr Smith: For all those individuals who are routinely involved in providing land use planning for agricultural or predominantly agricultural communities, maybe you can share with us how you might improve upon a policy framework to provide some guidance.

Ms Smith: I think that's done by the conservation authorities. Is that unacceptable?

Mr Pat Hoy (Essex-Kent): You've spent a bit of time on agriculture, and I have some concerns about that as well. In the Provincial Policy Statement on page 3, item (g) reads, "planning so that sensitive land uses and major facilities such as airports, transportation corridors," and they go on to name some other aspects, but agriculture is not specifically named there. Do you think it should be added into that section?

Ms Smith: Frankly, my perspective for a long time has been that agriculture pre-existing should be recognized as a pre-existing land use, so any other subsequent use should have to accommodate the fact that it's technically an industrial use. So I agree with that. The way I would suggest amending (g) is—I don't like the words "sensitive land use." I don't find "sensitive" is all that articulate about the issues that are being specifically addressed. It's not that the land itself is necessarily sensitive. It might be polluted. So it's a sensitivity. I think it's the issue of compatibilities, contiguous functions, and functions that don't work together at all. Obviously I would add agriculture if you are recognizing sewage treatment facilities or waste management systems and aggregate activities. As a pre-existing land use, if you're going to recognize aggregate, free the resource, sterilize the land and give that a priority, then obviously I feel agriculture should fall into that category. Have I come close to answering the question?

Mr Hoy: That's fine, thank you.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Smith, for taking the time to come and make a presentation before us today.

JOHN SEWELL

The Chair: Our next presenter is John Sewell. Good afternoon, Mr Sewell. At the risk of repeating myself, you have 25 minutes to dispose of as you see fit.

Mr John Sewell: I have a few remarks to make which I hope will only take 10 or 15 minutes so that we have a bit of a chance to have some discussion.

As you may know, I was the chair of the Commission on Planning and Development Reform in Ontario that in fact established the existing planning legislation, so I have something of a personal interest in the kinds of things that are found in Bill 20. I want to restrict my remarks to just one set of concerns in Bill 20 that I think are the most serious that should be addressed, and they're the ones that have to do with the whole practice of planning in Ontario. I think there are four proposals in the bill that seriously undermine the practice of planning in Ontario and I'm hoping you would agree to change them.

The first one is the change in respect to the treatment of policy. As you know, the existing words say that decisions will "be consistent with" provincial policy, and that means decisions by municipalities, by the Ontario Municipal Board, and the change is to say that decisions will "have regard to" policy. This is a matter our commission dealt with for a long time. We worried about that. What should the words be? What should the relationship be between decisions that municipalities make and provincial policy?

We thought the key there was trying to ensure some degree of certainty so that people who were making applications, such as developers, would have some certainty how their application was going to be dealt with. If you had a policy that said development would not happen within particular significant natural features but it could happen in other places, the developer would know this was not a significant natural feature and therefore he's going to be fine to propose a development here, whereas if you have a policy that says it's just going to have regard to it, it means there is no certainty for the developer, because our interpretation of the words, looking at legal precedents, says "have regard to" means this: "Oh, this is the policy? Thanks, very much. We've seen it. Okay, now let's get on with our decision."

Changing the words back to "have regard to" is a real step towards uncertainty in the planning process and we think that's very bad. It's particularly bad for the 80% of municipalities in Ontario with a population of less than 5,000 and not having the resources to do an awful lot of planning. We think that's a very bad change and it does not help in terms of creating good planning for anyone in Ontario. I'll come back to that because I have an example, a real-life example that I'd like to tell you about once I've made my four points.

The second change we think is a real step away from good planning in Ontario is that relating to what should be in official plans. Subsection 8(1) of the bill deletes any requirement for the minister to set down regulations as to what will be in an official plan. This is a matter of great concern to a lot of people, not only to the development industry but to citizens in the environmental movement, because they want to have some sense that an official plan is going to be comprehensive enough to actually address the big problems, because if the official plan doesn't address those big problems, they're going to be addressed in every single application that comes through.

My feeling is that the minister should set down the requirements of what an official plan should address to ensure that the council has addressed the big questions so people will know how they're resolved. Not resolving them means a municipality can have anything it wants in an official plan or nothing in an official plan, and again that really harms people who are trying to get things done in municipalities. There is no certainty. What do you do? How does the municipality stand on this? You don't know. We think that's a change that should not be made. It will not help anyone not to have some statement that says, "Here are the issues that should be addressed in an official plan." Removing that requirement from the bill is, in my view, a real step backward.

I might say just on that point there is a comparable kind of change I think made in section 4 of the bill, but I should point out the language is gobbledegook. You really should get somebody to read the bill. It does not make sense right now. You can't tell what it means. Section 4 really needs a lawyer to look at it. At the moment it's gobbledegook.

A third change I'd like to suggest is in section 13. That has to do with the time frame in which a municipality should make a decision about an official plan.

One of the significant changes our commission recommended was that the time frame for municipal decision-making should be prescribed very clearly, so in the current legislation a municipality is required to make a decision on a rezoning application within three months. We thought, "That's pretty straightforward; after all, a rezoning is a change within an official plan, so you're really only dealing with questions of detail," and we found wide support for that. We also suggested that applications to change the official plan should be dealt with in six months.

Why the difference? Because official plans are much more serious documents, dealing with really big issues: Where is this municipality going? What areas should it develop in? What kind of density should it have? Where should the uses be? Very big questions, and we thought, the thing about an official plan is that it should have some permanence. It shouldn't be changing every day. If it is, it's not much of a plan. So we said six months to change official plans.

This legislation, in section 13—and I note the section there; it's 22(7)(c)—suggests that the time frame in which a municipality will be expected to change an official plan will be no different than a zoning bylaw.

My feeling is that treating an official plan and a zoning change as the same thing is dead wrong. That says planning doesn't have any status, municipalities shouldn't do it, it should change its official plan as easily as a rezoning bylaw. I disagree fundamentally. That is not going to help good planning. That will not give anybody any certainty whatsoever. It means that whenever anybody applies to do anything, there will be a big fight, because they know official plans don't mean anything; they're the same as zoning bylaws.

That's the third change that creates massive uncertainty in the planning system, which is not going to help anyone. It will not streamline one single thing. It means everything's up for grabs on every application, and I think that's bad and I don't think that's a good kind of planning system.

The last point, also having to do simply with the practice of planning, is the change that's suggested in section 9, which seems to imply that the minister can relinquish the power to approve upper-tier official plans.

As you know, one of our recommendations was to get the province out of municipal hair. We suggested that could happen in a number of ways. One was by having good, strong policy you could actually refer to. That would keep all the departments, the ministries, out of municipal hair because you had some written down policy.

But another way we suggested of keeping the province out of municipal hair was to say that lower-tier plans got approved by the upper tier, whether the county or the region, and the ministry, the provincial government, would only approve upper-tier plans. It would mean the province could keep an eye on what was going on and make sure it kept before it the question of the planning framework in Ontario. We think that's very important. We think the province does have a good, strong role.

That power will be relinquished in that section. We—I think that's very, very bad. I'm sorry for continually saying "we." I've consulted my colleagues on this, Toby Vigod and George Penfold. They were my fellow commissioners on the commission. They of course have decamped for British Columbia for the warm weather, where I understand George is making lots of money in the consulting business, where things are happening. But I consulted them on this and they generally agree with the kinds of remarks I'm making.

The point I want to make is these are four changes that do not help planning, and I'd like to give you a case study about what would happen if these changes were in place. I use the example of the development of the Greenwood racetrack in the Beaches area of Toronto. It's a large 80-acre site that a large developer—Marco Muzzo and Fred De Gasperis, some of the largest in the Toronto area—purchased a year ago.

They are trying to develop it. They're trying to do something pretty straightforward, which is building about 900 houses in the very same form as you would find in that area, houses on a street with back lanes, which is exactly the way that neighbourhood works. Everybody seems to agree that if you're going to build anything there, that's what you build.

It's really interesting. This developer has run into a city council that has no interest in dealing seriously with the applications that the developer has suggested, that have been put forward. In fact, council seems to be caught up in this whole question of, how do we get more parkland there, not, how do we manage to get this development on and running? I might say that so far, city council has got about 25 acres of parkland. Somehow, they don't think that's enough. So there's a fight, right?

On the one hand there's a developer who's trying to do something, and on the other hand there's a city council that says no.

What's really interesting is at least at the current time, the developer has some things he can rely on. The first thing he can rely on is provincial policy. Provincial policy says intensification is a good thing, right? Provincial legislation says decisions will be consistent with provincial policy. So at least the developer can go to the Ontario Municipal Board and say: "Look, I'm doing something that's in line with provincial policy. The municipality isn't." I think in that situation the OMB is probably going to say: "Yes, you're right. There's clear policy. It's clear you have to act consistently with it. It's clear the municipality is not. Fine, let's get on with this and let's figure out how we approve it." That's one thing that the developer's got on his side.

The second thing the developer has on his side is an official plan. Toronto has an official plan now that meets all the requirements of every good official plan. It's comprehensive, it deals with all the issues, does the kinds of things that official plans are supposed to do under regulation.

Of course, that official plan says that's a low-density residential area and supports the building of houses. So what the developer can do is again go the OMB and say, "Look, what I'm doing conforms to the official plan and I would like it approved." This is what the developer has decided to do. Last week he applied to the Ontario Municipal Board. He said, "Hey, my applications have been in to the city for four months; they've refused to do any planning reports on them; I want to get ahead with my development, which the official plan says I should do, which provincial policy says I should do," which I think most reasonable people would say it should do. I think when the application is heard at the Ontario Municipal Board, the developer will do well and will get a good decision.

But if the four changes are made that I've been talking about this afternoon, guess what? The first thing is the developer will get there and say, "Look, I've got this terrific intensification scheme," and I think the OMB's going to say: "First of all, we don't have any policies of the province saying intensification's a good thing, but secondly, you only have to have regard to them. You don't have to follow them." I think the developer will be kicked out on that basis, because he has nothing on his side. The policy's not on his side; the legislation isn't on his side.

Secondly, I think what will happen is the developer will try to argue about the importance of official plans, but the OMB can say quite clearly, "Official plans, they don't mean very much any more; We don't have any regulation of what they should be," so the developer will lose the legal footing as well.

I think that can happen in Toronto. Not only will it happen in Toronto, I believe it will happen in small municipalities that don't have the planning expertise or the kinds of pressure groups that happen to exist in a place like Toronto. For that reason, I think these four items I've talked about, those changes are not helpful for anyone who's trying to get something done in the development area.

By the way, I forgot to mention one point. If you don't have policy that says, "Protect these significant features, and you have to act in a way that's consistent with those features," the other thing that will happen to the applicant is he'll be confronted with some environmentalists who come forward and say: "See that pond in the middle of the racetrack? That's a significant natural feature. You save it. Let's have a fight about that." You think, "What a dumb thing to have a fight about," but in fact that too will be opened up.

No one is going to win with those kinds of changes and I would strongly suggest to your committee that in fact you amend the bill in those four respects.

Mr Hardeman: Good afternoon, John. It's a pleasure to see you again. You will recall that during the process that you were going through, the public consultation on Bill 163, I had the opportunity to serve representing the 80-some per cent of the municipalities you referred to that do not have the type of planning expertise that you express concern about.

One of the things that came out in those hearings was, there was great debate—I would agree with you—about the words "shall be consistent with," as opposed to "shall have regard for." At that time those municipalities, I think at least at the beginning, somewhat agreed with the premise that it should be "shall be consistent with." It was based on the adage that the guidelines would be very definitive, that they would do nothing but protect provincial interests and would do no more.

When the process was completed, those municipalities almost unanimously opposed the words "shall be consistent with," and it was based on that the policy statements were so definitive that in fact it was planning from Queen's Park, that if you were "consistent with" all the policy statements, there would be no local decisions. Would you care to comment on that? Did you see that there was some of that in that process, or do you not see that as a problem?

Mr Sewell: There's no question that you're right about that. Some of the smaller municipalities complained very much about the idea that first of all there would be policy, and secondly, that they'd have to act within it. I have no question that some municipalities did complain about that.

Let's face it, when you're trying to create some large-scale change to make a planning system that provides some certainty and that moves relatively quickly, I'm not sure you're going to get 100% of the people on side. What we did find was that generally municipalities, municipal planners, the development industry, the environmental movement and citizens' groups thought this approach was the proper one to follow.

I think if there's any problem, it has come with the implementation guidelines that underlie the policy. The policy, as you know, is very simple, very straightforward, with one or two exceptions that we could talk about. But I think where the detail comes that people get worried about are the implementation guidelines, which of course is why we had suggested that they be non-mandatory, as indeed they aren't.

So I was aware of the concern but I think the policy is set in general terms that reflect the provincial interest while allowing most municipalities to do quite reasonable things within it.

Mr Hardeman: I have many more questions, but I'll turn it over to another questioner.

Mrs Fisher: I concur with the 80% that Mr Hardeman referred to. I happen to represent the riding of Bruce. I have 40 ANSIs, I have multiple-designation provincial parks, I have a national park, I have native reserves and I have a 45-metre setback from the whole lakeshore in terms of development right now.

You were present at the hearings in Owen Sound. We do have a Bruce county planning department, for example, that has been able to undertake and manage an official plan very well for our area. The case example you gave us was a Metro issue, and when you were out in the field you were reminded of the needs of rural Ontario. I think we're very capable of observing and adhering to those restrictions in the plan right now. Would you not think that a county planning department, with its expertise, could do the same for us?

Mr Sewell: The problem is that you need a planning system that creates some kind of certainty for people. I think that's one of the objectives. If you don't have certainties, you're going to have big fights exploding all over the place. I think to create that certainty you need two things: First, you need reasonable policy. I find it interesting that all the policies that you've talked about were not the policies that we recommended. We didn't make recommendations of any note about ANSIs, as an example. We talked about municipalities defining significant natural features, not the Ministry of Natural Resources.

Mrs Fisher: But 163 includes them.

Mr Sewell: I realize that, but please don't burden me with "something the government did that we didn't recommend."

Mrs Fisher: That's fair.

Mr Gerretsen: Of course, what's very interesting about this whole situation, what drives this whole thing, is the notion that somehow developers will get something more quickly from municipalities, and I think the case study that you've shown, which could happen in any municipality—

Mr Sewell: It does happen all the time.

Mr Gerretsen: I totally disagree with what's just been said. It could happen in any municipality. In effect, it gives more fire to the people who are opposing some development because of the uncertainty of the situation. Is that basically your point?

Mr Sewell: Yes, that's exactly the point I'm trying to make, that it's extremely important that you create a system in which there is some kind of certainty. You need good policy and you need some good words that say people have to pay attention to that policy. My fear just with the words "have regard for" is that they do not mean you have to pay attention to the policy. Find words other than "be consistent with"; that's fine with me, but you have to say something that says, "This policy is important and you should be acting within it."

Mr Gerretsen: From a municipal viewpoint, I think where they've always had problems with all these provincial statements etc is that there's always been this feeling that they can change at a moment's notice, and certainly have in the past—I'm not talking about just—

Mr Sewell: So that the ministry could change things?

Mr Gerretsen: Sure, the policy statements.

Mr Sewell: That's been a great problem.

Mr Gerretsen: That's been a great problem.

Mr Sewell: That's been a horrendous problem.

Mr Gerretsen: Do you have any suggestions as to how that can be handled, in other words, that the concerns of the municipalities that all of a sudden they aren't going to be facing a huge policy change in which they've had absolutely no input—how, from your viewpoint, from where you've sat, can that be changed?

Mr Sewell: Our proposal, and I think this kind of a system is generally in place, is first of all that policy has to emanate from the cabinet, not from ministries. In the past five years, apart from the adoption of this policy—before that, policies used to be thrown out on almost a weekly basis by ministries. We say, "No, policy should be done by the cabinet," so in fact it is serious.

Secondly, you want to set up an approval mechanism that doesn't require the province to sign off on everything you do. That has generally been put in place at this point in time. I realize that some ministries can move in different ways than others, but that to me seems to be the situation you should be working towards. Having the province simply say, "We're abandoning any interest in planning," will not create any certainty, will not help in terms of creating good or bad development in Ontario. It will create an awful lot of fights. That's what we've had for the past 10 years, and removing those kinds of changes that point towards making the system work better seems to me to be just a step in exactly the wrong direction.

Mr Mike Colle (Oakwood): John, what these Bill 20 amendments are doing is basically making official plans ad hoc documents that can be changed willy-nilly by municipalities at their whim.

Mr Sewell: I might not use exactly those words, but it seems to me that's where we're headed, that official plans will have no more status in a rezoning bylaw, that in fact there is no requirement that they be comprehensive or address all sorts of problems. That is being removed, and of course, they aren't having to adhere to any statements of provincial interests of any note because of the "have regard to."

Mr Colle: So basically official plans are weakened documents that are not going to have the weight they used to have.

Mr Sewell: Not just official plans, but the whole process of planning in Ontario, which is a thing that can give you some certainty. I believe, just in these four instances, it will be very weakened and I don't think it's going to help any of us.

1440

Ms Churley: I guess if Ernie can call you John, I can too; can I, John?

Mr Sewell: Thank you, Ma'am.

Ms Churley: He is a constituent of mine, I must confess.

I really think it's important that we clarify. Unfortunately, we are tending to spend a lot of time on the "be consistent with" as opposed to "must have regard to." I think there's a fair amount of confusion around it and I sense that there's been a mixup between the guidelines, which I know there was a lot of negative reaction to, and the policy.

It's my understanding that municipalities wanted more autonomy by freeing them from having to go to the province all the time for approvals. They got that, and the tradeoff was therefore that the municipalities' plans had to be consistent with some kind of provincial policy. That was the tradeoff there. This is where I think we might have a misunderstanding as well.

I've heard government members say a couple of times this morning that we can't have a policy that works for Toronto that is the same as a policy you'd need for Sudbury or Sault Ste Marie or whatever, and that therein lies the problem: You just can't have a policy that fits. The policy itself—the guidelines are separate—I see it as being very flexible and that it mostly deals with environmentally sensitive areas. Could you clear that up, how the policy can apply overall?

Mr Sewell: The approach that our commission took, and one that I believe is extremely useful—from the calls we get from across North America it seems it's useful there; the people generally think it's useful—is that policy should be general in nature, pointing in a direction that you want to go in. Then municipalities should act within it. It's fairly simple.

We were very clear that we should not get into detail about how that policy would be implemented. Ontario has gotten into that detail in the past and it hasn't been helpful. We think, for instance, of the standards that have been laid out for urban development, where most developers are saying: "These standards are crazy. They literally force us to bury money in the ground and it doesn't serve any useful purpose." What we wanted to do was make a break between the direction you should be going in, which is policy, and how you might implement that policy, so we said general policy that is applicable generally throughout Ontario, and we think you can have comparable policies. Obviously, agricultural policies will not apply in Toronto, but we think urban policies are common to the province.

Secondly, we made it clear that implementation guidelines were advisory only. In fact, I might say that is now set out in the interpretation and implementation section. It says implementation guidelines are advisory. I know that many people have been furious about these 800 pages that have been floating around that are now the implementation guidelines. I agree with them. They're crazy, and they are not useful documents. I've looked at them. But that doesn't take away from the fact that you need some general policy saying, "Where are we going?" If you don't have it, people will make it up on every single application and we'll be back to where we were five years ago, where there were fights on everything. I don't think that's the kind of planning system we want to have.

The Chair: With that, thank you, Mr Sewell. We appreciate your taking the time to come and make a presentation for us today.

Mr Hampton: In view of Mr Sewell's contribution, I wonder if we could have unanimous consent to ask some more questions. We're talking to somebody here who spent literally four years working on this. The committee is not going to have too many opportunities to hear from someone like this again.

The Chair: Our concern, Mr Hampton, would be that we have a number of other groups scheduled this afternoon, and we'd be inconveniencing each one of them.

Mr Colle: No problem with that. We'll consent.

Ms Churley: How about five more minutes?

Mr Hardeman: Much as I appreciate Mr Sewell's contribution, I think it's unfair to other delegations who are also very informative who spoke to the committee and those who are yet to speak. I think we should carry on as it's been set up.

Ms Churley: Five minutes.

The Chair: In the absence of unanimous consent, thank you, Mr Sewell.

Mr Sewell: May I say, it was not four years. Our commission was two years. We think we're the only royal commission in the history of Canada that was on time, under budget and almost fully adopted, and then of course abandoned a few years later.

CITY OF MISSISSAUGA PLANNING AND BUILDING DEPARTMENT

The Chair: Our next presentation will be from the city of Mississauga planning and building department. Good afternoon.

Mr John Calvert: Good afternoon. My name is John Calvert. I'm director of policy planning for the planning and building department of Mississauga, and today with me I have Diane Horner and Ron Miller, also from the Mississauga planning department, as well as one member, Mr Rahkola, from the community services department, just in case there's a wide range of questions.

Mr Chairman and members of the committee, Mississauga was actively involved in the work Mr Sewell did through the Commission on Planning and Development Reform in Ontario and the subsequent Bill 163. Following up on that, Mississauga has taken a position on Bill 20. Our Mississauga city council, on January 31 of this year, has passed certain recommendations which have been forwarded to the minister regarding Mississauga's position on Bill 20.

The majority of our comments today are focused on the Planning Act component of Bill 20, and the presentation is set up in four components: the first part, the parts of Bill 20 that Mississauga fully supports; the second part, the areas we support but feel that there's some further discussion or clarification required; the third part is the areas that we don't support; and fourthly, the areas that Bill 20 is silent on that we want to present to just raise some points on.

First of all on the areas that we fully support, you'll probably hear the reverse side of the last presentation.

We support the return to the "have regard to" legislation with respect to provincial policy statements. We also support the authority to include provisions in the official plan, subdivision approval and zoning bylaws to regulate and control the creation of houses with two units. Thirdly, we support the elimination of the requirement for a public meeting on subdivision applications and consents.

We support establishing the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing as the only ministry that can appeal a planning decision to the board. We support the removal of power that prescribes "any other matters" as being of provincial interest.

We support the removal of the authority of the province to prescribe the contents of official plans by regulation. We feel that this can be handled at the municipal level.

We support the exemption model that's included in Bill 20 whereby the official plan and official plan amendments can come into effect when council adopts a plan and there isn't an appeal within the 20-day appeal period. The simplification of requirement to give notice of council's adoption of plans only to those who have filed a written request is also supported.

The notice of dismissal power regarding appeals to the OMB is also supported, and finally, the provision regarding pending amendments, that a zoning bylaw passed prior to an official plan amendment coming into effect, will be considered to conform to the plan amendment once the plan comes into effect.

Those are the areas of Bill 20 that we have no problem with at all.

The next area, certain components of Bill 20 that we support but we would like further review or discussion on them:

The first is the direct appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board. While we're not questioning the appeal process, we feel that the direct appeal takes away what's currently available, which provides the approval authority with the opportunity to review and consider matters that may be worked out or resolved and would hopefully lead to the elimination of a series of unnecessary referrals. So that direct referral, without question, we feel requires some further consideration.

Secondly, while we support the reduction of time frames and all efforts to streamline the development approval process, the further reduction in time frames proposed under Bill 20 may lead to not providing sufficient time to resolve issues, to discuss matters that could have been resolved with a little more time, especially the proposal for the 90 days needed to lapse from the date of application before direct appeal to the board. Perhaps that's too short a time that issues could be resolved, but the philosophy of reducing the time frames and streamlining the process is supported.

Thirdly in this area, we feel clarification is needed of the intent of deleting the words "all or" in subsection 34(1). Section 34 allows municipalities to include provisions in the zoning bylaw which currently would prohibit all or any use of land in environmentally sensitive areas. Bill 20 modifies these zoning powers to allow municipalities to prohibit any use of land, so there's a change from "all or any use of land" to "any use of land." While this is adding flexibility, we would just like that clarified as to what specifically is meant by that change.

Another area that council supports but still feels there's need for clarification and further discussion on is the appeal procedures of decisions of the committee of adjustment. On the one hand, Mississauga council would like to retain as much authority and decision-making at the municipal level as we can, and we're not opposing or objecting to the appeal process to the municipal board. But having council review the decisions of the committee of adjustment—we were wondering and have raised questions certainly at our committee and council meetings about the extended workload of both the municipal board, which is already overloaded now, and the extended workload of council municipal staff, the increase in the number of rezonings that may happen. If you go to the committee of adjustment, have referral to council and you don't have council support, it becomes possibly a rezoning application. We're looking at that whole area of increased workload at the municipal council level that should be raised.

Finally, the issue that the act be amended to provide the municipality with the authority to impose a fee for filing an appeal to offset the cost, as Bill 20 now suggests for the board. If this portion of the act goes through, perhaps that could be extended to the municipal level as well.

Another area that we support and again have raised a question on is regarding the requirement to convey land for public transit rights of way. We support that but just question whether it should be extended not only to transit rights of way but to similar treatment for storm water management retention ponds, areas like that, that we could acquire through site plans and plans of subdivision.

The third area, the area that we do not support at this time and where we've requested, through the report I referred to that did go through our municipal council, that the minister amend the legislation:

The first section is with regard to mandatory official plans. The act now states that official plans are mandatory for, among others, regional municipalities, while local municipalities within the region "may" prepare plans. We feel that official plans are very important planning documents and that official plans should be mandatory at all levels, not just mandatory at the upper tier, the regional level, and "may" at the local levels. On that point, we've also said that upper-tier official plans should be very strategic in nature and really address only that level of planning and that they should provide a real added value to the planning process.

Second in the areas that we do not support: the elimination of the power of the municipal board to dismiss matters on the basis of prematurity. Right now, as you know, the municipal board does not have to have a full hearing if an issue is premature in terms of provision of hard services. If the board has to go through a full hearing on these, not only will it increase the workload of the board and its backlog on referrals, but if that's the case, we feel that a lot of those would be, or should be, of a very low priority before the board, especially if the area is not serviced or if services aren't expected within a reasonable time frame.

The issue of prescribed information versus additional information and the time for appeal: The bill requires that the clock can start ticking on provision of the prescribed information. We feel that additional information with any application of rezoning or subdivision, which could include areas such as traffic studies, noise impact studies, environmental impact studies, parking, marketing studies and so forth, is needed to help council make an informed decision before the clock starts ticking, that just the prescribed information may not be enough to make an informed decision. We would like prescribed plus additional information together so that all decision-makers will have all the information in front of them.

Also, requiring that existing houses with two units be registered within the city by a fixed date: Without such a provision, anyone can claim that an apartment existed prior to November 16, 1995, and therefore is legal pursuant to Bill 163. So we would like to see a fixed date on that registration part of it.

Finally, there are a couple of issues that Bill 20 was silent on that we would like to bring to the committee's attention that we would like addressed.

First of all, reference to the definition of "land use planning" in section 1 should be expanded to include other areas of planning, such as social planning, environmental and financial issues.

Section 2.2 of the act regarding provincial interest should be extended to require that every minister and Ontario Hydro be required to comply with the provincial policy statement.

Thirdly, the issue on public consultation on policy statements: The act right now indicates that whether it's a new policy statement or an amendment to a policy statement, the minister shall confer with such persons or public bodies that the minister considers have an interest in the proposed statement. We feel that the act should have a mandatory public consultation process, because all changes to the provincial policy statement could have impacts on municipal and community levels. We feel a mandatory consultation process should be included in that section of the act.

Also, the conveyance of land for park purposes, section 42: This is a major concern of Mississauga. The provision of Bill 163 to amend section 42 should be repealed to allow the continuation of the previous two-stage payment process in which payments of cash in lieu of park land are valued at improved land values. It should be a return to that. In Mississauga, and Mr Rahkola can comment on this in more detail, the payment of land for park purposes—one payment is taken early in the process at a certain value and a second payment is taken later, just before the building permit's issued; it's really one payment split in two—that two-step process, that provision should return. Also, the act is silent on enabling municipalities to require a combination of land dedication and cash in lieu of park land. We would like those matters addressed.

Finally, there are two areas that were not part of our report before council, so I can't say they are a council-approved position. But they have been raised and I've included them in this presentation, the first one following a court decision of early last week so we did not have time to take it before council.

I'll just read the section and the concern that we have. Intrinsic with the stated desire of this government to return decision-making to local governments, municipal empowerment, is the need for a strong partnership with the province. This will enable local governments and the province to improve coordination, better protect the environment and public health, and to streamline the development approval process. We're requesting that crown corporations be subject to the Planning Act, the Building Code Act, the Development Charges Act and other appropriate legislation. This will be consistent with the existing Environmental Assessment Act and Expropriation Act, both of which bind the crown.

Finally, in terms of the Assessment Act, as I said, we did not address this in our position to council, but it is a feeling of staff in Mississauga that we'd like to take this opportunity to outline that Mississauga supports the Assessment Act in regard to farm assessment, subsection 19(3) as it currently exists. It's explained here, our—I say "staff position" but I would probably hesitate not to say council is in support of that as well.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm sure that since his brief was so supportive of the government's position, the parliamentary assistant will ensure that the different acts will be changed so that the crown will be subject to this legislation as well, to the Planning Act. I'm sure Mr Hardeman will take that back.

Ms Churley: We'll support that.

Mr Gerretsen: Something tells me that if we see that, almost anything is possible. Of course almost anything is possible with this government. But in any event, you've heard Mr Sewell's presentation before—I believe you were in the room at the time—and you heard him express concerns about the lack of certainty and how this may prevent good development from happening because in effect it will give the opposition to good development that both the council and the developer obviously want, to raise issues which the OMB would have to accept, and therefore it may actually be almost an anti-development kind of a position. What are your comments on that? Do you have the same concerns that he had about changing that clause from "be consistent with" to "have regard to"?

Mr Calvert: No, I don't have the same concerns that Mr Sewell expressed. My feeling is that the authority and the decision-making and that level of accountability should be at the local municipal level. There should be a provincial policy statement that gives direction, I'm not questioning that, but the flexibility for decision-making and accountability should be at the local level. "To be consistent with" really binds our hands in a lot of decisions that local councils may want to make, if we have to be consistent with a provincial policy statement. Mr Sewell sees the emphasis at the provincial level, but I see the emphasis for decision-making and accountability at the local level.

Mr Gerretsen: The one aspect I agree with in your brief is this whole notion that before any provincial interest statement is published and taken as a fait accompli, in effect there be a mandatory public consultation process. Do I take it from your past experience in this area that this hasn't always been the case and that at times provincial interest statements have been brought forward that the city of Mississauga and other municipalities may have wanted to have some input into?

Mr Calvert: I think we would want to ensure that the opportunity exists in all changes at this time. Changing a provincial policy statement is significant, and there should be a mandatory provision for consultation. I'm not saying it hasn't happened.

Mr Gerretsen: But why are you concerned about that if the wording is being changed from "be consistent with" to "have regard to"?

Mr Calvert: The contents of a provincial policy statement are important. To say that we just still "have regard to," that's been around for a long time, but it doesn't mean we totally ignore it as perhaps the impression was given. Yes, we're not bound by it, but we don't ignore it either. We can't dismiss a policy statement, saying it's not important. I want to be involved in changes to a policy statement, but I also want the provision for our local council to have the flexibility to be able to make decisions within that and not be bound by it. That's our position.

Mr Hampton: What struck me about Mr Sewell's presentation is that he's saying, "Look, if you think that throwing this wide open is going to allow you to speed things up, it ain't going to happen." Throwing it wide open and removing certainties and taking out some of the rules that serve as guidelines will essentially mean you're going to have more free-for-alls. In locations where you've got active interest groups, whether on behalf of the environment or on behalf of certain types of urban development or on behalf of or against certain types of transportation corridors, you will have a free-for-all.

There aren't enough guide posts in what is being proposed here to help someone move something along, or there aren't enough guide posts for someone who's trying to do something to help them know up front whether they're going to succeed or not. Do I take it you're saying: "Don't worry about the guide posts. Don't worry about the upfront indicators. Don't worry about consistency"?

Mr Calvert: No. A provincial policy statement has the guidelines, goalposts, and I'm not disregarding it all. I'm saying that we can't be bound totally on every planning decision by them. There has to be the flexibility within those to be able to make local decisions. If we're bound by every policy statement, most of the decision-making and accountability at the local level is taken out of local municipal hands.

Ms Diane Horner: I'd just like to add to that. I think one of the intrinsic points we have tried to relay in our presentation today is that while we think it is critical to have provincial policy, we also feel it is very important at the local level in official plans, and we concur with Mr Sewell there, that official plans must be able to outline very clearly what information is required at the application stage. I think it's there that the municipality—and many municipalities are currently doing this—outlines the information that is critical for it as a municipality and for its residents to review a development application for their community.

While we're recognizing that it's important to have provincial policy statements, we're also stating very clearly that we think the local municipality must have the ability to outline what it feels is important for its municipality and be able to outline the information that it needs to review in reviewing a development application.

Mrs Fisher: I enjoyed your presentation and I do concur with your last statement with regard to global perspectives and allowing flexibility at the municipal level. I have one question relating to the presentation. The question is with regard to minor variances and how they're handled, whether it should be at the municipal level or whether it should be directly forwarded to the OMB. I'm just confirming something in the question. The major concern would be whether it's a time parameter as opposed to a potential conflict, conflict of interest almost, not necessarily pecuniary?

Mr Calvert: It's really both. I didn't want to elaborate on that, even though we spent a lot of time at committee and council discussing that point. Certainly there would be a time situation, where council right now would have to be an appeal body, have certain additional administrative staff and resources to hear them.

But also, as you're probably well aware, at committees of adjustment councillors get involved in submissions, supporting or not supporting applications. All of that would be gone, obviously, because they can't do that and hear any appeals as well. That conflict was another concern of council, because if they're there to be able to be supportive of the minor variance applications, that would be taken away. They had concern about that as well.

Mrs Fisher: My only follow-up to that would be: If you had a choice of whether you had a subcommittee of council which dealt with it individually first and then the right for final decision with council as opposed to the cost of OMB at a municipal level, burdened by the municipality, what would your choice be?

Mr Calvert: My choice would be a third option.

Mrs Fisher: Go for it.

Mr Calvert: Leave it the way it is. Don't take away the appeal provision, and let the board deal with them. On the other hand, some of the councillors in Mississauga may say, "Yes, but the board can make decisions that we're not accountable for and we're trying to get as many decisions back." But mine would be the third option: leave it the way it is.

The Chair: Thank you, folks. I appreciate your taking the time to come and make representation today.

SCARBOROUGH HOUSING WORK GROUP

The Chair: Our next group up is the Scarborough Housing Work Group. Good afternoon, Mr Hum.

Mr Doug Hum: Thank you, Mr Chair. I'd Doug Hum, chairperson of the Scarborough Housing Work Group, and I want to thank you for this opportunity to address the committee on matters regarding Bill 20. Our submission with regard to Bill 20 will be focusing on the apartments-in-houses provisions.

Scarborough Housing Work Group has been in existence for some 20 years. We've recently been incorporated as a non-profit, community-based housing advocacy group. We are made up of community residents and community organizations who share our vision and our goals. Our purpose is "to promote and advocate for housing as a universal human right," and that is safe, affordable and meets a variety of needs. Our vision is to see a Scarborough that is truly vibrant and dynamic; that meets a variety of needs; that promotes and supports a high quality of life for everyone; that makes good use of developed lands; and that protects the environment. We are therefore addressing the issue from a Scarborough-based perspective.

Our working group has played important roles in meeting Scarborough's housing needs. We had a role in the development of Scarborough's first family shelter, Homeward Family Shelter, which opened its doors in 1990 to provide temporary shelter to families in need; the Robin Gardner Voce Non-Profit Homes, which allocates 35% of its apartments to women leaving violent and abusive situations; the Chinese nursing home in Scarborough; the establishment of Scarborough's Second Base Youth Shelter. We've been advocating for permitting apartments in houses for a number of years, and we have also supported land use planning that supports the development of affordable housing.

We strongly support the rights of homeowners to install second units in their homes if they so choose and the rights of tenants to live in such units when such units meet fire, safety and health requirements. During the hearings on Bill 120, the Residents' Rights Act, last year, two subcommittees of our group addressed a legislative committee in strong support of the basic premises of Bill 120. We continue to support the legalizing of apartments in houses as a right and the prevention of imposition of onerous standards which could prohibit the creation of such units.

We generally believe that apartments in houses are;

—Owner-friendly. They help people to pay mortgages.

—Senior-friendly. They help seniors stay in their homes.

—Renter-friendly.

—User-friendly.

—Environmentally-friendly. They help to minimize urban sprawl and allow people to remain in their homes.

—Anti-recession-friendly. They promote jobs and economic development.

The changing demographics in Scarborough make a strong case for legislation that facilitates and supports the development of apartments in houses as a housing option. The population of Scarborough is aging, with the number of elderly persons increasing. Metro reports indicate currently that 13% of Scarborough's residents are over 65. This is expected to increase considerably in the next century. As well, household size is becoming smaller. The family size has shrunk from 3.6 persons per family to 3.1. In addition, the birthrate has fallen below the replacement rate of 2.1 children per mother to 1.68.

As a result, the single-family home which used to house a traditional nuclear family may now have space for two separate units for two smaller households of relatively the same numbers of persons per single-family home. Seniors can have the option of taking in a tenant to help with their chores and running the household. This helps to keep seniors in their homes and reduces the demand for building more seniors' housing.

A city of Scarborough study of such units, which began in 1989, estimated there were 14,000 illegal units at the time in Scarborough. The study was conducted by the consulting firm of Berridge Lewinberg Greenberg, and it was published in 1989. It found that this form of housing met a variety of needs of a growing and diverse Scarborough community from the traditional nuclear family to elderly persons, single persons, new Canadians, immigrants, first-time homebuyers, tenants etc.

The Scarborough study also pointed out there was popular community support for such units and its survey showed 65% of respondents supported such units. This is consistent with the Ministry of Housing survey of Ontario residents which indicated that 73% of respondents favoured allowing homeowners to add a rental unit as a way of providing affordable housing.

The Scarborough study also pointed out that communities will not be overwhelmed by these units. The study estimated that some 200 to 400 units per year may be created in Scarborough, which is well within the capability of the municipality's infrastructure to absorb. This low level of conversions is consistent with the Ministry of Housing's findings in a survey of municipalities with a population greater than 5,000. This was released in September 1995. This ministry survey covered the period from July 1994 to June 1995 and estimated across the province that 433 new apartments in houses have been created, with another 119 units being upgraded.

These units contribute to job creation and economic development. Apartments in houses generate employment and create jobs for the renovation industry, building trades and suppliers of household goods. A Metro planning report indicated that based on the proportion of homeowners receptive to the idea of conversion, that is, approximately one in eight, a theoretical potential of 39,000 units might be made available in Metropolitan Toronto.

Based on this number of new units, we estimate the total construction value to be some $650 million in Metro Toronto alone. Based on Scarborough's estimated 14,000 units that currently exist, upgrading of the units could also generate another $60 million in renovations. These units will generate demands for household appliances, generating additional direct and indirect economic activities.

We also understand that the federal government is setting aside another $50 million for its residential rehabilitation assistance plan, the RRAP program. These moneys could be of assistance to low-income seniors and again it is of benefit to the renovation and building industry, putting people to work.

The job creation and economic development aspects of apartments in houses makes a strong case for not unduly inhibiting the creation of the units and for realizing the Minister of Housing's call for economic recovery by cutting "red tape and getting rid of obstacles to growth."

Both the ministry and the Scarborough studies' findings indicate that there will not be an avalanche of applications for conversions which will overwhelm municipalities. However, the applications will be extending over a number of years, providing steady employment at a consistent level over a period of years. It is important not to create legislation that will dampen the contribution to economic recovery that apartments in houses will make. We are concerned that Bill 20 might do this.

The proposed changes to the Residents' Rights Act in Bill 20 troubles us. We believe that the removal of the as-of-right provisions of the Residents' Rights Act will create undue obstacles in creating apartments in houses. Our experience leads us to believe that municipalities will cater to the wishes of property owners over that of tenants. Tenants are taxpayers, too, and should have access to units that meet fire, safety and health requirements, without fear of eviction because the municipality may not like such units and will place obstacles at their disposal to prevent such units.

We are also concerned that Bill 20 brings out other aspects in the community. From our experience in hearings at the municipal level, it brings out those who are prejudiced against minorities, who do not like people of colour. They have said to us, directly to our faces, "We don't want such units in our neighbourhood because they bring people of colour into our communities." One also blatantly said to us: "The people moving into such units are totally different from the people who live in my community. They don't look like the people in the community, they don't dress like us, they don't eat the same food, and they would not fit in." We should not cater to such blatant racism and prejudice, and we must give every support we can to those who are in need of affordable and safe housing.

In summary, apartments in houses exist. They are needed. They will continue to exist and be needed whether or not any government chooses to recognize them. The failure of municipalities to acknowledge this important fact only serves to ignore the realities of people who own and occupy these units. People often have a basic ability to find ways to meet many of their needs, even if it has to be through an underground economy such as an illegal unit. Local planning does not respond well to those in need of such housing, in our experience. They have failed to recognize that whole groups of people have been prevented from accessing affordable housing. It seems that these people don't count and therefore have been forced to live in illegal situations due to a lack of money or a lack of resources or options, leaving them few options but to rent an illegal unit.

To prevent these situations from continuing, we respectfully request the committee to maintain the as-of-right provision so that both tenants and homeowners can continue to benefit from the legislation that supports rather than discourages the creation of such units.

Ms Churley: Thank you very much for coming to present today. We haven't heard a whole lot around this issue so far today, and it's good to hear your point of view on that, given your background in the community with people who need affordable housing.

I want to ask you a general question, and you touched on it a bit. I am having a lot of trouble understanding this one. The Tory position—I understand that it's philosophy, dogma, what they believe in, but this one confuses me a bit. It's an astounding move, given that this government is saying very clearly—Al Leach has said it time and time again—that it's getting out of the affordable housing market. They don't want to be in it. They want to see the private sector create affordable housing.

Yet we know, notwithstanding even some of the changes they're making in deregulation, that there's a problem for the private sector, especially in these economic times when we're about to see a made-in-Ontario Harris recession because of some of his policies. We're not going to see much affordable housing created, if any, by the private sector. We see people now out on the streets more and more—families, kids ending up in motels, cramped hotels.

And it's a government that says it wants to cut red tape and get out of private people's lives. Here we have an opportunity for people to pay off their mortgage, to help deal with the affordable housing problem, and the government is saying: "No, you can't do it. We're going to let the municipality decide that." But they're allowing municipalities to be in the faces of private homeowners who could be benefiting the community.

It just doesn't make sense in terms of the overall Tory philosophy. I want your view of what you think is happening here. Why do you think this is thrown in the midst of all this other stuff?

Mr Hum: We view this as a private sector response to housing needs. It is not government housing. It doesn't involve government spending, other than perhaps expenses for inspection, fire inspection, and these may be recovered fees. This is a private sector response and it's a community-based response. People in homes are seeing their own needs in terms of paying down mortgages and maintaining their houses. The aging population, seniors on fixed incomes—what other resources do they have? They have to look for other means. Renting out an apartment in their house provides that opportunity. It allows them, as I mentioned, to take in somebody to maintain the property, and income to pay for property taxes and general maintenance on the house.

Ms Churley: It doesn't make sense. Where do you think the pressure is coming from? Do you bring it back to what you say in your paper, that there has been pressure on some municipal mayors and councils to keep certain people out of their communities? That's a pretty serious accusation.

Mr Hum: I pointed that out. At local municipal deputations, deputants told us to our face, "We don't want these people living in our neighbourhood." You can't cater to that. You have to oppose that. Housing is a universal basic human right. Communities should be accessible to all kinds of people, no matter where they're from. The United Nations has defined Metro Toronto as the most multicultural city in the world. There's no other place like it. The world is reflected in the faces of all of us who call Metro home. We should provide means to accommodate people and make it easier for them to live. We're not advocating substandard housing; such housing must meet standards of fire, safety and health. We've always stated that.

Ms Churley: Do you fear we'll go back to the bad old days of a whole lot more illegal basement apartments, hidden basement apartments, and the serious concerns about fire hazards that go with that?

Mr Hum: Our concern is that it will drive people back underground if you don't allow it as-of-right, and then people will again be in unsafe conditions and there may be more fire deaths. It's human lives at risk that we're concerned about.

Mr Hardeman: I just want to go quickly to page 6 of your presentation: "Our experience leads us to believe that municipalities will cater to the wishes of the property owners." In your estimation—or do you have figures that the majority of the two-unit buildings are occupied by tenants in both units as opposed to a property owner and a tenant?

Mr Hum: A Metro report indicates that something like 92% of single-family homes in Scarborough are owner-occupied. That leaves roughly 8% that may be absentee landlords, so the owner may not be in those, which is a very small proportion. Most people who rent out units tend to live there, based on those statistics.

Mr Hardeman: So it's reasonable to assume that most of those houses are owner-occupied with a unit in it. Do you have any figures on whether that unit in turn pays more property taxes for the services consumed? Talking about total services consumed and everybody paying their fair share, do property taxes go up when a unit is added to the house?

Mr Hum: I guess an application for a building permit would have a bearing on that. From what I understand from a previous Scarborough planner, Mr Peter Poote, such units are taken into account in the assessment, in the mill rate. I'm not exactly clear on that, but a previous planning commissioner indicated that. So taxes may very well be collected on those second units, whether they're legal or not.

Mr Smith: It's very clear from your presentation your view on implications of the removal of the as-of-right, and certainly from the bill the government's position on restricting the second unit. Those two positions established, do you have a vision, an idea, of how this whole issue might be better managed? Assuming the municipality is going to play a larger role, do you have a vision yourself of how we might manage that process?

Mr Hum: Bill 120 facilitates and helps the owner; there is a number of factors there. Our experience is that if you make it onerous, it remains underground; the owner will not surface. It puts both owners and tenants at risk, and this would be our concern.

Mr Jerry J. Ouellette (Oshawa): Thank you for your presentation. You specifically related fire, safety and health. Do you not believe the municipality should have some authority in other areas? I happen to live adjacent to an area that has a high density of second units within the households, and to be quite honest, I think the statistics would show it's quite the opposite of what you're saying: that 90% of the homeowners do not live in those areas. Do you not think parking—that the municipality should look at those areas as well?

Mr Hum: This is based on Metro reports and Metro assessments. I don't know if you live in Metro, but 92% of homes in Metropolitan Toronto are owner-occupied in a single-family home. We're dealing with a very small percentage: 8% may be absentee landlords, and of that, some numbers may not meet safety standards. But we have always stood strongly in support of seeing that such housing meets fire, safety and health standards. The current housing standards bylaw, building code requirements, health departments—these regulations can govern the adequacy of such units in terms of health, fire and safety.

Mr Ouellette: So you don't think a municipality would be looking at parking or other areas as well?

Ms Churley: People who live in basements don't usually have cars.

Mr Ouellette: That's not true.

Mr Hum: I understand that to own and operate a car in Scarborough costs roughly $7,000 a year. Most people living in accessory units are working-class people and tend not to own cars in any great number. It's the homeowners who tend to own cars in greater numbers.

Mr Ouellette: I think that could be part of the problem. This is a province-wide issue. Maybe in Metro they can't afford cars, but in my community they certainly can.

Mr Hum: Given the fact statistically, we understand that those living in such units tend to be of lower income, tend to rely on public transit more.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm confused about this whole issue, I'll be quite honest with you, because the Conservative Party is the rights party, the rights-of-property party, you should be able to do as you want with it, and yet here they're trying to impose something which will only make it tougher in effect for some people to rent accommodation. Basically, if these 14,000 units were closed down by the legislation, and I'm not saying that they are, I would assume that a lot of these people would either be paying more rent if they were housed somewhere else or—what would happen to them?

Mr Hum: With the vacancy rate plunging below 1%, I fear to think of what might happen. My office is near Kennedy and Eglinton, and the bus shelters after 2 o'clock become emergency shelters. They're occupied by people at night, even in these kinds of weather conditions. We may even see more of that. This would be my concern.

We have to try and look at means of providing housing in the most creative form we can. This is a private sector response. It doesn't involve any government spending. It's a community-based response.

Mr Gerretsen: Obviously your fear here is that if you left it strictly up to municipal control, then municipal councils may be influenced by certain segments within that community that would force these units to close, or force them to pass a bylaw that the units wouldn't be allowed at all or any new units couldn't be created, which seems to run completely contrary to the ministry's own survey which in 1992 indicated that 73% of the people had no problems with allowing homeowners to add a rental unit.

Mr Hum: That's right.

Mr Gerretsen: I wonder, Mr Chairman, if that information could be made available to us, the housing survey that refers to, because it's not all that old and maybe it's got some other interesting information in there. I wonder if we could maybe dig that out.

Do you have any ideas why this is being pushed this way then, when that particular survey, which is less than four years old, would indicate that almost three out of four homeowners in the province would support having a second unit in a house?

Mr Hum: I believe it is a response to a very vocal minority who are very prejudiced against low-income people, against single parents, against people of colour, against people of different backgrounds, who as they've told us don't fit into their communities. We've got to start looking at communities as being inclusive and start breaking down barriers that prevent people from living in their own communities. We feel that the previous legislation was moving in that direction.

Mr Gerretsen: What's your experience in Scarborough? I come from a community like Kingston where a lot of these units are occupied by students. There is some concern within that community that if you had two units within a house that was at one time a single-family residential unit, you could have as many as 10 students, I suppose, in a house, and it does create a certain problem in some neighbourhoods, etc. Do you have that kind of problem in Scarborough?

Mr Hum: I would assume that health standards would come in in terms of overcrowding and that fire codes would govern how many people can occupy a house. These are set, I would assume.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Hum. We appreciate your taking the time to make your presentation here today.

Mr Gerretsen: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: Can that information be made available?

The Chair: I'm told that the ministry will be pleased to make that available.

CITY OF SCARBOROUGH

The Chair: Next up is the city of Scarborough, represented by His Worship Mayor Frank Faubert. I would say this is not a good time to try and get hold of your Scarborough councillor. Greetings to you all. Frank brought the entire cheering section down with him today.

Mr Frank Faubert: They insisted on coming.

The Chair: Our pleasure to have them down here.

You have 25 minutes, as you see fit, to divide between a presentation and questions from the three caucuses.

Mr Faubert: I'm here with Judy McLeod, director of strategic planning and legislation for the city, and Frank Weinstock, director of property standards and bylaw enforcement. I'm joined by some councillors, as you pointed out: Councillor Brad Duguid, Councillor Ron Moeser, Councillor Harvey Barron and Councillor Bas Balkissoon, who are all members of council who have had an interest in this legislation, indeed in all aspects of planning.

I should tell you, first of all, that we certainly appreciate the opportunity to present our views to committee.

The city of Scarborough supports the initiatives of Bill 20 to promote economic recovery, cut red tape and get rid of obstacles to growth, because we've been attempting to do just that. The city of Scarborough has done it quite successfully. We've cut red tape; we've streamlined our planning process; we've incorporated a corporate incentive plan; we've engaged in a program to reform our zoning bylaws to make it easier to do business in Scarborough; and we've entered into successful partnerships with local businesses and with communities. All these have resulted in renewed confidence and economic activity in the city.

I'm pleased to see the government of Ontario is taking steps to remove these bureaucratic obstacles.

At hearings on Bill 163, Scarborough and many other municipalities expressed concern with regard to the "shall be consistent with" terminology. Bill 20, in changing the wording back to "shall have regard to" will allow municipalities to consider all aspects of provincial planning policy statements and apply them appropriately, taking into account local circumstances and objectives. We support the revised provincial policy statements that are shorter, less prescriptive, focused on outcomes, and only setting out clear areas of provincial interest.

In 1994, it was Scarborough's position that the Ontario Municipal Board should not be burdened with appeals on minor variances. We know the results of that.

I'm trying to summarize this as I go through it, because you have a copy of the submission in front of you—at least I gave it for your information.

We want to avoid the backlog of variance appellants waiting for their day in court before the board. I'm pleased to see that Bill 20 would allow council's decision on variances to be final, and I certainly hope the legislation will follow through this time.

I strongly support the move to restrict the term "public body" to the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing. We all know the criticism of the provincial government, the silo theory of ministries. We know that in recent years municipalities in the development community have been critical of fragmentation and the lack of coordination of provincial responses. The interests of various ministries have often not been communicated, one to the other, which has been one of the great problems, and ministries often appear at cross-purposes.

Municipal interests and economic growth have fallen victim. Indeed, we have some examples in Scarborough where we have had approval from the Ministry of Housing and at the last moment, the Ministry of Environment comes in and says—this is after the approvals by planning—"No, we have some concern; we want to review that again." It throws the whole process into disarray and delay.

Scarborough supports this attempt at provincial coordination, but I would caution you that we don't want the ministry just to be a postman that collects all the responses from the various ministries and sends them on that way. They have a responsibility, obviously—the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing—to properly coordinate the provincial interests, to analyse the requests that come forward and send forward the coordinated response to the municipalities.

Several ministries have declined to comment on municipal initiatives such as official plan changes until they're adopted by the local council. I alluded to that before. The Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing should be called on to play the role of coordinating responses on matters of provincial interest.

Then we have exemptions from approval requirements for official plans and amendments. This is supported: the provisions that would exempt official plan amendments from the requirements for approval.

This is by regions. In 1994, we requested that local municipalities within Metropolitan Toronto should be the final approval authorities for official plan amendments. We did not concur then, and we do not concur now, with Metro's request to be the approval authority. It's interesting, with the revisions that we're having in the Golden report on the GTA. I would say that position is probably supported by every municipality within the GTA. They agree they do not want this second approval level, a second regional approval. It's a duplication of public hearings, it's costly and it simply delays the process. The authority should lie at the local level.

We know this would substantially streamline the process, especially for amendments that clearly do not involve matters of provincial concern. I would request the ministry meet with representatives of the cities within the Metro area to determine the classes of official plan amendments which should be exempt to expedite this initiative.

In addition, we reiterate our request that large, sophisticated municipalities in the Metro area, municipalities with professional staff capable of performing the functions required of an approval authority, be also granted approval authority for plans of subdivision and condominiums.

On the issue of apartments in houses, with the changes to the apartments-in-houses legislation proposed by Bill 20, my council has asked me to present again a series of items it thinks are necessary to enable municipalities to develop a responsible, fair and comprehensive policy to deal with the matter. It has been our objective to ensure a high quality of life and a safe environment for the occupants of second units and for their neighbours.

There is an ongoing concern for the ability of staff to enforce our property standards bylaw, particularly as it pertains to right of entry. In this context, we are urging the government to undertake a review of section 31 of the Planning Act.

Municipalities must have an enhanced capacity to enforce standards through greater powers, streamlined procedures and the ability to recover the costs of administering this process. Council and the public both wish a quicker, simpler and more responsive system; that is, a less costly and more effective system.

Where appropriate, the enforcement procedures related to property standards should be harmonized with the building code and other applicable sections of the Planning Act. We propose that areas which require review include the need for a notice of violation prior to the issuance of an order; alternative forms of service; the appeal process itself; liability for the costs of inspections for recurring violations and repairs undertaken by municipalities; court orders for repairs; and fines.

The city's zoning, property standards and building inspectors must have reasonable and effective rights of access to dwellings for the purpose of inspection for compliance with the Ontario building code and local bylaws. We need to get into units to make sure they are safe. That is why Scarborough council asks that subsection 49.1(1) of the Planning Act be amended to add a statement that the province will adopt regulation guidelines on the kinds of evidence which may be used to satisfy a judge or justice of the peace with respect to the issuance of a search warrant under municipal bylaws, for example: assessment roll data, telephone or cable connections, doorbells, letter boxes, real estate listings, voters' lists and sworn affidavits from neighbours. Obviously, we don't intend to fetter the discretion of a judge, simply that some guideline may be necessary which to weigh a decision against.

Even if officers can get in and identify problems, there's a major problem in enforcing standards and upgrading units. Landlords may decide to close a unit down instead of upgrading it, meaning people may lose their homes. To avoid this, Scarborough suggests that the Landlord and Tenant Act and the City of Scarborough Act be amended to provide that a landlord's refusal to comply with the building and fire codes and municipal bylaws may result in the relocation of a tenant and/or the municipality may undertake the needed repairs, with all costs being recovered as taxes, obviously against that dwelling unit.

The Landlord and Tenant Act should be amended to provide the ability for a homeowner to evict an incompatible tenant from the second unit.

Scarborough also requests that the province enact the following measures to help us enforce our bylaws more effectively: create a municipal bylaw court to deal with all bylaw infractions and building code violations; amend the Planning Act and Municipal Act to provide so that the costs of work carried out under a municipal order can be recovered or shall be recovered as taxes; amend the court procedures to permit a prohibition order to be enforced by the court granting such an order. We can get an order, but if it's unenforceable, obviously it's not worth the paper it's issued on.

Although the city of Scarborough will be making future presentation on private member's Bill 11, I would like to point out in the context of my remarks here today that if Bill 11 is adopted, the moderate provision for entry provided for under the Planning Act and reaffirmed under Bill 20 becomes moot. Interestingly enough, it also affects other legislation, such as the Fire Marshals Act, the public health act etc. So I would ask that the Legislature consider that when it considers Bill 11.

Of particular concern are the provisions contained in Bill 11, section 2, most notably section 9.3, which provides that, "No one may enter on another person's property or take anything from it without the person's express or implied consent." Clearly, this provision is contrary to the provision in both Bill 163 and Bill 20, which allow bylaw enforcement officers some limited powers of entry, and it should not be adopted.

Our residents have also told us that they want apartments in houses to pay their fair share of taxes for the services they receive. Second units should be assessed appropriately to reflect the increased market value of the converted property; in other words, to assess them for property taxes as duplexes in comparison with other duplexes under the Assessment Act.

Scarborough requests the province to:

(1) Amend the Assessment Act to provide that the units in absentee-owned houses with second units be assessed as businesses;

(2) Amend the Development Charges Act to permit municipalities to levy development charges on additional dwelling units.

I'm pleased to see that the bill will allow municipalities to set up a registry of two-unit houses and that we will be able to require all such dwellings to be registered or to cease operating as two separate units. The registry will enable us to inspect units regularly to ensure that they are safe and indeed to meet other standards.

In closing, I would point out that appended to this submission is a list of council's outstanding issues. I won't read them; it's a long one. I certainly won't read all 14 of them, but I would put them forward for your information when you further consider the bill.

Thank you very much. I'm quite prepared to answer any questions.

Mr Galt: Thank you for the most thoughtful and most interesting presentation.

Almost every presentation has either agreed with or disagreed with the words "shall be consistent with" or "shall have due regard for." There's no question of what we're trying to do. We want to have some certainty, we want to have some clarity, we want to have some guidance, but at the same time we don't want—at least in speaking from the government side—the hands of local municipalities totally tied, that there can be, in exceptional, special circumstances, the opportunity to have that flexibility there.

Have you any other words that might come in between there, since people are either agreeing or disagreeing? Is there any grey, are there any other words that come to mind that might be used to describe what we're trying to accomplish?

Mr Faubert: We agree with "shall have regard for." I would ask Ms McLeod if she has any comment on this, because we debated this also at great length.

Ms Judy McLeod: I believe that "shall have regard for" is acceptable wording if people do have regard for and take seriously the provisions of the policy statements. I'm not sure that "have regard for" has really been tested at the board against "shall be consistent with," but we have found that in dealing with staff of various ministries, there's been more interest in putting specific words into an official plan amendment or a statement, rather than taking into account the overall objectives of the municipality and the development community. I think as long as everyone takes seriously "shall have regard for," it is suitable wording.

Mr Galt: Okay, I was just curious. Even the words "be consistent with" don't mean it's going to be the same. There's uncertainty there as well, if you really start thinking through on that particular wording.

The other question, if I may, relates to the second dwelling within a home. There's been quite a bit of concern at these hearings over that one in the past. We're asking for registration. What have been some of the problems that you've experienced in having these apartments in houses that I guess in many instances you're unaware of and find out about later on? Has it been a real frustration in your community?

Mr Faubert: We feel we have a pretty good handle on the numbers. We estimate between 10,000 and 13,000 of these in our city. The major problems have been non-owner-occupied or absentee landlord or multiple occupancy, over and above two units, for a single-family dwelling. That's the real issue. The average person who has a second unit would conform to these regulations and to the legislation, as we see it.

The major problem, as I point out, has been absentee landlords and the real overoccupancy of homes. We find, in terms of enforcement, usually someone has more than one. If someone is in this business, and so many of them are, they have multiple-occupancy homes in which they are truly absentee landlords, but they also have the legal wherewithal to fight the city on a continuing basis. Those are the problems that we really have with second units.

In the majority of second units, though, where persons who own the home have a second unit, they are the enforcers, if you wish; they're the ones who ensure that the standards are there, in most cases, that the parking is not a problem, that it does not become a problem within the community or within the neighbourhood. That's about the issue, quickly stated.

Mr Gerretsen: Dealing with the second-unit issue first, I take it then that this has not been a major problem in Scarborough. We heard earlier from a Scarborough housing group that they felt that if municipal control was given over this issue, in effect it would lead to a greater need for housing, particularly by the more unfortunate in our society. Do you have any comments on that?

Mr Faubert: In terms of it not being a problem, there is a problem, as I pointed out, in terms of non-owner-occupied, the second units, and I think it's a fairly clear one. In terms of the municipality taking on—I think we're as sophisticated a municipality as any in Metro Toronto. We have the wherewithal to administer legislation as a municipality and I don't think we would create a problem with these. As a matter of fact, there's concurrence within the municipality, within the majority of residents, that they're not a problem in most circumstances.

There are exceptions to this and there are exceptions, as I pointed out, where someone is exploiting the housing market and owns a number of these, simply overoccupies the residence. We've had situations where we've had as many as 15 people occupying a single-family residence. These are problems of owners.

The second issue is the enforcement of the bylaws themselves, simply because of the way the courts perceive municipal bylaws, indeed how courts perceive the right of evidence and the evidence that they will accept. As you know, in many cases the department of health can go in and the fire department can go in, but the courts cannot accept their evidence of what they see. Our property standards must go in and then collect their own evidence and lay that evidence before the courts, and in many cases we don't get even the satisfactory judgement from the court itself.

If you wanted, I could ask Mr Weinstock.

Mr Gerretsen: I take it that the real problem deals more with property standards matters and occupancy standards rather than with the notion that people in a single-family area just don't want their neighbours to have an extra apartment in their unit.

Mr Faubert: Very much so. I think that is the issue.

Mr Frank Weinstock: Yes. The nature of the concern is where the extra units have garbage, debris, noise, cars. Anything that spills over and impacts on neighbours bothers people. If you have two self-contained units and the people are responsible and don't impact on their neighbours, most neighbours don't mind.

Mr Gerretsen: There's one other issue, and that deals with "be consistent with" and "having regard to." We had Mr Sewell here earlier today and he basically said, "Well, if the wording is changed to 'have regard to,' you can take a look at it and totally ignore it and say, 'Well, that's it; we've taken a look at it and we just don't think it applies here, or 'We think that there are other issues that override that particular policy statement' etc." What's your comment on that?

Mr Faubert: We're happy enough with "shall have regard for." We think the issue of responsibility of taking into consideration is covered within the words "shall have regard for." That is quite direct.

Mr Gerretsen: But he pictured a scenario.

Mr Faubert: John always pictures the worst case.

Mr Gerretsen: Just a minute, now. He gave the example of the Greenwood Race Track that's being redeveloped. The developer went in there and basically wants to put a housing development in that is in accordance with the official plan and it's in accordance with the current policy statements and council goes along etc. But in effect, if we change the wording to that as suggested in the bill here, it would give a greater voice for the people who are in opposition, because there wouldn't be any standards at all and the OMB would throw it out. What's your opinion on that?

Mr Faubert: First of all, I never try to outguess the OMB. That's the first rule. As you know, John, in your tenure with municipal politics—

Mr Gerretsen: You don't like the OMB, is that it?

Mr Faubert: That's right.

Ms Churley: I appreciate your coming down to give us your position on the bill. I'm going to come back as well to the wording around "consistent with" or "must have regard for," because it isn't just mere wording, as I understand you fully realize. It's quite, quite significant, and I think the reason why people keep bringing it up is that they really need to understand the implications.

I understand that Ms McLeod has said it's fine as long as people adhere to it. In fact, therein lies our concern, my concern. Perhaps you will, but there are lots of tiny municipalities that don't have budgets—there are other kinds of pressures—that won't adhere, and what you have is a patchwork of, in some cases, very bad planning.

I think we mustn't forget that in the process of the consultations that led to this bill, more autonomy was given to municipalities, as you know, in terms of their planning. You don't always have to come running off to the province for approvals any more. But there was a tradeoff associated with that: that your policies would have to be consistent with the provincial ones.

I think that's fair. That way, when you have more autonomy, there is some and it should be broad guidelines or policy statements. Obviously, as people are saying, you can't have a policy statement that is too complex or it just won't work. But for that very reason, to get more autonomy, there needs to be some consistency in the planning or you're going to end up in a mess. I submit that what's going to happen in this rush to just "have regard for," because it feels like you have more autonomy overall, people are going to end up in real messes, that there are going to be more OMB hearings, there are going to be more disputes.

There are going to be municipalities that are not adhering to—"We're going to have a look at it, throw it down and say, 'Okay, let's ignore that and move on.'" It'll open the door for a lot more appeals because you won't be able to use—the example that was given about Greenwood; we all know what happened there.

It can help developers too, you know. Perhaps not Scarborough, but many municipalities are going to have this problem where they won't have that to fall back on. I think people are really going to get caught. I really wonder if you have a response to that. Maybe it won't be for Scarborough, but overall, do you see what I mean about the tradeoff here?

Mr Faubert: Yes. I think you make a point probably in terms of provincial-wide legislation as opposed to how we see it affect our municipality directly. That comes back to the whole philosophy on Bill 163 and why they should "be consistent with" broad guidelines as opposed to "have regard for."

We've debated this at great length in the municipality and we felt that we would rather have "shall have regard for." We think that still gives us a better provision for taking into consideration what we consider, like local provisions.

This may not ever be resolved because, like all legislation, you can argue words until somehow it's put into place and there's some test case taken of this. But our preference is "shall have regard for," the amendment as recommended.

The Chair: Thank you again. I didn't set out to make this Scarborough Day here, but I see more positions down the road. We have the Save the Rouge as well.

Mr Faubert: In light of that, I should point out that we have another councillor, Councillor Watson, also in Toronto today, I understand. He's back there somewhere.

The Chair: Excellent. Many times have I visited your house and made representations. It's good to see you down here in the lion's den, and you're welcome any time, of course. Thank you all for coming down today.

FEDERATION OF METRO TENANTS' ASSOCIATIONS

The Chair: Our next presentation will be from the Federation of Metro Tenants' Associations. Good afternoon. We have 25 minutes to be divided, as you see fit, between presentation and questions and answers.

Mr Neal Ballo Singh: Ladies and gentlemen, members of the committee, I just want to spend a few minutes to deal with the Residents' Rights Act part of this amendment that is being proposed. I will be pretty brief on this presentation. My name is Neal Ballo Singh and I am a tenant organizer with the Federation of Metro Tenants' Associations.

The Federation of Metro Tenants' Associations is a 21-year-old tenant organization. We represent over 100 tenant associations including 6,000 members across Metropolitan Toronto. The federation does work with many housing groups and has made several presentations to standing committees regarding residential housing issues. We were also involved with proposals to government and continue to assist tenants through ongoing education on Bill 120.

Over the years we have spoken with hundreds of tenants about their experiences living in accessory units without any protection from the Landlord and Tenant Act. These tenants' experiences range from various forms of intimidation to forcible evictions. Tenants of pre-RRA units have consistently voiced their concerns around issues of harassment by landlords with respect to lock-outs, rent increases and privacy violations, without the benefit of legal recourse. For these and other reasons, the federation was extremely pleased when the Residents' Rights Act was introduced. The act offers important protection to thousands of new tenants across the province. Finally tenants could breathe a sigh of relief and stand up for their rights.

Government now proposes to repeal subsection 35(1) and return the power to allow or disallow the creation of much-needed second housing units to the whim of local municipalities. There are as many as 150,000 tenants living in second units across the GTA. What efforts did municipalities make to help protect the tenants living in these units before Bill 120? How will these tenants, along with the many hundreds more who will continue to rent and live in accessory units, be protected if the RRA is repealed? Municipalities disallowing the creation of these units through zoning bylaws will not prevent landlords from renting their units, and people will continue to seek housing wherever they must. The knee-jerk repeal of subsection 35(1) will force tenants to be disempowered again, create new uncertainty, and force a return to illegal, unsafe housing conditions.

The federation is strenuously opposed to the repeal of this important piece of tenant protection. We feel that democracy demands that citizens must have the right to choose where they wish to live, without mandatory constraints by government. These zoning powers suggest the inherent right of government to choose to discriminate against a tenant's fundamental right to secure affordable, available housing.

We understand that tenants living in apartments in houses prior to November 16, 1995, will be allowed to continue and will still be covered under the RRA, provided that the landlords meet building and fire and safety standards. This suggests that the provincial government sees nothing wrong with homeowners providing safe, affordable second units or with tenants living where they choose. It further suggests that government understands the need for tenants living in these units to also have their rights protected.

If so, why would government waste time and money on dismantling tenant protection and erecting barriers to opportunities for more affordable private housing units? The RRA is about landlords, tenants and building safety. It is not about land use matters or municipal zoning policies.

We further understand that homeowners wishing to add new units to buildings will need local municipal approval and will be granted this where building and fire safety standards are met. Then why not allow the conditions of these safety standards to determine the whole approval process? In this way there would be no need to control where apartments may or may not be created by any municipality. Tenants could themselves safely report living in a second unit, and the need for protection of those living in second units would be addressed. This may also help the government to streamline an already complicated city bureaucracy and assist tenants in more practical ways.

The federation believes that this whole issue has little to do with problems that may or may not arise from the creation of second units in houses. The opportunity for city housing officials to register apartments and inspect for building and fire safety concerns is already within the jurisdiction of the local municipalities. They must look for practical ways to accomplish this. We are not aware of any study pointing to overwhelming problems arising from those apartments created since the passing of the RRA, and if it's not broken, why try to fix it? Efforts to repeal this section of the legislation are therefore unwarranted.

A reasonable person could assume that if tenants and landlords are satisfied with the RRA and desperately needed private affordable housing units are being created, government would celebrate and encourage this initiative, a major point being that Ontario suffers more from a critical shortage of affordable housing and less from a housing shortage itself.

Also, we would ask the committee to focus its efforts on what is in the best interests of the people of Ontario, without restrictions by the political ideologies of any government. After all, we know that tenants do need and will continue to seek out apartments in houses, regardless of municipal zoning bylaws. By the same token, homeowners will continue to offer their units to let, wherever and whenever they wish. We also know that if these tenants could afford to own their own homes or pay higher rents elsewhere, we would not be here today.

Finally, knowing all this, the federation believes that at the end of the day all tenants will still need to have housing protection. We therefore suggest that this committee has the opportunity and a responsibility, in making its final recommendations, to ensure that this very important piece of tenant protection continues.

On behalf of our membership, we wish to thank the committee for the opportunity to speak to this important issue.

Mr Hoy: You mentioned the government's stance on this issue of apartments in houses, as they're suggesting, prior to November 1995. It brings up an interesting question as to why the change, or the change of view.

However, you have said these are affordable houses. It's my belief that they are probably even more than that. I don't think the rents are very high in many, many cases, probably extremely low compared to what we see in the general rule of things. What do you think would happen if these second-tenant homes are assessed in any different way?

Mr Ballosingh: I don't think that anything would necessarily happen differently. I think that if they are assessed, the landlords may pay higher taxes and they may adjust the rents to reflect those higher taxes on the tenants. But the tenants would still be paying reasonably low rents, even in that situation, as compared to trying to rent a single apartment in the city.

Mr Hoy: They would be able to afford these small increases? Do you think they would?

Mr Ballosingh: I certainly believe they would and it would be preferable to them, as some of them would like to remain in these communities rather than down in the major urban city areas as well.

Mr Hoy: Certainly I, myself, would agree with fire and health safety being enforceable. What's your opinion on the issue of parking?

Mr Ballosingh: When I came to this country I had to rent a basement apartment myself because it was the only thing I could afford, and my experience was that there was adequate on-street parking in most cases. As well, there were instances where landlords lived in the houses, and many of them didn't own cars but had parking and they rented the parking to the tenant. So I, in that case, paid for parking in the landlord's spot because the landlord didn't have a car. You have a whole variety of cases that take place. It does not necessarily mean that there's going to be no parking available if people are renting second units.

Mr Hoy: The renters of these units, would they run the gamut of society? I know that many have said that they tend to be elderly or at the lower income scale, but would there not be other people using these as well? Could it be the same percentage as there is in all of society, or is it mainly the lower-income and/or elderly people who are renting these?

Mr Ballosingh: It may be mainly them, but I don't like to focus on the fact that it may be mainly them. Generally, the idea is that a lot of people who are just starting out need to pay lower rents, and as they begin to establish themselves and save some money, they are able to move out and to rent bigger apartments. So in that sense it is a transition-type of situation for most people. From that perspective, everybody who starts out starts from a low-income situation. But it is very important from that perspective.

Mr Conway: This is a subject that has bedeviled governments and legislatures for some time. We were led to believe here earlier today that in metropolitan Oshawa, for example, there is some kind of a parking tangle as a result of basement apartments. I remember a couple of years ago being in Stratford and hearing from municipal people that they were really concerned with the previous government's initiative in this respect, that it would put all kinds of pressure on water and sewer services. The parliamentary assistant today has hinted that perhaps owners and tenants in these basement apartments are getting a bit of a free ride in terms of assessment and taxation.

You make quite an eloquent case for entry-level housing, which any of us who has ever been a university student I think certainly appreciates. My friend and colleague from Kingston is not here, but anybody who knows anything about Queen's University appreciates something of what these units have meant in that community.

But how do you deal with the charges that are made that I think I probably summarized generally just a moment ago, that there is a kind of unregulated chaos and a bit of a free ride and God knows what else?

Mr Ballosingh: I suggest that if there is, it is because it has been forced to be that way for the longest while, and we're looking to try and make that different now. The argument about parking and all those different things, and strain on the community, I don't think it's valid really as a serious argument. There are instances where these things occur, yes, but by and large I don't think that is a major issue. There are apartment buildings right now that are not basement apartments, sort of duplex-type things, where the same problems occur and there's not enough parking available for the number of people who are renting from them. The landlord is renting a place that has a parking lot that can only take four cars and there are people living in the building, 12, 15 people who have cars renting units. They end up having to look for street parking in the same way. So you can't point at basement apartments or second units and say that they are the cause of this kind of problem. I think that's a red herring type of argument.

Mr Hampton: In this debate, if you can call it that, I've heard a lot of excuses about why apartments in this kind of situation shouldn't be permitted, but upon further analysis, that's what they turn out to be; they turn out to be excuses. So let me ask you this. What, in your view, is the real reason? What's the rationale behind all the smoke and the excuses for prohibiting the establishment of these kinds of apartments?

Mr Ballosingh: I think there are two major rationales for it. One is that it has been consistently something a few people have complained about because they would like to keep their areas a certain way and prevent certain types of people coming into their areas. They have raised their voices in that way, a small minority group of people, and they have had politicians react to them. Maybe they've been influential in that way with the politicians.

That's a small part of it, maybe less than the fact that because the municipalities had this privilege before, they were arguing to keep this privilege. I think that was the major thing. It's the issue of you having a privilege or law on your side that allows you to do whatever you wish, even if it is a regressive law, even if it is causing more problems than solutions, you don't mind so much because you have the choice to use it or not to use it, but you don't want anybody to take it away from you. The point is that somebody took it away from you and you want it back now. I don't think it makes any sense, because with all the arguments that were brought forward that these basement apartments would cause this problem and that problem, we haven't seen any evidence of that happening since the Residents' Rights Act.

Mr Hampton: You make the case that these apartments will exist anyway, with or without municipal bylaw approval. They will exist because people need housing and other people have room to spare and need an income.

Mr Ballosingh: Yes, I think so. It will definitely, because historically it has. We have an opportunity to correct that and prevent that from going back into a situation where we had no control over it.

Mr Hampton: And where unsafe conditions could prevail.

Mr Ballosingh: That's right.

Mr Hampton: The Conservative Party stakes a lot of its so-called revolution, if you do any reading at all, on essentially what Ronald Reagan did in the United States. The 30% tax cut is vintage Ronald Reagan. That's what he promised in his first economic statement: all the cutbacks to public services and to public employees. One of the things that happened with Ronald Reagan is that the number of poorer people increased dramatically, in other words, people living at or below the poverty line. What's going to happen to those folks in terms of finding housing in the kind of world Mr Harris is trying to create here in Ontario? Where are they going to find housing, in your view?

Mr Ballosingh: With respect to the basements and the second units, if you were to take that away and make it illegal, you would have the issue of people still using it with unsafe conditions. Also, if you were to close down those kinds of opportunities, you would have an increase in people needing the housing unable to access it and living on the streets. You would have people trying to cram more into one family unit, the very thing you're complaining about. You're going to have more of that: people trying to cram more into one unit because there are no available units out there. You're also going to have greater strains on family situations to try and accommodate people living where they can't find housing. You could build up a lot of additional social problems that you don't necessarily have to entertain if you simply do the right thing now.

Mr Hampton: So the demand for this kind of housing is likely to increase, not decrease.

Mr Ballosingh: Very much so.

1620

Mr Galt: Thanks for your interesting presentation, and thanks for looking out for those who need apartment-type housing.

Your preamble is interesting, and I'd like to respond for a few minutes to that and your reference to the Residents' Rights Act. The phone calls I'm getting are more from landlords, and they're very sad stories.

They're coming into my office with tears in their eyes because they haven't received rent in six months or four months or whatever and the tenant is stripping the inside of the apartment or the inside of the house and there's nothing they can do about it. I may hear from them a few months later that when they did finally get them out, the house or apartment was totally gutted and they left a pile of garbage inside. These are the kinds of stories I'm hearing in my riding office regularly, and they're claiming it's because of this Residents' Rights Act. They're very angry.

Just to respond to some of the comments you're making, it isn't all one-sided, and I'm beginning to wonder which way we have that playing field balanced between landlords and tenants. It's a tough one; I don't think we'll ever get it really sorted out. I just want you to know I'm hearing a different side, a very sad side, coming across on a very regular basis. It may be different in Toronto. I'm from rural Ontario.

The intent here is to register to try and ensure that safety standards, fire and so on, assessment and all the rest, are met. What's so terrible about that?

Mr Ballosingh: I didn't say that anything was terrible about it.

Mr Galt: That is how I interpreted your presentation of what we're trying to do.

Mr Ballosingh: No—

Mr Galt: So you agree with it?

Mr Ballosingh: I have said in my submission that these should be the criteria, allowing people to register for fire and safety and things like that.

Mr Galt: I may have misunderstood you, then. So you agree with registration to ensure the safety is there.

Mr Ballosingh: Yes. I am saying that repealing the Residents' Rights Act is what I don't understand. Why would the government want to do that? Why are they attacking that?

Mr Galt: Okay. Let me move to the next one, relating to municipalities making this decision rather than it being laid on the provincial level.

Mr Ballosingh: That's right, that's what I'm interested in.

Mr Galt: The municipalities are where this is happening; they're closer to the action. The message I'm getting in my area is: "It's another one of those so-called Toronto-based solutions being forced down our throats. We want to make our own decision in rural Ontario." How do you respond to that, and also the concern of the neighbours in this general area, with the overcrowding, when they bought a home thinking they were in an area of single dwellings?

Mr Ballosingh: Everybody has a right to live where they choose to live and the landlord has a right to rent the house if it's big. Some of the things you're raising—you're saying, for example, that landlords are complaining about tenants damaging their buildings and they can't get them out. That happens in every case I can think of, where you'd have a tenant like that, even in a high-rise building. I don't think it is subject to basement apartments, particularly. I am saying that if you give them the right legislation and the protection of the Landlord and Tenant Act, they can act upon it the same as any apartment person can do with a tenant who's behaving that way. I don't see that you can separate one from the other, from that point of view.

Mr Galt: To come back to the question of municipal decisions on that kind of housing, you tend not to agree with that.

Mr Ballosingh: No. I don't think they have a right to say where people can and cannot live if both parties agree to accommodate each other to create affordable housing. What does it have to do with the municipality? I don't understand.

Mr Galt: But you agree it should be a provincial decision.

Mr Ballosingh: I agree that the province should not allow municipalities to disallow the apartments but should give them the right to regulate them, inspect them for fire and safety standards.

The Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation today. I appreciate your comments and your taking time to appear before us.

ONTARIO ASSOCIATION OF COMMITTEES OF ADJUSTMENT AND CONSENT AUTHORITIES

The Chair: Our second-last presentation this afternoon is the Ontario Association of Committees of Adjustment and Consent Authorities. Good afternoon.

Mr David Brown: Good afternoon. My name is David Brown, and I'm the vice-president of the Ontario Association of Committees of Adjustment and Consent Authorities. That's a provincial association made up of members of committees of adjustment, members of land division committees, members of consent authorities and the staff who work for those various committees.

Our association has concern about what's being proposed. I've submitted a copy of a letter our association has forwarded to the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing, and I'm going to start midway through the first paragraph and read that as my submission this afternoon.

The Ontario Association of Committees of Adjustment and Consent Authorities has grave concerns with the changes being proposed in section 26 of Bill 20.

The bill proposes to change section 45 of the Planning Act by exchanging the term "committee of adjustment" with "council" and "the secretary-treasurer" with "the clerk." The bill introduces a new subsection that states any decision of council is final. The removal of the right of appeal in the minor variance process is a serious proposition. People care greatly about their homes, their businesses and their rights to make changes to their properties. They also rely on the opportunity to oppose changes that they perceive will negatively impact on their property or business. People rely on the fair, impartial and full hearing that is available to them, if necessary, at the Ontario Municipal Board. They may not always agree with the decision, but the objectivity, impartiality and fairness of the appeal process is a fundamental right that is critically important to the parties involved and essential to the functioning of the system.

The authority for council to appoint a committee of adjustment remains. However, if that committee includes a member of council, the committee's decision will be final. In this instance, the concerns noted above are applicable. If the council appoints a committee that does not include a member of the council, then Bill 20 introduces section 45.1 to deal with the appeal process for a decision of the committee of adjustment. Appeals are directed to council and the council must determine the manner in which the appeal will be considered. Council may deal with the appeal or refer the appeal to the OMB.

If a council refers an appeal to the OMB, the municipality—council—is responsible for the costs incurred by the OMB in the consideration of the appeal. It is very unlikely that any council will pay the OMB to make a decision which they have the authority to make. Therefore, council will exercise their authority to consider an appeal. The proposition that elected municipal councils should hear appeals from their own appointed committee of adjustment on a minor variance to a zoning bylaw, that was passed by council, is unusual and unsatisfactory. Considerable expenses and expenditures of time will be incurred, as council members will be acting in a judicial role as opposed to the normal legislative role. This is not appropriate and raises legal concerns with respect to the hearing of an appeal. In order to conduct a hearing, as that term is used in law, all members of council would have to be present for the entire hearing, each of which, on average, would take a half-day to a full day. This increase in workload for council will further bog down the current approval process. This raises a question as to whether the proposals will streamline the current approval process.

Appeals to council will create a significant conflict in council's position and responsibilities. Council could not direct staff to appeal a decision of the committee of adjustment that council does not favour when it was then directing that appeal to itself. I believe there is some significant question in law as it currently stands if council could in fact provide a blanket delegation to staff without some proviso whereby, on individual appeals, there would be some council endorsement of the correctness of staff's decision. Otherwise, the appellant would not be the municipality but would in fact be staff itself. It is clear that council could not be both the appellant and the adjudicator in an appeal. There would be clear apprehension of bias for any respondent to such an appeal.

A real impact that could arise from the elimination of the ability to appeal to the OMB is an increase in the number of rezoning applications being considered by municipal councils where the process provides for an appeal. Unsuccessful applicants before the committee of adjustment will apply for a rezoning and appeal the request to the OMB. This will not reduce approval times nor will it result in the decisions being made at the municipal level. It will result in the creation of additional red tape as the approval time will likely be increased. The workload of the OMB will remain relatively unchanged. It should also be noted that information provided by the OMB indicates that minor variance appeals represent only 14% of the board's workload and less than 6% of the board's hearing time.

There have been improvements made to reduce the OMB appeal time frames and these should continue to be supported. It is the opinion of the association that these percentages are not large enough to justify changing a process that currently works very well.

1630

For these reasons, the Ontario Association of Committees of Adjustment and Consent Authorities is opposed to the changes being proposed by section 26 of Bill 20. The government's commitment to streamline and speed up the planning process is welcome; however, it should not be at the expense of the integrity of the process.

Thank you and I'd be willing to answer any questions.

Mr Hampton: I guess I'm left to ask you this: If the legislation stays as is, what kinds of situations do you anticipate will happen both in terms of process and also in terms of the legal ramifications?

Mr Brown: With respect to the current process, in light of the changes that the OMB is making in terms of reducing its time frames, I believe the current process as it's constituted in the Planning Act will not have any impact on that and I think we'll continue to see the time frames at the OMB reduced to the point where they will be acceptable, whatever time frame that may be—three, four months to have an appeal considered. Currently, I understand it's approximately eight months and that's if you're fortunate.

Mr Hampton: To your knowledge, how much have the OMB time frames come down already over the last four or five years?

Mr Brown: At one point, it was approximately 12 to 14 months for an appeal of a minor variance to be heard by the OMB. Currently, again depending on the nature of the appeal, they are being heard in approximately 10- to 12-month time frames for a full hearing. However, the OMB has initiated a number of steps and processes to help reduce this time frame.

There's a short hearing process and settlement hearing processes where they will invite the parties to sit down, discuss the issues, flesh the issues out in essence, and sometimes they'll be able to deal with the issues right there and then. Those types of applications can be on for a hearing in three to four months. Because of the time frames and the scheduling of the board, they can achieve that.

The board has separated the nature of the appeals and this has enabled a larger majority of the appeals to get dealt with in a much more expeditious manner.

Mr Hampton: What do you think, in comparison to that, the net impact of what is being proposed here in Bill 20 will be, and what kind of situation do you think this is going to place people like yourself in in terms of orderly process, in terms of outcomes people can live with and in terms of fairness?

Mr Brown: I believe it's going to have a very real impact on the integrity of the process. Currently, it's a process that's set up where the elected individuals who sit on council appoint a committee of adjustment and that committee has rules set out in the Planning Act that it operates within. If you feel or an individual feels that they have not been dealt with fairly, they have the right to appeal and they can take it to, in essence, a higher court.

The proposed changes, as I understand them being proposed in Bill 20, I would anticipate are going to confuse the process considerably as there are going to be a number of different possible avenues through which a minor variance could be dealt with. As well, you have the elected council members appointing a committee and then, in essence, reviewing every or any decision it would make. In that instance, I think you'd be just as well ahead to have the council make the decision in the first place and to eliminate any possible hope, if you will, in the event that the committee deals with it in one manner and the council doesn't wish it to be dealt with in that manner.

I question the ability of council to deal with these types of appeals in the same manner that committees across the province have, over the last 20 years, been able to develop in terms of process, having the public hearing, individuals getting their day in court and having a fair decision issued by your neighbours, in essence, the members of the committee of adjustment.

That's where I see that with what's being proposed, you're going to have a wide range in terms of the makeup of committees and that's going to have a real impact on the current process that has taken a long time to create, but I think it currently works very well.

Mr Hampton: Do you think that people who would come before such a committee or such a council would be concerned about the confusion of fair decision-making with respect to a specific matter, the confusion of that with frankly political overtones?

Mr Brown: Very much so. My current employment is as the secretary-treasurer of the committee of adjustment in the city of Mississauga, and on a regular basis applicants will ask: "Who are the committee members and what political ramification do I have to be aware of? Do I go and see my councillor or do I not go and see my councillor?" On a regular basis I have to indicate who the committee are, how they're made up, what their is relationship to council.

Currently in Mississauga there are no members of council sitting on the committee of adjustment. They are all citizen appointments. With respect to the councillors' involvement in the process, it's been the process developed in Mississauga that the council gets the opportunity to participate as any other concerned or interested party would. It's a process that seems to work very well in Mississauga.

Mr Hardeman: First of all, I'd like to say it seems somewhat consistent. The majority of people coming before us today have expressed some concern about the right to appeal minor variances. I'd just point out one flaw in the present system, that we seem to have some trouble defining what a minor variance is. If everything that was before the committee of adjustment was truly a minor variance, I would find it hard to believe why there would be such a concern that they should not only be decided, but be appealable, if it was truly minor.

You mentioned the numbers of how much of the OMB's time was spent on minor variance appeals. I wonder if you have any idea how many of those appeals were lodged by the applicant as opposed to someone who was opposed to the minor variance being granted.

Mr Brown: I'm sorry, I don't have that information, but I would suggest that is available at the Ontario

Municipal Board. They have provided me with information and that's where I got my numbers from.

Just further to that point, the number of appeals that are currently before the Ontario Municipal Board with respect to minor variances, I heard some comments earlier in the afternoon that Toronto seems to have a different manner in dealing with some issues.

I suggest to you that the municipalities outside of Toronto, and whether they be large or small, would have a very similar format in terms of dealing with the committee of adjustment. Similarly, the number of appeals of those decisions are not that great. In Toronto, there seems to be a much higher percentage of appeals that are being directed to the Ontario Municipal Board. In one of the discussions I've had with some of the people I've been discussing this with, it was suggested that perhaps it might be appropriate to look at the manner Toronto deals with it and provide some special or unique legislation for it when considering minor variance appeals. Outside of that, the rest of the province seems to be operating quite well.

Mr Hardeman: The other comment was regarding the problem with the appeal being to council when council was also the appointing body that appointed the committee of adjustment. I ask this one in all sincerity. I come from an area of the province where all the committees of adjustment are the elected councils; there are no appointed committees of adjustment. I was just wondering if you do not see the same problem presently existing where we have the need for the appointing body also appealing a decision of the appointed people. Would that not over a period of time, if there were too many cases where a council had to appeal a committee of adjustment's decision—at the next opportunity they would appoint a different committee of adjustment and in fact it would be somewhat—

Mr Brown: I suggest council has that ability at any time. After an election, council appoints its various committees. The committee is passed by bylaw, and if there was some concern with the makeup or the behaviour of that committee, council has the ability to repeal the bylaw and appoint a new committee with a new bylaw. I suggest that control or ability is there currently. Also, the council, if it is not satisfied with the decision, has the right to appeal that decision to the OMB as would any other interested party. Those are my comments in that respect.

Mrs Fisher: I respect your opinion with regard to the appeal process on minor variances. I'm not clear yet who you might think should bear the cost if the appeal goes to the OMB. I get the impression you certainly don't want it held at a local level board, but if it's to go forward, you have maybe half the solution to half the problem you raised, but I'm wondering about the costs.

Mr Brown: The costs of processing an appeal, in my opinion, would be phenomenal. With the professional representation that is required, the time that is involved of the OMB's part, I think the cost of processing an appeal in the manner that the authority is given to the OMB to charge a fee would be easily in the area of $3,000 to $4,000 to $5,000 per appeal. I have no information to substantiate that other than my personal experience. When you deal with planners, lawyers and the like, the costs run quite high.

There's also a provision that the board can recover any additional costs that were not anticipated and if a hearing goes into two to three weeks, which often they do, even over a minor variance, it could be tens of thousands of dollars, in which case the municipality is responsible for that and it may be a question of whether or not the appeal is really warranted or worth that, but if the municipality doesn't have that ability to say that this is a frivolous appeal or a vexatious appeal, then they're going to be on the hook for paying the $4,000 to $5,000 for any person who has an interest in appealing.

My concern would be that if there's no responsibility on the appellant, and it may be a minor amount just to show their intentions are serious, that's where I have some concern with that.

Mr Gerretsen: I enjoyed your presentation. Although I didn't hear the whole thing, I've had a chance to read your brief. How long have you been in your present position with the committee?

Mr Brown: Seven years.

Mr Gerretsen: How many minor variance matters would come before the committee, let's say on an annual basis?

Mr Brown: Between 700 and 750.

Mr Gerretsen: From your experience then of having dealt with maybe almost 5,000 of these applications over the last seven years, how often has the Mississauga council appealed one of the committee's decisions to the OMB?

Mr Brown: I would say probably once or twice in a year.

Mr Gerretsen: Right.

Mr Brown: The next half of that, sir, would be whether or not that actually goes to a full hearing.

Mr Gerretsen: Right.

Mr Brown: Oftentimes it's a tactic, if you will, that the municipality can indicate, "These are our concerns and if you address those, we'll withdraw our appeal." I've seen that happen more often than not. I think in my seven years there's been one gone to a full hearing.

Mr Gerretsen: But in any event, councils don't normally appeal their own committee of adjustment decisions. It would be very rare, wouldn't it?

Mr Brown: Yes, I think that would be.

Mr Gerretsen: Now would you agree with me that a 10-month to 12-month waiting period to have a minor variance appeal heard by the OMB is still way too long?

Mr Brown: I think it is a long time. I think you have to put it into perspective with other time frames by the same token. The board is working towards reducing those time frames. Our association, because we are interested in the appeal process, does work closely with the OMB to discuss ways of improving the process and I think they are making steps in reducing that, but a 10-month wait is an awful long time.

Mr Gerretsen: I must admit there seems to be some confusion as to how quickly the board reacts to it, because I believe the minister, in his statement in the House when this legislation was introduced, was talking in terms of the OMB dealing with matters within a matter of three, four or five months after a matter was referred to the OMB, and he wasn't just dealing with minor variances. So I find 10 or 12 months somewhat at variance with that.

I suggested this morning that maybe one way around this is to set up a small panel of the OMB of, let's say, six or seven members, on a rotating basis, that could deal with these minor variances in a very expedient manner. Is there any reason you can think of in a minor variance situation why, from a practical viewpoint, the individuals involved could not be ready to deal with their appeal within a two-month time period after the committee has made its decision?

Mr Brown: In most appeals I think that would be fair. Cost is going to be a big issue. The other half of that, however, is that while some individuals may consider an application minor, typically the applicants, the appellants would not see it that way, and it does take a considerable amount of time to prepare a professional response to refute or to oppose a decision of the committee. That's where I've seen applicants require at least three to four months to get their case prepared and get it together and get something that is in a form that is presentable to the OMB.

I would suggest to you that a three- to four-month time frame is not an unreasonable time frame. I'm sure that everyone would like to see two months, but I think, in an attempt to be reasonable, three to four months would be acceptable. I see the board on their way to achieving that.

Mr Gerretsen: The other question: In your experience, have you ever seen the OMB actually reject an appeal on the basis that it was frivolous? Have they actually ever, in your experience, invoked that section?

Mr Brown: No, they have not. They have had motions put forward that were quite strong and quite clear. Typically, the appellants withdraw their appeal before it goes to motion. I have yet to see a decision of the board where they've dismissed an appeal on the grounds of being frivolous.

Mr Gerretsen: What about this intermediary step, mediation etc, that was introduced a number of years ago? Has that actually speeded up the process, as far as coming to some sort of final resolution of the issue is concerned? Or is it just another almost semibureaucratic mechanism that has been added into the process?

Mr Brown: I don't that it's shortened the time frame, but it has shortened the hearing time. I understand that a lot of the difficulty at the OMB is in scheduling hearing time. They have to go so far in advance to make sure they've got the right complement of members and sufficient time available. So what it does do is to clarify for them the amount of time required for a hearing, but it doesn't, in my experience, expedite the process in terms of time frame.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Brown, for your presentation before us here today.

SAVE THE ROUGE VALLEY SYSTEM

The Chair: This brings us to our final presentation today, Save the Rouge Valley System, Mr Stephen Marshall. Good afternoon, Steve. We have, as you probably heard me say before, 25 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between the presentation and questions and answers.

Mr Stephen Marshall: Certainly. I'm very pleased that the Chair of the committee is a strong supporter of Save the Rouge and has been for a long time. It makes me feel quite at home.

The comments I'm forwarding are not accompanied a written form for distribution. We're anticipating that there may be questions and we wanted to be able to carefully revise our recommendations. We'll be forwarding those in written form for your consideration by the deadline.

The SRVS, for those not familiar with it, is a community-oriented, non-profit, incorporated, volunteer-based watershed conservation group formed 20 years ago by people who were witness to the degradation of the Don and wished to prevent a similar occurrence happening in the Rouge. The mandate of our group includes protecting and enhancing the environment of the Rouge, encouraging the preparation of a master development plan for the watershed, seeking support from community groups, officials and planning bodies having an influence, and increasing public awareness and respect for the natural resources of the Rouge.

We have had, as a group, extensive experience with the land use planning exercises in three regions and six local municipalities through three versions of the Planning Act. For a lot of years our members and other interested individuals fought and lost battles for the protection of the cultural and natural heritage of the watershed. We lost the Centennial swamp in Scarborough; recently we lost part of a provincially significant wetland in the Townline swamp complex in Pickering.

In Markham, Richmond Hill, Scarborough and other municipalities over the years we are witness to wetlands being bulldozed, forests and woodlots cut down, streams buried or encased in concrete, very extensive destruction, all the more serious, in our minds, because of the effects of urbanization, of development, following nearly 200 years of logging, industrial activity and clearance for farms in the watershed. The cumulative effects of these activities has been described by other people, but it's clear there's a tremendous decline in the ecological health of the watershed in southern Ontario. As an instance, the Atlantic salmon, which once sustained an important commercial fishery, became extinct in the Great Lakes, the last known salmon caught off the mouth of the Rouge in 1898. The township of Markham, for instance, once a rich and diverse environment, was by the turn of the century a moonscape, and even now is only 3% mature forest covering.

Throughout southern Ontario the picture is similar: fragments remaining, and what remains is under stress. No one is suggesting that southern Ontario shouldn't have been settled, nor much of the land cleared for farming. We are here today because of that history. My own family is part of its heritage, my grandfather having had the honour of being Minister of Agriculture for this province, as well as a distinguished cattle breeder. From his papers and books, I have garnered a concern for healthy growth rather than unbridled development, understanding it's not a question of either/or: either economic development or ecological community and health.

This understanding that growth needn't involve destruction, and a concern for this destruction, is one of the main themes underlying public pressure for changes in the 1983 Planning Act. The developers were concerned about inefficient and costly bureaucracy, the public about municipal corruption and the deterioration of air, water and land. The previous two governments were asked, or commanded, in a sense, by the strength of public opinion, to address these concerns. The process to revise the 1983 Planning Act and the attendant policies involved a long, thorough, careful, broad-based, province-wide consultation with all interests in the planning process. I must say with respect that those characteristics are not applicable to the current process.

When the new, call it 1995, planning system was put in place, we knew that there were a lot of development applications in the pipe, applied for or approved under the old rules, that would still cause destruction and degradation of the natural heritage system of the Rouge for a few years in various locales. We're still dealing with those. As a watershed on the south slope of the Oak Ridges moraine, the Rouge is vulnerable to the ballooning urbanization of the Toronto megalopolis.

None the less, we understood under the new rules that the Rouge did have a future. We could anticipate protection of the natural wealth that exists and the opportunities for restoration of much of the ecosystem. We are currently planning, for instance, restoration projects throughout the watershed that are designed to bring back the extinct species, Lake Ontario Atlantic salmon. We feel it would be a fitting remembrance for the 100th anniversary of the extinction of this species in Lake Ontario to launch a major effort to reintroduce the fish.

We knew that under the new rules, the destruction of the Rouge would gradually cease and we could turn it around. We're more than halfway through the turnaround decade, after all. We knew that Toronto would not, like Phoenix or Los Angeles, sprawl outwards, destroying virtually everything in its path: farm land, community identity and heritage, natural areas and systems. We could look forward to sustainable growth, development without long-term costs to the taxpayer and the community.

Unfortunately, now that confidence is gone. What Bill 20 and, even more, the policy statement will do, we feel, is to remove any certainty or consistency of planning in the watershed. Official plans will be of varying quality and detail, often amended, supplying little direction or consistency. Applications, even the most outrageously destructive and nonsensical, such as subdivisions and woodlots and valley corridors in the countryside, miles from any urban area, golf courses in wetlands, or all of those put together—which seems to be the latest enthusiasm—will likely come forward, be heard cursorily and hastily by councils, without opportunity for significant provincial input, with very constrained public input, and then go to the board. At the board, who knows? With the comprehensive policy statements changed into the current abbreviated version, with official plans disregarding policy anyway, any outcome is possible. Under the proposed system we feel the likelihood of efficient growth, farm land preservation or environmental protection prevailing is very slight.

We see, under the new rules, accelerated urban sprawl and splatter, ex-urban developments, construction in significant natural areas, little or no attention paid to surface water, less to groundwater—in a sense, a shotgun blast at the Rouge, no one pellet fatal, but the cumulative effect very disturbing. Under the old rules, the Rouge was suffering the death of a thousand cuts; what we fear is that the proposed new rules will accelerate this.

Our perspective is both local—Toronto-based, if you like, GTA—and provincial, having worked on these concerns for many years, and with other groups on the provincial issues. Based on this experience, I wish to convey to you that our view of the proposed amendments to the Planning Act and the policy statements amount to setting the stage for significant degradation in our watershed and, we anticipate, across southern Ontario.

Recommendations to ameliorate these negative changes are difficult to put forward, given the scope of the proposed change. Mere wordsmithing can't really address the drastic alterations proposed. One step that was suggested to us is if you leave the policies completely alone, and look to flexibility through rewording of the role of policies, subsection 3(5). A planner we sometimes hire for dealing with issues suggested 3(5) could be reworded to say something to the effect that the public bodies, in the exercise of any authority that affects a planning matter, would "adhere to the principles contained in the policy statements...and to the principles contained in...official plans." This is an example of a different approach which retains the consistency and integrity of the policy statements, as devised over four years, but leaves the sought-for flexibility.

Another general concern we have is with official plans, having dealt with nine—eight; nine only recently—and their ability under the proposal to be amended frequently, quickly and with no requirement for consistency with, or even acknowledging in some cases, provincial policy statements. For instance, the deletion of subsection 26(4) prevents the province from, however you phrase it, requiring consistency with the policy statements. Without the amendment of subsection 23(1), the minister doesn't have the ability to even request, if an official plan is right off the wall, that it conform at least to some degree to provincial policies.

As I mentioned earlier, significant specific recommendations for changes are difficult to draw. What I've tried to convey to you is our concern about the scope of what is proposed, about what we anticipate to be the effect, based on 20 years of experience in a watershed which is urban and near-urban, next to Toronto. Thank you.

Mr Ouellette: Thank you for your presentation. I'm just going to ask a couple of questions to find out a little more detail about your organization.

First of all I'd like to know, do you have a specific policy regarding muskrats, and are you familiar with the damage that muskrats perform on river banks? Secondly, you mentioned the Atlantic salmon. Exactly what your organization doing in order to assist the reintroduction of the Atlantic salmon? Thirdly, on the tree-cutting policy of Durham region, how does that affect, or what's your position on, that particular policy?

Mr Marshall: I'll start with the last. I am not the person who is responsible for dealing with Pickering and Durham, so I can't address that in any detail, but I will go back and inquire.

The second question, about Atlantic salmon: We have a proposal to the federal government for funding for the restoration of the Little Rouge watershed on a continuing basis over a great number of years. We're also working on that on our own. We have a number of partnerships with the MTRCA, the MNR and the local municipalities for restoration projects. We're working with the Atlantic salmon group, which is a collection of experts from Canada, Ontario and other interested fishing groups, on determining the requirements; most of this has already been determined through studies in the Rouge watershed, so we're at the stage of implementing the requirements. It appears to be, based on the technical information to date, that there's not very much to prevent the Little Rouge watershed, which is extensively rural, from being rehabilitated to allow Atlantic salmon to exist.

Should it become urbanized, that question changes completely. Part of our concern is that with the proposed changes, prevention of ex-urban growth or rural splatter or sprawl is substantially diminished, and that even with the best intents of municipalities it could occur, could be approved through the OMB, and it would not be a rural watershed; it would become fully urbanized and, as fishery experts around the world know, beyond a certain limit, whatever you do, however carefully you do it, you've lost the river.

The first question was muskrat. We usually work in conjunction with interested parties—for instance, land owners who have suffered damage from beaver and muskrat—and the MNR in dealing with these technical questions. We don't presume to know the answers all by ourselves.

Mr Galt: Thank you very much. A most interesting presentation, and obviously you're very concerned about the environment and its protection. Let me assure you that this government is as well, as we're setting very tough standards to protect that environment.

I don't think you said so in so many words, but I expect you were making reference to "being consistent with" versus "having due regard for" as one of the areas of concern. This morning I used the word "expropriation," and maybe I shouldn't have used that particular word, but farmers, land owners, have lost, as a result of the previous bill, some of their rights to be able to use their lands. They were not warned; it was just laid upon them with no indication whatsoever.

We're looking at, as we go out with these hearings, the old wording of "being consistent with" is being interpreted as super rigid, and I gather from your presentation the words "having due regard for" are not. I see "having due regard for" being just about as rigid, except it leaves a little flexibility in there. I personally think local municipalities should have some flexibility but have the certainty of this very specific guidance. Do you see some other wording that would leave a little opening for municipalities to have some flexibility, yet certainty being left in the system?

Mr Marshall: Yes. What I had alluded to without being specific was an alternative wording that was suggested in section 3.5, referring to the minister and public bodies in exercising planning authority. Instead of "being consistent with" or "having regard for," it had been suggested by one expert we talked to that the wording would be something to the effect of "adhere to the principles contained in the policy statements and to the principles contained in approved official plans." The distinction this individual made was that if there is no commitment to the official plans, there's no consistency in planning in the municipality and it would be completely ad hoc. This diminution of certainty or common understanding is liable to result in an adversarial process throughout—extensively, everywhere. I dread to think how the OMB can possibly handle it under the proposed changes.

Mr Galt: One of the problems we have is that we really don't know what our laws say until they've gone through the test of the courts and then we start to find out. Interestingly, your wording, "adhere to the principles of," is a different approach from either of the other two. I'm sorry I missed it in your presentation, but I've jotted it down.

Mr Gerretsen: Your presentation is very interesting, because you obviously don't represent developers or municipalities, all of whom are getting something out of this legislation specifically.

I'd like to follow up on that last point. The same point was made earlier today by John Sewell, who basically said if you go with the wording "having regard to," you're making it so broad and wide that even in the situation where both the municipality and a developer want to have a certain development go ahead, you're allowing the opponents of that development to build up arguments on almost anything at all that would have to be adhered to by the OMB, because there aren't any principles or guidelines the municipality has to follow in coming up with the planning decision.

You, in a different way, from a different aspect perhaps, have come up with exactly the same conclusion. What concerns me about that is, first of all, process. You've talked about process, how you were involved in changes to the other act and how long it took etc. What comments or suggestions do you have with respect to the process that was followed in the changes to this act?

Mr Marshall: I can't be complimentary. The process that led, for instance, to the policy statements was very extensive, did involve everybody. There was a number of revisions. It was put out; it was clear who the author was. And there was opportunity for comment and consideration. There may be a couple of lumps and warts on it, but it hung together pretty well as a set of policy statements.

In the version we have now, there are glaring inconsistencies that flatly contradict each other. There are definitions that don't have words in the text. It looks like it was knocked together fairly hastily. Most of the environmental protection has been stripped out, farm land protection, incentives to control urban sprawl. Each of these has an effect on an urban fringe area. The Rouge is one of the watersheds that's under the gun, so to speak—different from eastern or central Ontario; the issues there are different. But the pressures in watersheds like the Rouge are extremely intense.

Mr Gerretsen: Would you agree with me that to effect changes to a municipality's official plan, you should go through a more extensive process than to change a particular zoning bylaw? I believe what's suggested in the bill is that basically the same process and same time lines are being adhered to. Does that make sense to you?

Mr Marshall: Our concern about the time lines for changing official plans or for addressing private official plan amendments—private official plan amendments can be small or enormous in their effect. The time line is very short. Metro, I know, in the planner's brief to council, said that council may not be able to deal with the official plan amendment because the time lines are too short. Council sits; there's no space. The public would have a difficult time addressing it. If it moves that fast, you may wind up having planners' recommendations at the OMB because it never even got to council.

If an official plan is easy to amend and it's quick to amend and it could be amended drastically and it doesn't have to adhere to the policies, where is the consistency? We're afraid that people are going to come in with loopy ideas. We've been to the OMB on either side, as an appellant and as a respondent, and, if you'll pardon the allusion to an American dice game, it's a crap shoot. You don't know what you're going to get under the old rules. You really didn't. You'd look at the member and you'd think, "I think I know where this is going," but there just doesn't seem to be any consistency. We had an OMB member who completely disregarded the wetlands policy statement. He said: "Oh, I 'had regard to.' Now we'll get on with it."

Mr Gerretsen: Do you have concerns that subdivisions can be approved without any public meeting at all?

Mr Marshall: I imagine that anybody neighbouring the subdivision would be very upset when they find out it's already approved, gone, finished, and they never even knew about it. We can't agree with that. Some of the details in subdivisions make the difference between development that is appropriate, efficient and protects the environment and one that just wipes everything out. These details are really important.

Mr Gerretsen: Exactly, and sometimes the general public will have a much better appreciation of where the parkland ought to be situated within a subdivision, for example, and how the streets ought to be laid out than the developer and even the municipality might have.

Mr Marshall: Whether they do or they don't, they certainly should be able to speak to it, because it affects them directly.

Ms Churley: Thank you very much, Mr Marshall, for coming to give your presentation. I want to make a comment. Mr Galt, with all due respect, said for the second time today that this government is strongly protecting the environment, in language like that, and I just want to put on the record that this government is dismantling over 20 years of environmental protection that's been put in place, through this bill and numerous other bills, including Bill 26, right under our noses. It appears that even government members aren't aware of that or they wouldn't say such things.

I'd like to point out that in this area perhaps I should be listened to a little bit. I come from Newfoundland, and I was one of the people, even though I was in Toronto at the time on Toronto city council, who participated in a rally here in Toronto with Newfoundlanders to try to persuade governments that there was a fish problem, a resource-consumption problem: overfishing in Newfoundland. Nobody listened. The then Conservative government in Ottawa was saying, "We've got to balance the environment with economics, blah, blah, blah." Nobody listened until the fish disappeared. The fish have disappeared. It is an example of what happens when these issues which are brought forward by people like you and others are ignored. "Oh, we've got to balance." That's what happens.

It's very important that people like you are not seen as just another special-interest group trying to impede development. Of course you're not trying to do that. You're trying to make sure that—I get emotional about this. I have family members who can't make a living any more because they didn't listen to people like Mr Marshall. I just wanted to thank you for your presentation today and urge the government members to listen very closely to what people like Mr Marshall have to say.

Mr Marshall: I didn't emphasize, and I perhaps should, that we are not and never have been an anti- or no-growth-or-development group. What we promote is responsible, good development, and that's what we work with developers, municipalities and government agencies always to achieve.

The other point is that I would be absolutely delighted if there was a balance between growth and development and the environment. Actually, there is: It's 1% this way, and 99% this way. If we went 50-50, I think it would be absolutely fabulous. We have inherited 200 years of destruction, and we are in serious trouble. The water quality and the air quality are not getting any better, and our natural areas are disappearing. If it really were 50-50, we'd be putting a lot of effort into restoration, because protection isn't the issue; protection and restoration are what's required. If there were that balance, it would be wonderful. Unfortunately, the amendments proposed to the act and policy statements make it 0.5% and 99.5%. It doesn't really go the right way towards the balance, in our opinion.

Mr Hampton: Stephen, I want to ask you one question based on the statements you've made here today. If I heard you, you're basically saying that going back from "be consistent with" to "have regard to" is the wrong move, and that it is especially so when the policy statements themselves are being watered down severely; with the removal of the requirement that official plans be comprehensive, in other words, can be anything the council wants them to be now; with the provision for 90 days to amend an official plan, in other words, to amend the official plan at will; and finally, with the minister relinquishing the approval power for plans passed by upper-tier municipalities. What do you think the net effect of all those things will be in terms of the Rouge River Valley and the surrounding lands? If all this is being taken out of planning, what do you think the net effect will be on the Rouge River Valley and the surrounding lands in terms of some of the battles you likely foresee in the next few years?

Mr Marshall: Our concern is that if the proposals are carried and stay in place, most of the battles would be lost before they began; that we would have development in and by PARC itself, and development in areas where it should not be: sensitive groundwater recharge, natural areas, river valleys. With the cumulative effect of the urban expansion and the ex-urban development, which is sometimes more serious, up in the moraine, golf course subdivisions, we're concerned that under these rules, and depending on the market—things may happen and there may be no development at all; it's quite beyond the Planning Act to determine what the market will be, and this is irrelevant to the market, in a sense—if the market picks up like it did in the late 1980s, we'll lose the whole shebang. That's what we're worried about. We'll wind up like the Don or like the Humber.

The Chair: Thank you both. With that, we've reached—exceeded, actually—our allotted time. Thank you again, Mr Marshall. I noticed that during your presentation Ms Lois James has joined you. Continued good luck to both of you in your endeavours. Thank you for coming down to make presentation before us today.

With that, that being the last item on our agenda this afternoon, the committee stands adjourned until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning back in this room.

The committee adjourned at 1715.

JEFFREY DAVIES

The Vice-Chair (Ms Barbara Fisher): Good morning. Sorry for the delay in starting. Sometimes that happens first thing in the morning. We welcome everybody to our hearings.

Just to outline a little bit the parameters around how we will operate this morning, we will allow 25 minutes for a presentation, to be used in whichever way, shape or form you choose. Welcome, Mr Davies.

Mr Jeffrey Davies: Good morning. I thought I would put some ideas before your committee. The ideas are solely my own. I have the privilege of working as a lawyer in the land use process and I thought that outlook would provide me with an opportunity to make some suggestions to your committee with regard to the way in which the bill could be improved, bearing in mind its original intent.

I have provided a letter to your clerk and I believe he's circulated it. Perhaps I could just give you an overview of these suggestions. I don't know if there would be any questions, but I'd be pleased to discuss it with you.

With regard to subdivisions and Bill 20, one of the things that is clear by analogy is that an appeal of an official plan amendment may be made directly to the Ontario Municipal Board. The bill takes away the step of seeking a referral through either the minister or a region. That may be the intent as well for subdivisions, but my reading of the bill makes that unclear and it would be extremely helpful if subdivisions could be appealed or referred to the municipal board without the intervening step of going through the minister or the region. This, in my view, is a needless step which simply promotes a lot of paperwork.

In looking at your bill, simple changes could be made to subsections 51(34) and 51(48) that would make it abundantly clear that a subdivision could be appealed directly to the Ontario Municipal Board. It presently takes three or four months at the very least to get a referral of a subdivision through the minister or through a region and this is just a total waste of time in my view. In that you're looking at speeding things up and making them more efficient, reducing the red tape, I'd strongly encourage you to make that simple amendment which would be greatly helpful to everyone.

That point regarding subdivisions is a procedural item. The second thing is a substantive item. That's my item (b). By way of analogy, if I may, under section 41 of the Planning Act, if one appeals a site plan to the Ontario Municipal Board, the Ontario Municipal Board has the jurisdiction under section 41 to actually settle the agreement so that when the hearing is over and you have a decision, you actually have a site plan agreement that is binding on the parties.

No such similar provision applies to subdivisions. Subdivision disputes are handled at the municipal board by referring conditions of draft plan approval and having the board revise the conditions. In highly detailed situations the board has detailed the conditions in a manner that would attempt to impose a subdivision agreement, but when the hearing is over the parties still have to go back and write a subdivision agreement. In my view, if the bill were amended, it would be a real improvement if the municipal board had parallel powers dealing with subdivision agreements as it does with site plan agreements, and I very strongly recommend that to you as a matter of getting things done and looking for finality.

On page 2 of my letter, I talk about dismissal without hearing and you have provisions in Bill 20 for dismissal without hearing. However, there are lots of situations where you have appeals, particularly of zoning bylaws which clearly comply with the official plan and which are not eligible for dismissal without a hearing or even some kind of summary procedure.

Most of these appeals are clearly in the form of nuisance appeals and it seems to me, with respect, that you ought to consider some form of summary dismissal where a bylaw can be shown to clearly comply with the official plan. Then a full-blown hearing dealing with the appeal ought not to be necessary. I don't view this as being a terribly difficult thing and, again, it would speed up the process and help to foster growth.

The third thing that I talk about in my submission is zoning. With regard to item (a), there are lots of situations where the most ridiculous disputes grind the system to a halt. I think you all know that. Often those disputes are not at all fundamental. One of my favourite anecdotes is a case I did years ago in Scarborough where a proposal was stopped because of a dispute over the colour of the window frames in a high-rise building. There was simply nothing that could be done, short of going to court or going to the municipal board, to break that logjam.

In my view, you ought to consider some form of speedy dispute resolution for situations which are not of a fundamental nature, but which none the less are stopping the system. These happen on a daily basis and are entirely counterproductive.

The second point I make under zoning has to do with your paragraph 3.2 of subsection 34(1). This is a section I suspect you'll be hearing from on others and it was amended vis-à-vis Bill 163. In my view, the general amendment to section 34—I'm not sure if you've had anyone else discuss this with you—really doesn't clarify the situation. I wasn't sure what you were intending to do.

In that section, it provides for zoning to prohibit any use of land where you have certain categories of land; for example, hazards, contaminated lands, woodlands and things like that. The point that I wanted to make with woodlands is that woodlands are very distinguishable from the other classes of land in that section because we have treated woodlands as being lands that are developable if the trees were to be cut or if they were to be harvested or if they had not been grown as a plantation in the first place.

As a result, we have a system that is generally in place in southern Ontario where owners of woodlands, when those lands reach the development stage, the lands are purchased by the municipality at fair market value, as if they were developable for residential purposes. My concern with your section 34 with regard to woodlands is that it implies that the woodlands can be zoned for no further use and there may be no form of compensation available. This would be confiscatory zoning, in my respectful submission and I'm sure that's not what you intended.

I would suggest that in the first place, you delete woodlands from section 34 and secondly, that you reconsider section 34 and the subsections around it, because they do operate in a confiscatory fashion and I strongly doubt that's what you were trying to do.

With regard to complete applications, the concern I have is that they not be applied in a mindless fashion, where you have applications which, using simple common sense, don't require a litany of studies that a bylaw might stipulate. There should be some means of resolving any issue if the bylaw that the municipality passes is inappropriate because otherwise, what is happening in the land development business is that it's squeezing the small player out because the small player just can't afford to do all the studies that the big developers can afford to do. In my view, this complete application, while it makes sense, needs to have some leeway so that it can be applied in a commonsense fashion.

Over the page, I deal with policy statements and I'm not sure if your committee is dealing with policy statements. Is it?

The Vice-Chair: It's your time, if you'd like to bring that into the discussion, I think it could be helpful.

Mr Davies: Just a couple of brief points on policy statements: In section 1.1.2(b) there's a link of urban boundaries to infrastructure, and in my view that should be clarified so that it's clear that infrastructure will be provided when required and in the meantime, planning will go ahead. There's a lot of debate out there that planning, in the chicken-and-egg kind of nature, or catch-22 nature, should not go ahead until infrastructure is ahead, which I consider to be a rather shortsighted kind of argument.

Part of planning should be to plan for the provision of infrastructure. I think that if the policy statement in 1.1.2(b) is taken literally it could hamstring the planning process; 1.2(e), in my view, you're simply setting up a major situation. When the policy statement calls for preserving the vitality of existing commercial areas, what's happening is that those who seek to limit or regulate competition are being set up to appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board and you're going to get all kinds of "store wars" style hearings that were not intended. So I would urge you to take a look at that.

The fifth point that I wanted to deal with has to do with development charges. I welcome the review that was announced, not because I'm opposed to development charges in any way, but because in my view the act, when it went through here in 1988, was a work of considerable compromise, and as a result it has a number of parts of the act which simply don't work. There are sections in the act which are poorly written and which don't relate well to one another. The act clearly, in my view, requires an overhaul. I understand that the government is moving in the direction of limiting development charges to hard services only, and of course that's the business of the government and the Legislature.

Part II of the Development Charges Act deals with front-ending. In my view, this is one of the most important parts of the act because it allows for the funding of infrastructure on a sort of with-confidence basis, in that the developer who has to put up the money can know that they can have an assurance that they'll be paid back. The front-ending portions of the act are in part II and they too are very poorly written. The result has been that part II of the act has not been well used. I would strongly encourage you to look at or direct your staff, or however you may be proceeding, to see to it that part II gets the overhaul it needs so that it can work.

The third point regarding development charges is that in 1989, when the act went through, one of the strong motivations was to provide for an open and accountable process, and I believe that's extremely important to maintain. The bill provides, I understand, that the minister will, at least on an interim basis, deal with the approval of development charges amendments. The concern I have is that this takes the process from the clearly open to a situation where the bylaw is reviewed on an administrative basis. I think it would be appropriate, if the act is going to be reviewed, to maintain the approval power with the Ontario Municipal Board but to give strong direction to the Ontario Municipal Board with regard to the types of services that are going to be allowed under the development charge.

The other thing I would point out, which results from a decision of the municipal board and from the court, is a point of extreme frustration with the Development Charges Act, and that is that if you appeal a development charges bylaw and the appellant can show that one component of the charge has been exaggerated, the municipality now can respond by saying that another component of the charge was underforecast and that it therefore makes up for the overforecast. This is what I call a moving target in development charges appeals, and it constantly happens. So I would strongly suggest to you that the appeals be dealt with on a component-by-component basis. The act says that the municipal board may not increase the amount of the development charge. I would suggest to you that the act should say that the municipal board may not increase the components of the charge. That would force the municipalities to live with the components that they forecast. Otherwise the development charge process is going to be a chaotic situation.

So those are some submissions that I've made. I tried to go over them on an overview basis so as not to bore with detail. If I can be of any further assistance, it's my privilege.

Ms Marilyn Churley (Riverdale): Welcome. I believe you and I go back a ways.

Mr Davies: A little ways.

Ms Churley: Probably I was sitting in city council objecting to some proposal, one or another—

Mr Davies: City of Toronto. That's right.

Ms Churley: Yes. But we won't go into that. I'm sure I supported some of the things you were doing.

Mr Davies: I don't remember it quite that way, but I'll accept it for the time being.

Ms Churley: Your submission, of course, is a very technical one and I think that's important that some of the technical aspects are looked by people like you who have a lot of expertise in the industry.

I wanted to ask you a few further questions on the development charge. I understand, as you mentioned, that there are numerous problems with it as it exists. The concerns around what this government is doing, however—I think it opens up some difficulties around the ability for municipalities to be able to determine what kind of development charges are needed. The issue, and we have to face it, is that the Tory government is cutting back municipalities' transfer payments by huge amounts, up to 47%. The reality is that when new developments, especially in suburban areas, are created, there are soft costs as well as the so-called hard costs. Somebody's got to pay for those costs, and ultimately, if it's not the developer—and of course those charges, it's true, are then handed down to the buyer—it's going to be the general taxpayer.

I know this is an issue that's bedeviled a lot of governments for a long time and I think it's interesting to look at an overhaul, but I'd like to know what your opinion is. Who should be overall covering those costs of so-called soft services like schools and libraries and community centres? Do you think the overall taxpayer, or should the developer cover some of those costs?

Mr Davies: Part of the problem is that historically a lot of those things have been paid for out of tax dollars rather than development-charge dollars. So you've got large areas of the communities which are served by community centres, libraries, other things of that ilk that have been paid for out of the general revenues. To change the system in 1989 to fund those things out of development charges imposed a tremendous strain on new development. So the conundrum that you have is maintaining those things that have always been paid for out of general revenues in that fashion or transferring them entirely to development charges. I don't know where the answer is.

I think the problem is that the transfer that occurred when it did in 1989, when the new act came in, helped to very substantially inflate the development charges, and that has been counterproductive vis-à-vis growth. On the other hand, growth should pay for itself. So there probably isn't an answer that would satisfy you in that regard. A judgement has to be made, and at this time the priority is on keeping the charge down.

Ms Churley: Is my time up already?

The Vice-Chair: Yes, it is. Sorry about that. We were down to only three minutes a person, and we're already one past that. Sorry about that.

Mr Ernie Hardeman (Oxford): Mr Davies, thank you for coming and making your presentation this morning. I just quickly wanted to go to the first item in your presentation as to direct appeal for the subdivisions in subsection (34). The appeal is fairly direct and our change in Bill 20 is just to change the time frame from 180 days to 90 days. Do you see that as not sufficient direct appeal, because you have to appeal it to the municipality and forward it to the OMB, or do you think it's important that it goes directly to the OMB?

Mr Davies: I guess my point is sort of a technical one, because under 51(34) and 51(48), the paperwork goes to the municipality when the appeal is made, whereas under your changes to section 22 dealing with official plans, the paperwork goes directly to the Ontario Municipal Board. If you want to get things moving, which is what I think you want to do, then I would suggest that under 51(34) and 51(48) the paperwork go directly to the Ontario Municipal Board. That will get the files opened, the file will get in queue for a hearing and things will start to roll. I don't have a problem with the 90-day period. That's a different matter. It's strictly a matter of where the paper goes.

Mr Doug Galt (Northumberland): Thank you, Mr Davies, for a very thoughtful presentation. I'm intrigued with what you've picked up on woodlands. Certainly in Bill 163 there was all kinds of confiscation going on with wetlands and lands around wetlands. It was very irritating to the farm community and land owners in particular.

You're identifying this with woodlands as another area where confiscation without compensation could occur. Do you want to expand a little more on that? I'm just a little surprised; you're the first to bring that one up that I'm aware of.

Mr Davies: Very clearly, if you look at the things in section 34, and I don't know if I have time to pull it out or not, a number of the items are very much dealing with classes of land which don't have a chance of being developed. For example, if you have a wetland, no one attempts to develop on a wetland. There's lots of argument over whether a piece of land is a wetland or not, but once it's determined that it's a wetland, no one would attempt to develop on it.

With regard to a woodland, because woodlands regenerate in the way they do—they live and they die; they're planted or they might not be planted—the practice has been to clearly say that woodlands are developable. All you have to do is cut the trees down and you've got a land that can support development. That has been broadly accepted, in southern Ontario anyway. So when woodlands go into public ownership, there's an expectation they'll be paid for as if they were residential land.

My concern with the section is that it will create an interpretation that will eliminate the need for compensation and then you'll get all kinds of problems.

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and The Islands): Thank you very much, Mr Davies. I too enjoyed the presentation. I'm particularly concerned about speeding up the process. Having been involved in this from all three sides—the municipal side, the developer side and the objector or public side from time to time—over the last 25 years, I know that this is one area that no government, as far as I'm concerned, over the last 25 years has dealt with effectively.

I'm very much intrigued with, first of all, why the OMB doesn't use the "frivolous and vexatious" dismissal more often and why there aren't speedy dispute resolutions in situations where the average person on the outside, from an objective viewpoint, would say, "Yes, people have a right to have their say." This frustrates from all sides, not just from the public side but from all sides. Why does it take longer to get some of these matters heard or resolved than it would for somebody who's been charged with murder to have his trial over and done with?

Mr Davies: Let's pick up on that.

Mr Gerretsen: What reasons have ever been given to you as to why it takes so long for these things to get going; for example, this notion as to why the OMB shouldn't have the power to settle subdivisions? Has anybody in the ministry ever given you a reason why they can't do that?

Mr Davies: I don't know that anybody's got the definitive answer on the question, but the municipal board will say, and I'm sure from their point of view quite legitimately, that they're overwhelmed with files.

Mr Gerretsen: I realize that. I'm not talking about the time delay of getting a hearing on. You and I know that there have been situations with subdivision agreements, whatever, come before the OMB and there are always five or six or seven items that cannot be resolved right there and then, even though all the parties are finally sitting around the table and have had a full airing on the whole thing. Has anybody within the ministry ever given a reason to you why the OMB has not been given that power?

Mr Davies: I don't understand the historical reasons the OMB does not have that power, and that's why I'm suggesting to you at the bottom of page 1 of my submission that you give the OMB that power and let's get on with it. I don't understand the reason for the historical difference of why the OMB can settle a site plan agreement but can only deal with the conditions for a subdivision agreement. It doesn't make sense. If what you really want to do is bring about finality and get the system going, give the OMB that power.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for coming this morning. It's been very helpful.

Mr Davies: I hope it wasn't too technical but was of some help to you.

CONFEDERATION OF RESIDENT AND RATEPAYER ASSOCIATIONS

The Vice-Chair: Our next party is Confederation of Resident and Ratepayer Associations. This is a reminder for our latecomers that we are in a 25-minute process, and however you choose to use your time is yours. We'll go into a question-and-answer period at the end if there's time. You could help us by introducing yourselves.

Mr William Roberts: Certainly. My name is William Roberts. I'm the honorary past chairman of the Confederation of Resident and Ratepayer Associations. My local ratepayer association is the Swansea Area Ratepayers Association. Mr Opara is a member of the executive of the Confederation of Resident and Ratepayer Associations and is a member of the Bedford Park Residents Association in North Toronto. Dale Ritch belongs to the Bloor-Junction Neighbourhood Coalition and the Dovercourt Park Area Residents Association, basically the west end of the city, working-class neighbourhoods. He's a vice-chairman of the Confederation of Resident and Ratepayer Associations.

I'm going to summarize the brief I've given you. We're going to narrowly focus on the issue of committee of adjustments appeals and what we believe is a fundamental destruction of community involvement. There are serious problems with the way the system works right now, but the solution of having a kangaroo court or a system where you have no ability to discuss matters or properly hear is essentially saying to people: "We'll make a political decision. We won't weigh the relative matters."

The problem with the OMB is that it's a hearing de novo. That's allowed the committee of adjustments to have very informal processes; in a sense, it's almost planning by ambush. What happens is that the applicant sets the process in place; they decide when to start the process and the clock begins to run. They can have up to a year to prepare what they're going to say at the committee. The residents will get about three weeks' notice. Most people work, and they can't always get to city hall immediately. In the case of the city of Toronto, it could be up to eight or 10 miles to travel if you're at the extreme ends. If you're not working downtown, it's not that easy to access the files between 9 and 5.

Probably about two weeks before the hearing, they begin to understand what the issues are. They appear at the committee of adjustment, and if there's no process for proper consideration at that level—and it's the only place you're going to have a full hearing—essentially, the citizens are already at a minus-sum situation.

If, as has been suggested, appeals may still lie to the OMB but the full costs will be passed on the municipality, the municipality may decide to pass the full costs on to the local residents, who at the beginning weren't given an opportunity to properly prepare their case, don't know whether what the applicant is saying is true.

If you were really trying to deal with the problem, which is in many cases a neighbour-neighbour dispute, you'd want to try to begin the mediation or dispute resolution process at the committee of adjustment level. It would make more sense if you had a process where the applicant begins the process, the committee has to set out a mediation or a pre-hearing date, and you would give the people surrounding the opportunity to file a letter indicating that they have concerns. If you had a meeting before everybody's drawn the lines in the sand and the emotional commitments are made on both sides, to try to see if there could be a resolution, where it's a neighbour-neighbour dispute, where somebody wants to build an 8,000-square-foot home in an area zoned for 3,000 square feet—and I've seen that happen—and the present home is 2,000 square feet, they might suddenly find the neighbours would be content with 3,500 but not 8,000 and maybe they should reconsider their plans.

Others times you have more significant issues that won't go away that easily, but the reality is, if the neighbours are excluded from a process and they suddenly find themselves there, they're going to file an appeal. If the only person who's doing the appeal is the local council, our problem with that is most politicians are used to dealing with political processes. They like the idea that they can leave the committee room and come back again. If you're going to try to have a hearing at the council, will they follow the rules of judicial procedure, which means that council member sits there through the full process, can't leave, can't deal with anything else, and for the five or 10 days their committee is dealing with this matter in legal argument, they can't deal with their constituents? Somehow I don't think that's what's going to happen.

The result will be a very easy, quick process for whomever is dealing with it. On one side, if you have a pro-development council, that will be great for the developers, but if you have an anti-development council you can guarantee the result will be no, no and no again, or if 300 people show up and oppose it, the answer will be no.

You need to develop a process that will allow for community involvement at an earlier stage. If you have a full hearing at a committee of adjustment or whatever level it is, at least people have had their chance to do that, and you could probably turn the Ontario Municipal Board or some other entity into a true appellate body that just decides whether somebody made an error in their decision, rather than having to have a brand-new hearing.

If you leave it to city council, the problem will be that you'll have a full hearing, and then it goes to city council and they make a political decision. I don't want to tell you what that's going to do to the process, but the reality for most people is that if they don't deal with city hall except when a committee of adjustment matter occurs, some of them—they've never even been to court before.

This is the first time they've ever seen an argument. Then if they find out at the end of day that nobody listens to their argument, that it's a political decision on who knows whom, well, you just blew the political process down the tubes, in the sense that why should anybody be involved in anything, why should they vote, why should they care what happens with the government? The alienation rolls along.

I'm saying you should show some sensitivity. We make a series of recommendations. It would be better, instead of what's happening right now, to really look at the process and develop a mediation process at the very beginning to see if it could happen at that stage, before, as I say, the whole neighbourhood's up in arms.

It would be desirable to have some sort of process, especially dealing with "minor." Part of the problem is that no one has gone and revisited the definition of "minor" since 1977, and if "minor" truly meant "minor," you might not get some of the disputes. For example, I know one case where a person tried to introduce an auto body shop into a commercial area where it was prohibited by calling it something else and claiming it was a "minor." It went all the way to the OMB and it was a three-day hearing. Finally at the end of the three-day hearing, the chairman realized the argument from day one, that the city had specifically zoned auto body shops out of this area and this was an auto body shop pretending to be something else, and he realized he should have dismissed it back at day one.

There's a problem here. To the extent that we can try to deal with it, it's desirable. To the extent that we simply make the changes proposed, I don't think they're going to solve the problem. They may streamline it, but the result may not be what you want. If you're really trying to streamline, mediation at the beginning would tend to streamline and maybe remove the disputes, where if a neighbour moves his wall three or four feet in a different direction, the appeal's over with.

That's essentially the submission. There's more detail, but I really didn't want to go into it all, but you could read it over. As I say, that's the problem: The definition of "minor" hasn't been really looked at since 1977 and it should be tightened up, and look at changing the process for mediation earlier on and probably a full hearing earlier on.

Mr Dale Ritch: I want to provide some background information for members of this committee, because the city of Toronto's committee of adjustment has been changing quite a bit in the last few years in terms of the type of workload it takes on. I'm not sure exactly how many municipalities outside of Metro have committees of adjustment or what kinds of issues they deal with, but the city of Toronto's committee of adjustment does not just deal with minor variances and consent applications, that is, severances, which probably might be more the norm outside of the city.

For instance, in the last couple of years, the city of Toronto has introduced some major changes into its planning procedures so that, for instance, conversions of commercial and industrial buildings to residential use are now allowed to go through the committee of adjustment process. For instance, a couple of years ago there was a building, just one of many, 7 King Street East, which was a very large commercial building converted to 315 residential units, and this was allowed to go through the committee of adjustment process. There's been quite a few conversions in the last two years. There's been at least a dozen major commercial or industrial buildings converted to residential use through the committee of adjustment.

At one committee meeting two weeks ago, there were two major development applications dealt with. Actually, both are quite close to this building. One was at Queen and Shaw streets, a large, five-storey, formerly industrial building located in a residential neighbourhood which the developer wanted to convert to 121 live-work condominium units. That was dealt with at the committee of adjustment, and on the same agenda, the same night, there was another major application at 424 Wellington Street, the Monarch Building—there was a big article in the Star a couple of weeks ago about this one—down on Richmond Street just west of Spadina, again a conversion of a formerly industrial building to live-work units, and this was in the middle of an exclusively industrial neighbourhood. This was particularly interesting, because the city has now launched a downzoning policy in a couple of sections of town to allow much more latitude for development of any type in an existing industrial neighbourhood.

A lot of these conversions raise a great number of planning issues which you can't really deal with at the committee of adjustment level properly, in our opinion, but the fact is that the city's decided to allow these conversions to go ahead through the committee of adjustment process and so be it. The point I'm making is that we're not just dealing with minor variances at the committee level now or consent applications, so the committee has broadened its scope quite a bit over the last few years in the city as compared to what the normal procedure would be.

I know there's quite a bit of feeling across the province that the Planning Act we have and the planning procedures we have have been an impediment to development and are slowing things down too much. You might be interested to know that right now in the city of Toronto, there are more than 20,000 units of residential dwelling units that have been given final zoning approval and yet no development, no action whatsoever has taken place on developing any of these units—20,000. What we have in the city of Toronto right now is an incredible glut of residential housing, to the extent that permission has been received to build 20,000 more units of residential housing and the developers are sitting on this, obviously because there's no market.

We recently saw some interesting stuff in the paper about a Hong Kong developer who wants to build four condominium towers down at Harbourfront. Maybe that's realistic, maybe it isn't. Nobody really knows. But if you take a look at condominium starts in Toronto last year and sales, you'll see that a heck of a lot more building is going on than units being sold.

The atmosphere we have in the city isn't really one of impediments to development by over-regulation. I think that's an important point to make.

The final point I want to make, and I guess what concerns us most about these proposed changes to the act, is that if appellants have to pay their costs at the committee of adjustment level, let's face it, the rich guy's going to win every time, in the long run. If you're forcing appellants to pay administration costs, not just the costs of hiring their lawyer or planner or whatever but actual administration costs, you're creating a situation where it's going to be very unfair against small property owners. That's our main concern. We more or less represent as an organization small property owners, ratepayers' groups and residents' associations, and we feel that creating such an atmosphere would make it impossible for the small property owner to have a fair chance through the appeal process.

Mr Michael Opara: There's an urgent need for municipal reform in this province, especially at the city of Toronto. I think that's one reason the city is in such a mess. I look forward to the province taking more action and doing more things in terms of reforming the Municipal Act, the elections expenses act and other acts.

But getting back to the committee of adjustment: To give you an example of minor variances that we've had go the committee of adjustment for, we had one building which was 60 feet over height, a major density increase, a new building, which went to the committee of adjustment; a house 100% over density, going to the committee of adjustment; another project which went from three times coverage to 3.8 times coverage. The city had just approved that whole strip to go to three times coverage, and it was in violation of the official plan. That went to the committee of adjustment. It was way over height.

The planning department, depending on what the project is and who knows whom, is steering projects to the committee of adjustment because they get through quickly. There's not enough scrutiny of certain projects. If we could redefine a minor variance and truly make it minor—for instance, one homeowner wants to build an extra foot towards the property line of the neighbouring homeowner—that's what the committee of adjustment should be used for, not for major projects where you have to investigate whether the schools and proper community facilities are in place.

We have to protect, in this process, the small homeowner. To give you an example, with my brother's house, the neighbour put in an application to go to the committee of adjustment to build a huge house next door. He lives in a bungalow in North York. The neighbouring house was going to extend halfway into his backyard, so half of his backyard would be shaded by this house. If there was not an independent committee of adjustment process with the right to appeal to the OMB, that house would have gone ahead. He was able, because there was time and because there was a chance for mediation because the committee of adjustment postponed its decision, to come to a satisfactory arrangement with the neighbouring property owner where everybody was happy. All the neighbours were happy with the plans; his backyard isn't being shaded; actually, the planning department said the new proposal was superior.

There is an urgent need that we keep the committee of adjustment process we have in place, with the right of appeal to an independent body such as the Ontario

Municipal Board. There are a lot of faults with it, but it did work, in this case, relatively well. Thank you.

Mr Trevor Pettit (Hamilton Mountain): On page 6 of your presentation you indicate that you support the return to the original wording of "shall have regard to." Could tell us why you feel that way? Also, if the change is made, do you see this as a sign that the government is relinquishing its role, or do you feel it'll still be able to monitor and have some input on any issues that are of provincial concern?

Mr Roberts: We actually opposed the original change from "shall have regard to" to "be consistent with." We felt it was mandating law by fiat, that you're giving the power to the ministers and the cabinet to make law, and that was inappropriate. The way the Ontario Municipal Board had looked at "have regard to" was that it was a very important matter to be considered, that government policy carries a certain weight just being government policy. The shift to "shall be consistent with" meant they didn't have the flexibility to say, "In these circumstances, this may not be appropriate." Depending on how in-depth those regulations got, there was a serious concern that it was removing due process at the OMB or at the city council level and making it an absolute requirement, which was inappropriate.

The reality is, if it's a government policy it has a certain level of weight at the board, period—always has had. There's a series of court decisions where the court had to remind the OMB that a letter from the minister, while it may be of interest, doesn't remove the fact it could be tested. When you have "shall have regard to," it means it's testable; "shall be consistent with" means it's not testable. You can't even prove that there are facts that warrant the policy not applying in a given set of circumstances. For that reason, I don't believe the province is relinquishing anything; its powers are still there.

Mr Hardeman: You suggest that minor variances are more than minor variances and for that reason it requires the OMB to adjudicate a great number of those. You also suggest that there may be an opportunity to put a pre-hearing in place, and with that in place, you suggest that the committee of adjustment could be the final appeal process.

Mr Roberts: A possibility, but with some sort of process, whether it be to council or some other body, that they can review to make sure that the committee of adjustment—to be quite honest, there was that situation in the city of York where it eventually it turned out that some of the committee of adjustment members were receiving benefits above and beyond what they should be getting in terms of making decisions. There was that implication.

If you have a body that is not appealable, the real risk becomes complacency because, "Nobody can look over my shoulder." People would simply do what they're going to do. I suggest that you could probably narrow the scope of appeal. At one point, there was an attempt to turn the OMB just into an appellate body, and it didn't work, partly because of the problems with the committee of adjustment—but some sort of review process, whether it be the OMB or some other body.

What we suggested about three years ago is that you might want to consider creating, for example, a regional review board, an appellate body within the region to review those matters. It's still independent, and because it's drawn from more than one borough or municipality there's a possibility that it'd be harder to tamper with and we'd get an independent opinion that wouldn't reflect just that local municipality one way or the other. That's why I said the OMB or some other body.

But what's most important is at the committee of adjustment level, to make that a process where there really is a hearing at that stage and to allow the process. Right now, there's a requirement for the hearing to come on board within 30 days, whatever. If there were a process that allowed mediation at that stage where the normal process would be, the committee would try to sort things out. If nobody files a letter of intent of objection, the committee could hold a hearing at a given time without worrying about it, could do a whole pile of them all at once because they're pro forma. Where somebody says, "I have a concern," it goes into a process of mediation. If the mediation works out, it speeds up again. If you clearly identify what the issues are, people go to the committee with some sort of understanding of what they have to show, and it may help the whole process that way.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm very intrigued with your presentation, and I like this notion of having some sort of mediation beforehand and then giving the committee of adjustment wider powers, not only to deal with the application in front of it but to also make some amendments and changes, as long as it doesn't make the "minor" even greater than. If it's something less than, I think they should be able to deal with it.

I'm somewhat disturbed, though, as a former municipal politician, at this cynicism about municipal councils. I would suggest to you that if councils make their decisions on who they know etc, the same thing can be said for the committee of adjustment as well. In most communities, the same rule would apply.

Would you not agree that one of the main problems—I guess this is my hangup and has been for years, about all these matters that come in the planning area or committee of adjustment area—is just the lack of speed in the process, whether we're dealing with getting decisions out of councils, getting decisions out of the OMB, getting a hearing before the OMB, getting an application through the ministry's office—it just goes on and on. Time is money, no matter which side of the fence you're on.

Do you have any comments on that? The residents out there who may be opposing something have as much right to know where they stand early on in the game. They shouldn't have to wait a year or a year and a half either. Everybody always assumes that anybody who makes this kind of argument is pro-development. I'm no more pro-development than anti-development. I'm just in favour of getting on with it, whatever it is that's being brought forward.

Mr Roberts: To be quite honest, with my experience at the city of Toronto and some other areas, usually the community gets advised that something's coming up; they get involved. Then it disappears into the labyrinth of the bureaucracy for a year and a half, two years, spews out again and the residents say: "But we've just got the notice two weeks ago. We haven't had a chance to read this inch-thick report. Can you give us two weeks?" And the comment comes, "But we've been dealing with it for two years"—"but, but, but, but." Part of the problem is that when it gets to the bureaucracy or gets outside the political process or people are excluded from the process and decisions are made—I've even seen the situation with site plans where the applicant sits down with the site plan proposal, goes through the whole site plan process for a year with the local planners, then it spews out into the community and the community starts raising issues, and there's further delay.

In some ways, the problem with the process that I see is that there's a failure of the community getting involved early enough to know what the issues are. I also sometimes have found that it's during the process of waiting for the OMB. In terms of city plans, for example, further discussions with the planners resolved several issues that hadn't yet been resolved while we were waiting for the lengthy OMB hearing to start. What could have been a three-year ended up being about three months, simply because there was pressure on everybody to resolve it.

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me. If you could tighten up the answer, I'd appreciate that. I don't mean to be rude, but we're going into lengthy questions and therefore lengthy answers, it seems, and we're running into other people's times. If members would shorten up the questions, it would help a lot.

Mr Gerretsen: There were three questions from the other side, Madam Chair.

The Vice-Chair: It was still within the time parameters.

Mr Gerretsen: We'll start timing them from now on.

The Vice-Chair: I am.

Mr Roberts: I'll try to make this very quick. Part of the problem too is that if you shorten the appeal period, you increase the number of appeals. For example, if you have a 20-day appeal period after a decision, you're basically saying that people have to make a decision whether they're going to file an appeal and they may not have a chance to talk to a planner or a lawyer, so what are they going to do? The advice from any lawyer is, "File your appeal and work it out afterwards." Once they've filed their appeal, there's a tendency for people to go into a state of, "I don't have to do anything for the next six months."

Ms Churley: I don't have time, but I have a number of questions. We have some agreements and some disagreements. I would like to go into those at another time.

I want to ask you specifically about something you didn't touch on in your brief but you may have an opinion on. One area I have concerns about in the new bill is that only the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing can now appeal at the OMB and that the Ministry of Environment and Energy and Ministry of Natural Resources etc will be able to do that. The minister says it's a coordinating role. My concern, and I'll tell you up front—I've been in cabinet, I've been there—is that I know that sometimes certain ministries get shoved aside. If there's a development that the Minister of Municipal Affairs really wants, it's going to go ahead. The fact that the Minister of Environment and the Minister of Municipal Affairs could have their say, could tell the public up front what they're concerned about, would have an impact.

It appears it's not going to happen any more. What's your opinion on that? It's been said it's in the name of speeding things up, blah, blah, blah, but it has some serious implications for the public.

Mr Roberts: Actually, I view it as a conflict of interest. When the same person who decides whether to refer an official plan also decides whether they're going to object to it, you're creating a problem. I had a situation where—I'll try to make this short—there was a possibility of expropriation going on and the minister sat on the referral to the last possible moment of an OP amendment. I'm not saying there was anything untoward, but it creates the impression that something's occurring there. If you're going to have one ministry alone doing it, it probably should be the Attorney General, and the Attorney General would act as agent for the other ministries. In theory, the Attorney General is far enough removed from municipal affairs and planning that it could provide the coordination and be an independent body that isn't getting advised by the same planners who said, "There's no problem here," or "There is a problem here." In other words, is the judge deciding whether he will ask a party to come or send a party to the table, or even the prosecuting attorney deciding? It's the same person. The judge and the prosecuting attorney are one and the same when it's the Ministry of Municipal Affairs.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for coming this morning.

Mr Roberts: We appreciate. It was short notice, just from 10 o'clock yesterday.

Ms Churley: Madam Chair, before we move on, I just want to make a motion, and I'm wondering if I should table it right now so we can deal with it at the end of the hearing this morning. Is that okay?

The Vice-Chair: Yes, go ahead.

Ms Churley: I'd like to table it now.

I move that this committee formally request the Minister of Environment and Energy to appear before this committee to answer questions relating to the effect of the Planning Act amendments, Bill 20, on the environment and the people of the province of Ontario.

I just moved it as opposed to tabling it, did I?

The Vice-Chair: You're moving a motion, is my understanding.

Ms Churley: Yes, I guess I just did that.

Mr Gerretsen: I'll second it.

The Vice-Chair: There's no need for a seconder.

Ms Churley: I'm happy to leave the debate till after the submissions. I think that would be better rather than at this point.

The Vice-Chair: That's right. So what you're asking for, then, is one stage for this motion to be acted upon but to proceed with the hearings today.

Ms Churley: Sure, and then at the end of the hearings at lunchtime we can deal with it.

The Vice-Chair: Is everybody agreeable to this? We will proceed with the hearings as we are now and we'll deal with the motion before we adjourn this morning. Everybody agreed? Carried.

ONTARIO SOCIETY FOR ENVIRONMENTAL MANAGEMENT

The Vice-Chair: We have the Ontario Society for Environmental Management. While they're coming forward, I'd like to remind committee members that we are trying to adhere to the 25-minute limit. I will be asking for brief questions and whatever answer is necessary to the question, but we're going to have to adhere to the 25.

Mr Gerretsen: And that's for all sides.

The Vice-Chair: We started a few minutes late, and just to let you know I am timing and I have recorded times. In fairness to all parties and those who have to follow, I'd appreciate that. We welcome you here this morning. If you'd like to introduce yourselves.

Ms Ann Joyner: Thank you very much. I'm Ann Joyner, the current president of the Ontario Society for Environmental Management, and this is Mark Stevenson, who's one of our council members and the chair of the policy committee.

Just as an introductory point, I'd like to say that the Ontario Society for Environmental Management is a volunteer organization. We get all of our funds through revenues from our members and through events. Mark and I are both environmental planners in private practice and doing this as a volunteer initiative.

The OSEM was established in 1976. I'm going to summarize the brief that you have in front of you. You might want to keep the recommendations section in front of you as a lead-in. It's an interdisciplinary association with about 150 members right now, and what's unique about it is that it draws membership from a variety of different disciplines including law, planning, biological sciences and social sciences. We are united by ecologically based principles and are resolved to maintain and enhance environmental health. We promote environmental management through conferences, meetings, seminars. We have a newsletter and we participate in initiatives like today, providing comments on public policy, and we did so for the previous government as well.

With regard to the bill itself, we are very pleased to see that the emphasis continues to be placed on the protection of the environment in the new directions described by the government. We also very much support the need to streamline government and create a faster, less costly approach to environmental management. Many, many of our members have experienced quite negative situations where things could have been done more quickly and more cost-effectively.

But we also have some suggestions where we think that things could be improved to come up with a better balance that protects the environment and allows flexibility for municipalities. That's the focus of this brief, to provide comments that we think would improve Bill 20 and some of the other initiatives.

The focus of this brief is obviously Bill 20, but we want to stress that we think it's important that the government considers the effect of Bill 20 with the other initiatives that are ongoing right now, with particular emphasis on the policy statement which has been released. We are also commenting on that and will provide a second brief to government staff on that. I don't believe it's coming to the legislative committee.

The combined effect of the policy, the bill, Bill 26, changes in administration and the fiscal policies of the government are fundamentally changing the way that environmental management will occur in the province, and we urge you to try to consider how all of those things are interacting together.

I'm just going to briefly touch on the policy, because it connects to the statement of "have regard to" or "be consistent with." Our brief on the policy statement is going to say that we believe that the policy statement lacks clarity and does not carefully and succinctly define what the provincial interest is in particular matters regarding the environment.

We're going to comment that we think that improvements could be made to the policy and in particular that the guidelines and support documents should provide better guidance on environmental management. I think my catchphrase on the policy has been that ambiguity is no replacement for flexibility, and I think you need to think about that with regard to the policy statement.

Now I'm going to get on to the general comments on the bill itself. In our opinion, planning reform has to meet two primary objectives with regard to the environment, and that is to increase certainty and efficiency of the process and to ensure that important natural systems are protected permanently. To do this, municipalities must be instructed to protect key features and systems in a consistent and comprehensive way and municipalities must have the support of the province to achieve this.

Because the municipal plan is one of the strongest instruments available to protect the environment, it's our opinion that the role of the province is to clearly define the fundamental provincial expectations for the environment for municipalities, so that every municipality can then embody those expectations in its official plan, which then becomes the actual instrument that affects on-the-ground changes, affects how land uses occur.

The other sort of general point I'd like to emphasize, particularly to this group, is that the province varies considerably in terms of the environmental policy in place today. The GTA and municipalities like perhaps Waterloo and Ottawa-Carleton represent the most progressive municipalities. They've got good provincial policies in place. They've spent a lot of money doing research and data. But they don't necessarily reflect the whole province.

We have to be careful that the kind of legislation that comes forward is geared not only towards the GTA but towards the other municipalities, rural and northern Ontario, that perhaps don't have the resources in place and haven't put in place the structures that these more advanced and resource-rich municipalities have been able to do. We see that a lot in our private practice.

Now into the nitty-gritty here. The first point I'm making in section 2.2 of the brief is with regard to "be consistent with" versus "have regard to." It's OSEM's position that the movement back to "have regard to" will only exacerbate uncertainty and lead to greater inconsistency and vagueness in the way that we protect the environment.

We recognize that there is a need for flexibility at the municipal level and for choices to be made at the municipi-pal level, but we think that flexibility can be embodied in the policy statements themselves. The policy as it exists today is extremely flexible. Every single statement has an out for the municipality to undertake its own approach to implementing the policy. The combination of that kind of ambiguity about flexibility with "have regard to" is too much flexibility. It just doesn't leave enough provincial direction on environmental management. We've always, as an organization, supported "be consistent with" and we will continue to do that.

The second point is with regard to greater delegation of power to local municipalities, and this is a general point. Natural systems, as most of you realize, aren't defined by municipal boundaries. Things like the Niagara Escarpment, the Oak Ridges moraine and watershed boundaries extend beyond the municipal boundaries and it's the provincial responsibility to ensure that municipalities work together to deal with the environment in the appropriate units. That kind of leadership, in our view, is not promoted in the current bill. Some of the more specific things I'll raise in a moment. We'll give you some more specific changes that we'd like to see to promote ecosystem-based planning.

The next point is mandatory planning for local municipalities. The current bill focuses on the county level and the regional level and requires that official plans be developed for those levels, but there is no requirement for local official plans to be developed. We recommend that section 17 of the act be amended to require official plans at the local level, which would then require local municipal plans to reflect the policy statements which, in turn, will ensure the protection of the environment at every government level.

We have some specific comments on sections of the bill. New subsections 1(2) to 1(4) refer to Municipal Affairs as the only public body, and I believe a question was just raised on this for appeals. We support the idea of a one-window approach. All of us have experienced situations where different ministries come forward with opposing views that aren't balanced internally for the government.

Obviously, it's important that the government tries to get its own house in order before positions are raised with the public, but at the same time we're quite concerned that only Municipal Affairs has the ability to appeal. It doesn't leave any check or balance on Municipal Affairs and, frankly, we just don't want to put all our trust in Municipal Affairs to make the right decisions to ensure that they're informed correctly.

Specifically, that relates to two things. One is the appeal ability and the other is the ability for individual ministries to decide whether they want to be at the board to protect their interests, regardless of what position the government's taking at the board. Although we support the idea of one window and that the government should get its house in order and come forward with one position, I still think that the check on that should be that provincial bodies have the ability to appeal and that they have the ability to decide whether they want to be at the board.

Next is powers for exemptions. Sections 4 to 7 of the bill allow the minister or approval authority to exempt plans and plan amendments from the requirements for approval. Given that the official plan is the most primary tool for local planning, we have a lot of questions about what the purpose of this exemption provision is and what the requirements and criteria will be for enacting this exemption. We recommend that the criteria for these kinds of exemptions be predefined now and that that process for those exemptions be put on the table so that we as a public understand what this exemption provision is all about.

With regard to the time frames, we support the idea that reduced times should be a definite priority with regard to all planning approvals, because there is no need for the sorts of time frames that have happened consistently in the past. But good planning requires good information to be at the table, so the time frames should be connected to the prescribed information.

Just for everyone here's information, what happens when an application comes in is that there's an amount of information that is called prescribed information that's required before the time clock begins for these time frames. At the moment the prescribed information is extremely minimal. If you put your name on the application with some location information, the time clock starts. In our view, to make good, informed decisions, the time clock shouldn't start until all the appropriate information is on the table. Either the prescribed information requirement should be enhanced to ensure that all information necessary to cover all the policy statements is on the table or municipalities should have the flexibility to crank up that prescribed information requirement.

With regard to the deletion of the requirement to hold a public meeting for plans of subdivision, we don't support the deletion of this requirement. From an environmental perspective, the public is often the body that brings forward important information on community values and environmental quality and environmental features, and to reduce the opportunity for the public to speak in a comfortable forum, as opposed to at council, I think is a movement in the wrong direction. I also think that the expectation exists right now—the public expects at least the level of public consultation that we've got now—and to reduce that is going to cause problems.

I'm on section 3.6 of my brief right now with regard to development charges. Sections 45 to 57 of the bill contain some amendments to the Development Charges Act but, more specifically, there is a review under way. Some of the information that was released with the media package on the bill indicated that the intention is to link development charges specifically to hard services. We have a concern with that with regard to the kinds of studies that we think are necessary, and coming back to my ecosystem-based planning approach, many kinds of studies that are needed to deal with environment and infrastructure, like water, sewer, transportation, master planning and sub-watershed planning, require interjurisdictional studies, and they require studies that should be funded by more than one developer, if you're going to use development charges.

The current development charges allow those studies to be funded. We've seen many good examples of where development charges have been used to fund necessary studies that will provide the growth strategy information that we need to establish the need and the appropriate locations for infrastructure. We should continue to be able to use development charges in that manner.

We would be concerned with a movement specifically to only hard services for the Development Charges Act. I understand that this government is really promoting the idea of public-private partnerships, and this is one place where it's working very well right now. So let's not move in the wrong direction.

With regard to the transition provisions, our only comment there is that we just went through a whole year of trying to understand Bill 163 and the transition provisions. We're now trying to understand the new transition provisions and, frankly, it's extremely confusing to us, who spend our whole lives trying to understand this. I hope that a really concerted effort towards education will be put in place so that everyone knows where they stand, depending on when their application got in the mill.

Finally, there is a great opportunity at the moment to integrate planning and environmental approvals. If an initiative that's on the table is streamlining and efficiency and cost-effectiveness, we think this government should take one step further and think about integrating environmental approvals under the Environmental Assessment Act and other regulatory standards with planning.

It's our position and the position of many of our members that the time has come and we're at a point where we've evolved and we understand what benefits the Environmental Assessment Act has brought to the table, the Planning Act has now been adjusted to try to reflect some of those elements and the time has come to integrate the two processes. Instead of having to go through infrastructure approval under the Environmental Assessment Act and planning approval under the Planning Act, let's think about how we can put the two processes together.

There are a number of initiatives by various non-government organizations to provide some leadership in this regard, and OSEM will be part of that. OPPI, which is the Ontario Professional Planners Institute, the regional commissioners and AMO all think that this is an initiative that's worthy of action in the near future, so we'll be providing a more specific brief on that at some point in the future.

I guess, finally, I'd just like to say that OSEM is pleased to be at the table today. We'd be happy to work further to develop some of these ideas and provide more specific thoughts, if that's required. We thank you for having us here today.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you. Would you like to address the group as well or shall we go into questions and answers?

Mr Mark Stevenson: Move to questions.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm curious about the position you've taken on the "have regard to" or "be consistent with" provision. We just heard from another group before yours that took exactly the opposite viewpoint but for exactly the same reasons. They were basically saying that if you went to a "have regard to" statement, there is in effect more certainty in that at least you could say, at the OMB level, the municipality has looked at it and may have rejected it for whatever reasons. I wonder if you could just expand on your position on this matter a little bit further.

Ms Joyner: I'll start and then Mark can add in. My position is that even if it is "be consistent with," there still would be a requirement to demonstrate that you have been consistent with a policy statement. So the idea that it will be unnecessary I think is not correct.

I think fundamentally we all agree that what we want is clear leadership by the province, allowing necessary flexibility for municipalities to do made-in-municipal solutions. I don't think there's any argument about that. The argument is, how do we get there? Our position is, the combination of vague policy statement and "have regard to," which is vague, is too much vagueness, too much ambiguity. We either need to strengthen one or the other to achieve what we want, which is clear provincial direction with flexibility to allow municipalities to have made-in-municipal solutions.

Mr Gerretsen: When the provincial direction changes through new policy statements, what's your position with respect to your input or the public's input into that process? Do you have a position on that?

Ms Joyner: I think, like in any other policy or legislative change, we need to have input the same way that we're having input right now into the policy statement. We are finding it frustrating that the only input we're having to the policy statement is at the staff level and that we don't have access to this kind of group.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm not from a two-tier municipality, so maybe you could just explain this to me. In moving the official plan level up to the second tier, the higher tier, would that not apply to the lower-tier municipality as well then? Do you follow what I'm saying? If you had an official plan for an upper-tier municipality, why would it be necessary for a lower-tier municipality to have an official plan as well when in effect they are part of the upper tier?

Ms Joyner: I think the practice is that the local municipality do produce plans that are on a community level and they reflect much more specific needs and desires of the local community.

Mr Howard Hampton (Rainy River): Thank you for an informative brief. I just have some very direct questions based upon the points that you've made. In your opinion, will this bill and the associated policy statements in fact lead to ecosystem planning or ecosystem-based planning?

Mr Stevenson: I'll start.

Ms Joyner: Yes. That's a big question.

Mr Stevenson: Currently, the combination of the two we don't think promotes ecosystem planning. We're reviewing the version of the policy statements now and getting our comments together, so we haven't quite done that as council yet; they're due in early March. It is too vague to really direct an ecosystem-based approach to planning and touched on our concern about ecosystems crossing municipal boundaries and what you do there and what the provincial role is. Currently, the combination of the bill and policy statements does not foster or promote ecosystem-based planning.

Mr Hampton: Can you explain to us why it's important that we move to ecosystem-based planning? Why is it important that we search out significant woodlots and seek to have them protected or properly managed within a planning system? Why is it important that we seek out the headwater areas of significant streams and rivers and ensure that they're not paved over or used as draining ditches?

1030

We talk about this but it seems to me there's a fundamental issue here. We enjoy—we have enjoyed for the most part—a fairly attractive physical natural environment here in Ontario, but it seems to me we're in danger of losing it if we're not thoughtful. So why should we do this? Why is it important to protect those significant woodlots? Why is it important to have a planning system that recognizes the tributaries of creeks and rivers and so on?

Ms Joyner: Let me start on that one, again a big question, but three points. The environment reflects quality of life and quality of health, and clearly the protection of water quality, air quality and natural systems is what gives us the ability to breathe clean air and drink clean water.

On a more practical level, though, there are two reasons that we focus on ecosystem-based planning, which is going beyond municipal boundaries. One, as I said, is that natural systems don't respect municipal boundaries. For example, a stream crosses a municipal boundary. The water quality has to be assessed with regard to how it starts in the headwaters and goes down to Lake Ontario. The only way of managing that water quality is to manage it as a system, to understand how something that happens at the top of the stream affects what's going on at the bottom of the stream. So it's very fundamental to natural system quality.

Another point is that these features cross municipal boundaries. For example, on hard features like forests and natural habitat units, if we follow the process we've got right now, you might have the same forest on one side of a municipal boundary not being considered to be significant and on the other side being considered to be significant. It's important that we understand, is it significant or not; what needs to be protected; how much of it needs to be protected to keep those animals or features that we think are important to us intact?

The second important thing is a lot of the infrastructure that we need to support the kind of quality of life we have right now: Storm water, water supply, sewers and transportation cross these municipal boundaries and are planned on a cross-municipal basis. For us to understand the implications of that infrastructure on these natural systems, we've got to be planning for them on this broader basis.

Mr Bruce Smith (Middlesex): My question is taken more from the general perspective. You mentioned during your presentation the environmental management practices that have been achieved in Waterloo and a couple of other municipal jurisdictions. I would contend perhaps that that hasn't been necessarily achieved solely at the direction of provincial policy. I think there has been some local initiative, either through the region or otherwise, that has achieved that excellence.

Would you, from your perspective, not see that it would be appropriate for the government to establish a minimum standard, as we have done through the provincial policy statement, and then, given your comments with respect to transition in the role of education, see an increasing role for organizations such as yourselves and other municipalities that have placed a priority on this area to achieve standards that exceed the minimum anticipated in the policy statement? Do you see that as a possible role, whereby we'd get a direct application of experiences through your organization and others in the context of a mentoring process?

Ms Joyner: I think that's a worthy initiative. What I would argue with is that I don't think the provincial policy sets a minimum standard that will be or can practically be applied across municipalities. That's where I think the fine-tuning is needed. You just have to look at the water quality and quantity or a cultural heritage policy to see that there is no real direction provided in that policy other than, "You should consider water quality." There's no minimum standard whatsoever provided in that policy statement. I think if the policy statement has a minimum standard, then your mentoring system is an excellent idea for taking the excellence that we've achieved and spreading it around—I totally agree—along with some resources and program initiatives, yes.

Mr Stevenson: I think we agree that the province needs to define that minimum standard to protect that provincial interest, and that further enhancement—not only maintenance and protection in that case at the minimum standard—could be and should be promoted throughout the province. So defining that minimum standard, I think as Ann said, is a question mark right now and the difficulty.

Ms Joyner: I heard an excellent statement by a fellow planner who said he felt that some of his clients have expressed to him that they feel like they're on the road going towards environmental protection and they can see the provincial government passing them on the highway, going the other way. That's a really serious concern and I don't think that's the perception you as a government want to be promoting. But that is perhaps the perception that's out there, that the municipalities are ahead of you.

The Vice-Chair: That's the close of our time. Thank you for coming. We enjoyed your presentation.

MARGARET HUTCHISON

The Vice-Chair: Would Margaret Hutchison like to come forward, please. Margaret, welcome. I would like to advise the members of the committee that there is no handout. There will be one coming later.

Ms Margaret Hutchison: Thank you. I'm really glad to come after the group ahead of me because they've done more of a line-by-line assessment of the bill and I probably concur with a lot of what they've said. I'll introduce myself in a little bit. I have learned planning by confrontation, planning by the OMB hearing, and I'll be giving you some examples that will answer some of those questions.

I'm a farmer. I live in Grey county. By profession, I'm a consultant on communications and medical research and science, not a planning and legal professional, but through the planning process and my introduction to it,

I've become a quasi advocate at the OMB for farmers and developers and anyone who has difficulty with the planning system.

My first involvement, actually, was a letter to the editor. I read an article in the Globe and Mail on the Algarve coast in Portugal, and the headline was, "Billion-Dollar Industry Going Down the Tubes as Development Takes Over Algarve Coast." It seemed to fit in with some of the issues that I was being presented with, which was a hydro corridor that would go between my house and barn after I'd just invested a large amount in my house there—I might have chosen another site had I known that was in the works—swiftly followed by a conversion of what is a provincially significant wetland formally known to me as "the swamp." Ontario Hydro was told to go around it because it was going to be difficult. It's the headwaters of five rivers in Ontario. It's on the Niagara Escarpment. A lot of issues I had never paid attention to before, but when I found that it was still going to go ahead without my input—and subsequently, then, the application to convert this to a hunt club next to my sheep farm. The two uses did not seem to me compatible.

As a result of this letter to the Globe and Mail then, I received responses from—I didn't even know people in my county could get the Globe and Mail at the time. I used to drive 20 miles just to get one on Saturday, and that was the closest we came. But there were a few people who read it. Out of that then came several people who had been former municipal reeves involved in the development of our county official plan who were finding that this plan was being totally ignored, and their friends and neighbours who have other occupations besides staking their turf against residential development, gravel pits, snowmobiles, other farming operations which were not compatible with their own. For instance, I wouldn't want someone raising wolves beside me. Their county was really in an economic crisis because of this.

In fact, the province was sustaining bad planning by, with the one hand, allowing people to go to the Ontario Municipal Board, allowing municipalities to make decisions and totally disregard their official plans, and allowing them to tell land owners, "If you don't like it, you can sue us or you can get a lawyer and a planner and everything else and we'll deal with that," and, with the other hand, had their hands out that any problems that had occurred, the province would simply subsidize them. For instance, in water and sewage applications, the province will subsidize 85% of fixing the problem.

As a taxpayer—and I think in this recent election you've heard from a lot of other people like me—that does not make sense. I'm pleased that some of what has been done with the Planning Act that I have been involved with the last five, six years through two governments now to streamline and make sense of, is occurring. But as the group ahead of me pointed out, there are a few things which I still have difficulty with.

I'm not going to dwell on the "shall have regard to" and "be consistent with"; I'm sick to death of that. But the objective to have clear policies on the province's part, a bottom line that says this is the product we want to come out with, this is what we need to give our citizens the kind of security, whether they're farming, whether they're building a retirement home, whether they're starting a ski club, whether they're opening a gravel operation. If the school board builds that school right beside the gravel pit—subsequently we've had a school that had to move because the two were getting closer and closer. It's now a hockey camp, I believe. I'm not sure how that's compatible, but I guess they don't go out for recess, they go over to the local arena. But there was, I don't know, $4 million or $5 million of a school just torn up because no one was thinking that of course the gravel use would expand, because that's where the gravel is. God put it there. You can put houses or schools in other locations. The whole purpose of this planning is to provide that kind of security for everyone.

To go back to that theme, a perfectly good term I feel has been overused—"common sense." In planning, common sense for one person is not common sense for the next person, and the whole purpose of planning is to allow everyone to have some measure of security and economic benefit. I'm pleased that the sort of long title for this bill is to support economic development and the environment, and the two are definitely compatible, interchangeable, interdependent. We cannot afford not to protect our environment.

In an instance of an area where development was banned five or six years ago, because of projected water plans which the Ministry of Environment had raised, in an area which is a bedroom community to a larger area, now those people—and their expectation is what has been dashed—are suddenly being asked to spend $4,000 or $5,000 extra simply to have that water upgraded. The buildings either never should have been there in the first place or everyone should have agreed that yes, it's worth it to do this right. But let's do it right, because we can't afford to have all those houses suddenly empty; or they can't be sold, because who will buy a house that has no clean drinking water and no way of disposing of waste?

In a sense, when I say I've worked through three governments, this goes back to the expectation after the Second World War, as you all know, of the Planning Act to just provide this kind of security for Ontario. I'm not going to dwell on the "have regard" and "be consistent with," as I said, because we've all heard too much about it. But I think if this government does nothing else with this bill, give clear policy to prevent the kind of confrontations that I see every day and take time out on my-you know, no charge to go and help people, and my only success is that I haven't lost an argument at the OMB yet, because it's always common sense, and you can't ignore that. When it's been put into an official plan and everyone's agreed on it, there are no exceptions.

One of the issues that is of special interest to me and that I worked on through these last six years is the notice regulations. My feeling is that if everyone who would have some stake in—often this applies to provincial ministries. There are ministries that have not been notified that there's an application going ahead. My concern with not allowing a ministry to make an appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board or to Municipal Affairs to ensure that they appeal it is in the case where there's such a swamp of paperwork and data is wrong, an application does have a mistake in it. This has happened time and again. In my own case, the Ministry of Natural Resources approved something and it had looked at the wrong property. When you get out into the backwoods, it's not difficult to happen. We're improving that a lot now with our new GIS—geographic information system—computer mapping and integration. I hope all of those initiatives that had been started under the reform of the Planning Act through Bill 163 will continue.

But this is where good notice to everyone involved will ensure that the kind of information that has to come will be there and that we will not be paying for the kinds of mistakes that I've seen happen time and again. In one instance, the Ministry of Environment sent someone and wondered why culverts were 10 feet off the ground, thought the Ministry of Transportation must have been dreaming that day. Anyone who's lived there as long as everyone in the neighbourhood has knows that every once in a while that highway is completely under water, and so is everything around it, and of course you couldn't put three retirement lots in that area. But for the person who brought it to the ministry's attention, it involved two years of struggle with an OMB hearing, with, "Do I get a lawyer or not?" and not for his own property, simply for his own community, for the potential neighbours who would move in who would subsequently, the first year their basement flooded or their road was washed out, be going to his own municipality, which would be liable for that decision. This is the kind of thing that this bill is going to hopefully straighten out.

The other part of the bill that has been of particular interest to me, of course, is what was formerly policy D—I'm not sure whether all those names apply—the agricultural policy. I'm quite involved with the federation of agriculture. Grey county—and Bruce to some extent, but more Grey—is not entirely unique in the province, but we have excellent farm land interspersed with rocky pasture land. As sheep farmers, as beef farmers we make the highest use of that land by pasturing our livestock on the poorer land and using the good land for our crops. There is a saying in our area: There are no poor farms, simply poor farmers.

The kinds of conflicts: Every time I go to a federation conference, everyone's talking about, "We need stronger right-to-farm legislation." If the whole purpose of planning is to eliminate those conflicts, we won't need that right-to-farm legislation, because the security that we need will be there.

Like any industry, whether it's farming, agriculture, building houses, there are ups and downs. I think Mr Hampton asked, why do we have to worry about this woodlot, that headwater? The policies that you have—and I'm glad that they've been sort of streamlined or made simpler and more understandable—are comprehensive. You can't tinker with one thing over here and not look at the piece over there; they are all integrated.

Our economy goes up and down just like our stock market, which currently is right up at the top. A few years ago, I think a lot of our planning mess was inspired by that mid-1980s development high which sent everybody off on to cloud nine. I'm seeing a lot of those people's hopes dashed, houses that have been built that have been retired to. In the policy, I see the retirement lot has been put back in. I think the majority of farmers would say that is simply a headache; it's a red herring.

A lot is a lot. Whether you retire on it, whatever you do on it, subsequently it's a land use; somebody will be living there. You can't expect a farmer to live on the corner of a property forever. Sooner or later, someone will be there, and I know many people now who are there, who have houses they can't sell. Who would buy two thirds of an acre when you could by a whole 100 acres down the road for exactly the same price and not be surrounded by somebody spreading manure? In the one instance, they throw their rocks out into the field. The farmer in the spring throws them back on to their lot, because as he says, he farms right up to the fence. It's his field; it's one of his best hay fields.

So in the agricultural policy I would hope that there would not be any tinkering. Look at that retirement lot case. This is possibly where the "have regard for" debate—each area will decide. The difference between Essex and Grey in terms of agriculture is great, and Bruce or North Bay, whatever. Each area will decide, but the bottom line is that we cannot preclude the fact that in the future agriculture will be more important than it is now. We won't know how important it is until it's too late. Although you can put a house anywhere, you can engineer anything in an urban environment, when it comes to farm land you don't have those options. We're quickly losing the good land that we have and, through erosion and flooding and a lot of other things, we're downgrading the good land that we have as well.

That's where the notice regulations in the rural areas are particularly important. I think in an official plan, once you've decided there's going to be a development in a particular area, the kinds of notice and discussion that take place are quite different from when a land use is totally changed from a hay farm to a gravel pit or to a subdivision. The time lines on official plans and official plan approvals: Although 180 days may seem long, in the context of the kind of planning we've had—Grey county started its official plan three or four years ago and it still doesn't have it done—180 days is not too long, but certainly 90 days is simply not going to work if we're trying to get the kinds of good planning that we want.

I'd make an analogy to going to a bank with a business plan to borrow money. If your business plan simply said, "Give me the money," the bank would say, "It's been nice meeting you." But if you go with detailed plans of what your expectations are, what you're going to do, what you expect that financial supporter to help you with, you're probably going to go ahead, and you wouldn't even go if you weren't serious about it. You would have taken at least a couple of months or whatever was appropriate to get your plan together.

So I think those time lines have to be looked at again. That's where I say I think the comments of the group ahead of me—and I know Waterloo county looked at the same things I was concerned with.

Something that hasn't been raised at all, and maybe this is a good place to put it in—I've written on the top of my page, "water." In our area and in Bruce and Simcoe, and to some degree in Dufferin, water extraction and the extent of water extraction has become a real issue. We're the headwaters for groundwater in Ontario, and I don't have all the statistics on how many of our communities are dependent on groundwater—clean groundwater—but there has been an initiative to include water extraction for commercial purposes in the Planning Act as a land use.

This is coming from land owners and from municipal politicians alike, and I'm not going to go into it now. I think the bill was called Bill 126 or something, a couple of years ago. I know Ms Fisher knows it quite well, knows exactly the issue, because it's right in her backyard. It's Formosa, I believe, a brewery, and then someone who's simply taking water. Not to preclude that this isn't an industry too, but why do we have to keep our water clean? It's not just so that I can go outside my door and get clean water, but this is going to be a natural resource that is a big commodity and is something that makes Ontario attractive to industry coming here.

I asked a water bottler once, who was using water to make fruit juices, actually, exporting to the States, how they could compete with all the other big companies that they were competing with, and they said just saying that it comes from Canada is—people assume that it's clean and that it's a better product. I'm not going to dwell on that now, but I think that's something that should be looked at to put back in.

I was on a list to comment on Bill 26, only because of the conservation authorities, and I'll be brief on this as well. The initiative there basically to kill them is inconsistent with what we've been trying to do and I believe governments have been trying to do, which is to put more responsibility and accountability with the municipalities. These water issues are just such a case.

Perhaps if Ministry of Natural Resources doesn't want the conservation authorities, maybe it could give them to Municipal Affairs and have them coordinated with the Planning Act. This is where the suggestion of all these environmental assessment acts, all these things that have to do with planning—in the case of conservation authorities it's planning for water quality and quantity—should be coordinated. Maybe this is the time, if MNR has difficulty with managing conservation authorities, the appropriate place would be Municipal Affairs.

I'm not going to go on too much longer. One thing I wanted to say was I've heard a lot of grief about those 700-page guidelines. I know that's a good door stopper; I have two copies. But the red herring is that this simply puts on paper what basically professional planners have known and allows some measure of shared knowledge across the province. Of course, several people were horrified by it, because maybe they didn't know they knew so much or there was so much to know. We can be overregulated and that's where I'm glad to have things simplified, but we do need the support of the province for municipalities when they're drawing up their official plans. I don't think you can opt out, as the group ahead said, without good reasons why. Your official plan might not deal with some kind of density if you're in Timiskaming or somewhere, but we have to remember that it has to be simple and clear. We also need strong support from the province so that wherever you live or work in the province, you know that you have the same kind of basic rules.

I think that's all. I am going to sort of put this into a short brief, just my basic points, to remind you of them.

Mr Hampton: I want to ask you this: Grey county has been notorious over the ages for what you might call haphazard planning, and I understand there have been all kinds of fights in Grey county about overplanning.

In your view, will this bill and the associated policy statements lead to good planning, or will it lead to more of the haphazard decisions and more of the battles that you've had in Grey county?

Ms Hutchison: From my initial reading of it, this bill would provide a context for good planning, provided the province will provide the kind of support and requirements for those good plans and will allow the kind of economic planning and accountability that we need. What I didn't mention was the importance of that conflict-of-interest legislation that was appended to this whole planning initiative originally and which is going ahead. We're planning not for individuals, we're planning for communities. So with those refinements, I think the policies are good but if you don't have to follow the policies, then of course we're going to be back to where we were.

Mr Hampton: Which takes us back to the issue that you said you didn't want to get into.

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me, Mr Hampton. We were at a minute and I'm just trying to keep proceeding here, if you don't mind. I'd like to go to the next question, from the government side. Sorry.

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): I appreciate you coming down and giving us your thoughts. I think you bring a different perspective than maybe many of our presenters, which I think is important. I too am from an area outside of Toronto, in eastern Ontario. I wanted to ask you what your thoughts are with respect to the issue of just the whole principle of local autonomy. Would you agree that municipalities are best able to determine their own communities' best interests being close to the situation?

Ms Hutchison: Some municipalities. This is a bill that has to cover every municipality. My municipality? No. This is the same municipality that would have allowed someone to sever three lots in an area that could be 10 feet under water periodically. Without the kind of support and direction from the province to do this, no. But where a municipality prepares an official plan that is consistent with provincial policy, that covers those basic things that we have to look at and can provide that kind of economic stability where we're not going to be subsidizing bad planning, yes, and there are municipalities that can do that. Unfortunately, it's inconsistent.

Mr Gerretsen: I guess, since the others took one minute each, that means I'll have two minutes? Is that what you're saying?

Interjection: You're special.

Mr Gerretsen: The one-window approach I think most people would agree to, except with this proviso, and I just wanted your comment on it: If the Ministry of Municipal Affairs is going to have the lead in this and it's going to be the ministry through which everything is followed, do you have any concerns that somehow the views of some of the other ministries, let's say the Ministry of Environment or Natural Resources, in effect will be finessed so that there may not be any appeal forthcoming through one of these ministries that would have come if we didn't have the one-window approach?

Do you have comments on that? Do you have any concerns about that?

Ms Hutchison: I am somebody who's been promoting one-window approach. In my area it's a long-distance call to call my neighbour. To have to go to 50 million different agencies to get an opinion—and one thing the conservation authorities have been trying to focus on is a one-window approach.

If the other ministries will provide the kind of support to Municipal Affairs, if Municipal Affairs is under an obligation to honour that approach, if we don't get a turf war between ministries, yes, I think the one-window approach is excellent. But if we can't ensure that there's going to be cooperation—but I've been fighting for that kind of one-window approach now for six years and I fully support it.

Mr Gerretsen: Well, I hope that you're right.

Ms Hutchison: But it will also be incumbent on those ministries to ensure that they rein in—

Mr Gerretsen: That their views be heard and also if they have a serious objection that they insist that the Minister of Municipal Affairs objects.

Ms Hutchison: Yes. I sat through a four-week OMB hearing that I totalled it up to about $3 million or $4 million and I was including all the government's costs, my costs, all the ministries—there were four ministries that were represented by counsel there. There really needed to be just one.

Mr Gerretsen: I agree.

Ms Churley: Most of the Ministry of Environment is disappearing in the course of deregulation and cuts in funding.

Mr James J. Bradley (St Catharines): What if the ministries disagree?

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me, if you don't mind, we're finished our session with this presenter. Thank you very much for coming.

Ms Hutchison: Thank you. I'll codify it into a two-page summary.

CONCERNED CITIZENS OF KING TOWNSHIP

The Vice-Chair: May we have the delegation of Concerned Citizens of King Township, please. Welcome. We would like you to introduce yourselves and remind you that we are restricted to a 25-minute time period.

Ms Margaret Coburn: Yes, I am Margaret Coburn and I'm chairman of the Concerned Citizens, Gillian Watt is my secretary and Elka Enola is a member of the executive and Elka will be presenting as well. We just learned yesterday that you have some preferences for the way we present and that you would like a summary and some recommendations so I have pulled together a little bit which may help you.

On page 2, paragraph 3, I will start off from there and say that during the two years of public consultation by the Sewell commission which resulted in the 1995 Planning Act, our group made five presentations, three to the commission and two to the government standing committee, about ideas that we felt would contribute to the development of a new and better Planning Act in its final form. In its final form, imperfect as it may be, for the first time environmental issues were given a fighting chance to compete with economic issues. We didn't get everything we wanted in it but we hoped that this government would move it forward and make further improvements.

We agree that streamlining was important, but Bill 163 addressed this. There was no time really to see just how effective it was, but certainly it addressed that issue. We agree that municipalities should have more control where it's reasonable, but strong policies are essential for this, and Bill 163 addressed this.

In our view, Bill 20 nullifies this. We agree that affordable housing policy had its flaws when it was applied across the board. But what we think we have in Bill 20 is somewhat a case of throwing the baby out with the bathwater.

Our recommendations include that there be a longer period for discussion of this issue and that some meetings be held in rural communities, not all of them only in Toronto or in cities. It improves a lot if you can have some of these meetings out in the rural communities.

We need time to examine the potential impact of many of the proposals within this bill, which may or not be all right. We can't tell in the short time that we have. I'll try not to repeat any of this within the context of my presentation.

I'm speaking on behalf of the Concerned Citizens of King Township. We are an incorporated, 25-year-old, volunteer citizen organization working within and across King township to support and promote a planning policy for the township that will achieve an orderly pattern of development and protect and preserve its natural environmentally sensitive features. Today, we have a township of which we are proud and we look forward to being able to say that 20 years from now. We are, by the way, not allied with any political party.

Many people moved into King township deliberately because of the rural characteristics of the area, which are becoming more difficult to find so close to a major city. They have chosen to move to King in many cases to raise their families. Often the working member—or members as it is now—of the family work outside the municipality in an urban centre. They want their chosen community to continue to be a rural community, a community that maintains itself largely on volunteerism and active farm interests.

In two letters to the Minister of Municipal Affairs, dated October 4 and November 7, we expressed our deep concern about this government's proposal to—and I used the word “demolish,” which I believe was used in the throne speech—demolish Bill 163, which became the 1995 Planning Act. I would like to read excerpts from the replies we received from the minister, which I presume is the government position, which probably explains the nature of our presentation today:

“This government is committed to promoting economic recovery by cutting red tape and getting rid of obstacles to growth.”

“These amendments are intended to further give municipalities more control over local planning decisions and ensure that environmental rules continue to be tough.”

If this bill is enacted, the first statement may indeed barrel ahead and cut red tape and get rid of obstacles to growth. But promote economic recovery? In our view, much more than this bill is needed to promote economic recovery. We believe in fact that it will contribute little but will create many difficulties that seem to be overlooked in the bill.

The second statement, that Bill 20 will ensure that environmental rules continue to be tough, is wishful thinking. It's true there are many environmental words in the bill, but without teeth they mean very little. Good planning should not be sacrificed in the name of some vague goal of achieving economic growth. We need good planning to help us achieve economic growth, not one or the other. Good planning will do much to achieve it.

During the two years of public consultation by the Sewell commission—and I did mention that, these five presentations to the various committees that were meeting. The changes that are now being proposed are intended, and I quote from the minister's letter of December 4, “to speed up the process, give municipalities more flexibility and strike a better balance between economic and environmental considerations.”

It is our view that more flexibility will not speed things up. On the contrary, it encourages conflicts and unnecessary argument and will in fact waste time, nor will it protect economic or environmental interests.

What will speed the process are rules that are clear, fair and firm—and I think you've heard some of that today from other people—so that everyone understands that no means no and yes means yes to the greatest possible degree. This requires clarity in wording in the act and strong provincial policies. Bill 20 will take us back to the days of uncertainty and consequent delays and animosities. The uncertainties will exist for everyone, developers, potential buyers and long-time residents.

It is our view that the statement in the 1995 Planning Act that planning decisions “shall be consistent with” provincial policies greatly improves the process for good planning decisions to be made. Reverting back to the totally ineffective wording “shall have regard to” makes a mockery of the stated intentions of this government.

In reality, it relegates the policies to the status of guidelines. Decision-makers will be free to do whatever they want as long as they glance at the policies, if Bill 20 passes as it stands. Politics will have the strongest influence on the decision-makers, not good planning, just as it was prior to the passing of Bill 163. If the intent is that building under vague planning limits will effect economic growth, where is the evidence?

I'd like to ask Elka to carry on from there.

Mrs Elka Enola: I think that I object to the economic considerations in the provincial policy statement of December 1995 relating to Bill 20, but I can't be certain because I can't crawl into the brains of the authors of the document in order to find out what concepts they intended whenever they refer to “economic growth” or “economic development” or other terms relating to economics. Furthermore, in spite of the pages and pages of definitions, there is not a single definition relating to economic terminology. This is extremely important because repeatedly and consistently the document gives primacy to economic concerns over all others, including those relating to prime agricultural land and to the environment.

As a holder of an honours degree in economics, I'm most clearly aware of the unscientific nature of economics. The essence of a scientific discipline is accurate predictability, something which is notoriously absent in the field of economics. You put four economists into one room and you will likely get five interpretations of a given situation and six predictions.

We all know of how statistics can and are manipulated to produce the desired outcome, so it is only prudent that intelligent citizens be most concerned about policies and programs where significant choices are based on unspecified statistical evidence.

Repeatedly, economic growth and economic benefits are given precedence over other factors. Since there is no definition provided, I must presume that the definitions that will be applied will be (a) the traditional ones commonly used in the past and (b) those consistent with the other economically related practices and policies of the current government. In other words, a policy whereby a variation of “What's good for General Motors is good for the country” will apply.

The traditional thinking was that if companies prospered and made large profits and incomes for the shareholders and the senior staff and directors, then the company would also be providing a good income for employees and everybody would be better off. This was true in the 1960s and the 1970s and the 1980s, but it is most definitely not true now.

In the past, when traditional measurements indicated economic growth, employment was high. Not today. While we are getting reports of economic gains—and we are getting these reports—we are not getting reports of reduced unemployment. While we are getting reports of economic growth, people are cashing in their RRSPs in much greater numbers than before. While we are getting reports of economic growth, people are being laid off without any warning; others are having jobs reduced to part time. Everywhere among the working people there is great insecurity. Permitting the use of replacement workers has greatly reduced the effectiveness of unions and thus added further to the insecurity of workers.

People who are insecure financially do not spend money readily. When virtually the whole population is hesitant to spend money, no long-term economic benefit is possible, no matter how one defines it. When cost-effective development, whatever that means, is permitted on prime agricultural land for any reason whatsoever, we are dealing with a situation of gross irresponsibility. The policy statement allows for such development “where there is no reasonable alternative.” I suggest to you that there is always a reasonable alternative.

Prime agricultural land is irreplaceable. In any case, it should never be replaced with urban development. Let's face it: You can build a house anywhere, but you can't find prime agricultural land everywhere.

Unbelievably, “extraction of minerals and petroleum resources” is permitted in prime agricultural areas

"provided that the site is rehabilitated." Again, the primacy of company profits over all else.

Firstly, the prime agricultural land will be removed from production for many years. Secondly, I categorically do not believe that a prime farming area that has been used as an oilfield for 20 years can be returned to its former state at the end of the time.

When the only important policy measurement is, how much money will the company make? we have a socioeconomic disaster of major proportions in the making. The primacy of economic benefits as it appears in the policy statement is a hazard to the land and to the people of Ontario.

Mrs Coburn: Some additional observations—and there are others we could have made, but these we would like to make: To illustrate our concerns about vagueness in wording, we deplore such expressions as "promote" cost-effective development patterns, "encourage" cooperation and coordination and "strengthen" the role of rural areas. I believe these are known as encouragement statements, but if they aren't backed by operative statements that say how and what is going to happen, they are really very bland words.

We would like to see clear definitions for such words as "ecosystem," "environmental assessment process," "environmental study," "impact study," "intensification," "rural areas," particularly "minor variance," "significant" and "provincial interest," to name a few.

There is no longer a requirement for a public meeting re a proposed plan of subdivision or for severance, and there is no reference to support for curbing urban sprawl, although I had thought this government was in favour of that. Public discussion is limited in time and location, as I have said.

In general, we have consistently throughout our presentations re Bill 163, Bill 26 and today re Bill 20, expressed concern that terminology should be clear, definite and unequivocal, such that there's no room for doubt about the government's intentions regarding planning in this province. It seems to us to be important to point out that the objectives of the developers are not the same as the objectives of government. And government needs to make its intentions clear in order to avoid unnecessary and costly conflicts over what may and may not occur in land use planning in this province. Regretfully, this bill represents a large step backwards in this regard.

In conclusion, it really is devastating to realize that the democratic process condones the cost of an incredible number of hours and money spent by politicians, professionals and unpaid citizens to create a piece of legislation that will clarify and improve how our land will be developed, only to have a new set of players sweep it all away within a few months of coming to power. We do suspect that few of you took part in the previous process and probably fewer still have looked at any of the submissions that were made over that two-year period. Yet it appears the government believes it knows that it all should be undone. We earnestly request that you take a little longer to study the direction in which this bill will take you and that you extend the hearings for a few weeks to allow for more people to comment. Thank you.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you. We do have about 13 minutes, but before we enter into that time, I'd just like to make one point. I'm not sure whether or not you're aware that the hearing process is three weeks long. Everybody who asked to be on the agenda has been accommodated on the agenda and in fact the hearings are travelling throughout the province. We'll be going to Sudbury, Cobourg, Ottawa, Hamilton, London. I don't know if you are aware of that or not.

Mrs Coburn: I did hear that originally and then I understood that the meetings were to be held here. I heard that later and maybe that's incorrect.

The Vice-Chair: I'm just clarifying a point for you. It's for information purposes.

Mrs Coburn: Thank you.

The Vice-Chair: We do have approximately three minutes each again, starting with the government side. Dr Galt.

Mr Gerretsen: Excuse me, three minutes? If we have 13 minutes, that's close to at least four minutes each.

The Vice-Chair: Sorry, we are to finish at 11:31.

Mr Gerretsen: If you have 13 minutes, and presumably you do, your statement, that's four minutes each.

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me. I stand to be corrected on the math. I have recorded here we started at 11:06 to conclude at 11:31, and I certainly would be pleased to take out the minute or so that I used. So I'm sorry. We are down to nine minutes, and that's what I said, I think.

Mr Gerretsen: No, you said 13 minutes.

The Vice-Chair: Sorry about that. So if we go with three minutes each, please. Dr Galt.

Mr Galt: Thanks for the presentation. The first comments from the chair were part of what I was going to comment to you as well, that Cobourg is indeed very rural and outside of Toronto.

I'm interested in your comments on concerns over environmental protection, and I gather you're referring to general protection of wetlands and lands around those kinds of areas. We too, by the way, are concerned about that kind of protection.

One of the things I was repeatedly hearing during the last election was that farmers in particular and land owners were having their lands confiscated by regulation without ever being notified, that they were losing the rights to use these lands as they had previously, as they had purchased, and there was nothing on deeds, etc.

Yes, there's no question we need to be protecting this. But who's responsible? Is it the farmer who has to give his or her lands to the province for the use of the public in general and lose the value that they previously had? Is it environmental groups? Is it the province of Ontario? Is it municipalities? I think it's a basic question we have to answer because I don't think it's fair. The farmers are struggling enough as is without taking more from them. Do you have any thoughts in that general area?

Mrs Coburn: I think it is a big problem. But it seems to me in European countries they have solved this problem somehow by maintaining that rural lands will be rural lands, or agricultural lands will be agricultural lands. The idea is that the farmer doesn't give something, but the sale of farms will be made from a farmer to a farmer.

If in fact the rules are there, then somebody who does want to farm, and there are young people in this country who do want to farm, knows that if they go to a certain area they may be able to find a farm there because agricultural land is there. As it is now, there's so much uncertainty of it that I know that young people are having difficulty knowing about this and also they're competing in price with a farmer who may be able to say: "Well, I've got an offer from a developer at this much. If you want to pay me a little more, I'll take it." And that's really unfair to the young people.

So we feel if there's certainty that agricultural lands are clearly defined as such and that's what they are—we do need them—this will make life easier for the farmers and the younger people coming along.

Mr Galt: And as you develop and come up—

The Vice-Chair: Thank you, Dr Galt. I'm sorry to interrupt.

Mrs Coburn: I'm sorry; I only half answered your question.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Gerretsen.

Mr Gerretsen: Thank you very much. And I totally agree with you. Even though there may be two weeks of hearings—I think in fact it's two weeks and two days—there's a great, big difference, and this government simply doesn't understand the difference, between being allowed to make a presentation and being given two or three minutes to respond to it in this kind of dialogue and having clear-cut consultation. There is a huge difference with that. I think anybody who's been involved at any other level of government or school boards full well understands that what makes those situations work more than anything else is that consultation is more than just a three-minute dialogue on a particular issue, particularly with a bill that deals with so much as here. So I thought that your point was well made. This is not effective consultation.

Mrs Coburn: Not like the Sewell commission consultation program that was on before.

Mr Gerretsen: That's correct. I wonder if you could tell us in just plain, ordinary language—and I realize you're not professional planners and what have you—why you would want to have a public hearing on a subdivision development. I think this isn't being understood by a lot of people. Presumably you've got a piece of land that is already zoned properly etc. So now what the government is suggesting is, let's take the public hearing aspect away because it's already zoned; not too much can be done about it anyway. Why would you want public input in a subdivision plan? I know why, but I'd like you to say it for the committee.

Mrs Coburn: Well, in a rural area, which we come from, a subdivision coming in makes a profound difference to the area in every way: numbers of people, the institutions that we have to support them. The nature of the land that's there is not always understood at all or examined by the developer who is coming in. We feel that the people in the area, who have often worked very hard to get the plan that exists in their own community, know a good deal more about the issue than the developer coming in.

Mrs Enola: I'd like to just add something from a personal point of view. I was born in Montreal. I lived most of my life there. I lived in London, England, in Toronto. I'm essentially big-city. I moved out just west of Schomberg about seven years ago and you cannot drag me away from there now.

The rural areas are divided by side roads and concessions. Between Concession 11 and 12, where I live, along the 19 Side Road on the north side, where I am, all the properties have been subdivided into 11, 10, 14 acres. They had been originally two big farms, I believe. On the other side of the road, I face a huge farm and then some other equal 10-or-12-acre things.

We chose that location because next to us to the north and to the west and to the south are good agricultural lands with operating farms. Indeed, just north of us is prime agricultural land that's classified number one land. So we thought: "Okay, if we move here, we are safe. We are not going to get a subdivision. We are not going to get a McDonald's. We're not going to get any of that stuff. This is going to stay rural." When I look through here and I read this, I get worried, because we're looking at the ambiguity; that's why we are concerned about having no statement. Suppose somebody decides: "Hey, this is residential. We can do infilling. We can take into the farm across, into the area across, and we can now put in a big subdivision." That's not what I moved out to the country for. That's what I left.

So again, this is the perception why you have to have a public hearing when there are cases like this. I read this from two points of view. I read this from me living there, and I read this as a developer saying: "Hey, this is residential. They're not farming." None of us are farming. We're living out there watching the grass grow, watching the leaves. So this is the concern.

Ms Churley: Your presentation is what, to me, real common sense is all about, and I hope the government takes note of some of the things you say. What essentially the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing is saying is: "Trust me; I know best. I don't really need to consult with the people of Ontario." This is a very complex area in municipal planning, and as you stated, our government with the Sewell commission spent two years and then extensive hearings across the province after that from the government. Not everybody was happy with it, and we couldn't come to a consensus at the end of day, but people hammered away and tried to reach as close as possible.

But you know, this is coming from a minister, the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing, who didn't know the contents of his part in Bill 26 and had to make amendments after he said he'd quit if it turned out he was wrong. Well, he was wrong and he's still with us. But there are real concerns around that when a government with this kind of arrogance says, "Trust me; I know best."

I just want to tell you as well that I as the critic for Environment and Energy have some real concerns around the fact that the Ministry of Environment has been severely cut back in terms of money, and deregulation going on, and also the Ministry of Natural Resources. There's real concern around the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing being the only one who can appeal, and we haven't been guaranteed that these other ministries will be able to have a say. The other problem is, of course, with so much staff reduction, will the public have the benefit of the knowledge of the Minister of Environment and Energy and Natural Resources? So those are just some of the concerns that we have in terms of the bill going through in the state it is. I don't know if you have time to comment or not, but probably not.

Mrs Coburn: That's one of the things that I think we should be discussing, because I'm not at all sure that a one-window process really is the answer. I think it should be explored very thoroughly, because it could in fact do something quite different: It could eliminate the impacts from the other ministries and put them too far distant from the actual decision-making. So I would like to see more discussion on that, and we would be willing to be a part of it and also to listen.

The Vice-Chair: I thank you for your comments and I thank you for coming this morning.

CITIZENS FOR AFFORDABLE HOUSING, YORK REGION

The Vice-Chair: I would ask that the Citizens for Affordable Housing for York Region come forward. Good morning, sir. Welcome to our hearing process.

Mr Peter Formica: I'm Peter Formica, the coordinator of Citizens for Affordable Housing in York region. Today I would like to be speaking on Bill 20, the section where they're repealing the accessory-units-in-houses legislation, just a small portion of the bill.

Mr Chairman and members of the task force, for the past eight years the affordable housing committee of York region has been lobbying and advocating for the provision of more affordable housing choices. We have supported the implementation of Bill 120, An Act to amend certain statutes concerning residential property. We believed its implementation would deal constructively with the many affordable accessory units in the region, ensuring that future units would be safe and built to the Ontario Building Code.

Bill 120 had many benefits, from housing people and boosting the local economy by the sale of building supplies and the employment of building trades at a time when they desperately needed work to assisting municipal compliance with the 1989 land use planning policy statement. The legislation also dealt with approximately 100,000 units in Ontario that were illegal through zoning and worked towards ensuring all apartments in houses are safe and built to code.

Many municipalities and housing groups in York region have worked hard to build affordable social housing units. However, there still are many people without adequate and affordable housing. Most of our non-profit housing has been directed to seniors and families. Now our existing government is cancelling the building of any additional units through the passing of Bill 20. Apartments in houses help provide housing for non-seniors and young couples. This sector of the housing problem has been sadly neglected for too long.

The Hemson report, which was a housing needs study for the regional municipality of York, states that York region would require 1,000 assisted units per year for the next five years, for a total of 5,000 units. With the cancellation of all government housing programs, apartments in houses will have to fill all these needs or the problems associated with low housing vacancies in York region will increase substantially.

The CMHC report dated April 1995 stated that York region has a vacancy rate of 0.8%; that's eight in 1,000. With the new proposed changes, the percentage will only decrease. According to Stats Canada, York region's population has increased from 505,000 in 1991 to 577,000 in 1995, a net increase of 72,000 people. York region's share of the greater Toronto area's yearly population increase was: in 1991-92, 20,000; 1992-93, 19,300; 1993-94, 14,900.

Tenants in the lower incomes are being hit from three directions, and careful consideration has to be given to the implications of any new government policies and how they would affect them. For example:

(1) A 21.6% reduction in welfare payments is driving more people to seek less expensive accommodation.

(2) The cancellation of social housing projects has stopped the construction of affordable rental units in York region.

(3) A change in policy on accessory apartment legislation would have the effect of less private affordable rentals and would therefore be the final door closing on them.

A survey of employers was taken by the affordable housing committee in York region in March 1990 in the city of Vaughan. Sixty employers who had a payroll of 25 or more, representing a wide range of businesses and industries, were asked if they were having difficulty recruiting staff and if they perceived housing costs in the area to be a contributing factor. They were also asked if they would be in favour of more affordable housing options in Vaughan.

Of the 15 surveys returned, 100% reported difficulty with recruitment and all favoured more affordable housing in town. Of particular concern was the lack of rental accommodation for employees earning less than $26,000 annually, but several indicated problems recruiting even at the higher wage levels of up to $55,000.

A survey taken in the town of Markham in 1991 had similar results. A total of 58 companies in Markham returned questionnaires; 66% of the respondents were still having difficulty recruiting personnel, and the majority of these perceived that the higher cost of housing in Markham contributes to this problem. A full 83% of employers who replied were in favour of the development of more affordable housing.

An affordable rental stock can be viewed as an economic asset that helps attract and retain a diverse workforce essential for the various industries in York region. Employers in the retail service and shopping, hospitality, office, manufacturing, transportation and institutional industries are some of the employers who depend on a low-cost labour force. A low-cost labour force depends on low-cost rental units for its housing needs.

In good economic times, employers have a problem recruiting employees when the affordable rental stock is in short supply. Therefore, it is essential that our supply of units be increased, not decreased. An accessory apartment in a house tends to be less expensive than the same unit in an apartment building, making them more affordable. With Bill 120 in effect, competition between landlords helped keep prices down and the units in a better state of repair. If the creation of accessory apartments stops, prices will rise and more people will have difficulty finding suitable accommodation.

The existing prices at our Housing Help Centre in Aurora are as follows: The rooms range from $350 a month to $400—that's where you just share a kitchen; the bachelors, which is a separate apartment with kitchen facilities, are from $450 to $550 a month; the one-bedrooms, $525 to $725; two-bedrooms, $750 to $850; three-bedrooms are from $900 to about $1,025.

There's a special note here: Since the 21.6% reduction in welfare payments, the price of rooms has decreased, and my schedule reflects that, approximately $25 to $50 monthly. Landlords who rent rooms depend on the monthly income to meet their expenses, so they have to rent their rooms regardless.

Another group that benefits from the creation of apartments is the first-time home buyers trying to get into the housing market. Some banks, trust companies and private mortgagors will accept the income from legal apartments to help the applicants qualify for mortgages. Seniors benefit financially from the income of apartments, as well as arranged for assistance of property maintenance by their tenants. Retired homeowners who spend many months away from their property might use the tenants of their apartments to assure their home is secure while they are away. Many insurance companies require changes to premiums when residents vacate properties for long periods of time.

When the task force was conducting hearings on Bill 120, arguments by municipalities opposed to the bill were to the effect that the neighbourhoods would be overrun with rental units. A phone call by myself last Friday, February 9, 1996, had these results regarding the number of accessory units applied for since July 1995 under the new provisions of Bill 120: The Newmarket building department had 10 applications, the Newmarket fire department had 30 units under inspection; the Markham building department had 15 applications, Markham fire department has 22 units under inspection; Aurora building department has six units; Whitchurch-Stouffville has only two units; Richmond Hill building department had 10 units; Vaughan building department has two units and the Vaughan fire department has 60 units under inspection.

The accessory units applied for is very low when you consider the population of York region is 572,000 people. The existing bill is also encouraging tenants who live in substandard apartments an opportunity to request fire department inspection without the fear of eviction from an illegal apartment. The bill also encourages that landlords bring their units up to standards.

Conclusion: The apartments-in-houses legislation should not be changed until a full impact study is done on its implications. Municipalities have overreacted on their concerns on the impact of accessory units. To proceed without fully understanding the impact that Bill 20 has on the employers and the economic effect it would have on the region could have negative results. Our employer study in 1990 and 1991 serves as an indicator of employers having recruitment problems due to the lack of affordable housing for their staff. If the province proceeds with the passing of this bill, we would strongly urge you change the enforcement date to give landlords who have proceeded in good faith time to complete their renovations. It is customary on building code changes to give trades an opportunity, with adequate warning, to complete their building plans and apply for their building permits.

I'd like to thank the committee for the opportunity of speaking to them today, and if there are any questions, I'll gladly answer them.

Mr Gerretsen: It's an excellent presentation, sir, and I think it's kind of ironic that we're dealing in the same bill with committee of adjustment minor variance issues that have been loosened up, where somebody could come in and in effect build monster homes in neighbourhoods that have relatively small homes right now, and yet we're also saying that we're taking away rights that property owners right now have to create second units in their buildings, which wouldn't change the residential nature of a neighbourhood at all. It's kind of ironic that we're sort of allowing the one, which would be much more of a—well, you'd certainly notice it a lot more from the outside than in the other case, where there may not be the same effects at all.

I'm very much interested in the statistics that you've provided us, because 157 units having been applied for in the last seven or eight months in an area that has over 570,000 people certainly isn't a lot.

Mr Formica: Actually, there's quite a bit less, because the building department applications are applications for approval. The applications to the fire department are ones that are already existing and they are in an effort to bring them up to standards.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm glad you pointed that out, sir. Just so we can put some further credence to these numbers, did you go to all of the various approval departments within York region or are there areas that you have excluded? In other words, did you go to all the fire departments and all the building departments within the region?

Mr Formica: No, I did not. Every one of these ones here I personally phoned myself. I did not phone Georgina or the ones further north, East Gwillimbury, because their rates would be very low as well.

Mr Gerretsen: Would be very low, because they're much smaller municipalities than the ones you phoned.

Mr Formica: We have 13 municipalities within York region. Of particular concern, though, is that when I spoke to the Vaughan fire department, it has 60 units under investigation now: 80% of them were from tenants who complained that they wanted their unit updated and inspected; the other 20% came from people in the neighbourhood who had complained. There wasn't one application from the landlords themselves. In other words, the last bill, the new restrictions, are forcing people to update their units and bring them up to the code standards. That's why there will always be a discrepancy between the inspections and the applications.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you. I appreciate that. Third party?

Mr Hampton: You make some arguments, and I simply want to go over them again. The evidence that you've put together here indicates that in fact the market for affordable rental units is increasing dramatically in your part of York region.

Mr Formica: That's correct.

Mr Hampton: And yet the changes in the law that this bill will make can have the effect of dramatically reducing the number of apartments that might be legally available in existing homes or existing dwellings. Is that right?

Mr Formica: If the act is changed and the municipalities do not give the people the right to create a basement apartment, or an accessory unit wherever it is, then it will have the effect of putting less affordable housing units on the market. It will also handicap an empty-nester who has a big home who prefers to have a little income.

Mr Hampton: In your experience, will people put what will then be illegal apartments on the market anyway? In other words, will people rent them out even though they're illegal?

Mr Formica: Well, before the last act came into effect, we had over 100,000 units across Ontario.

Mr Hampton: So what the government's going to be doing is it's going to be creating, or contributing to, a situation where in effect there will be a lot of unregulated and potentially unsafe apartment units.

Mr Formica: If the apartment is illegal, then the tenant in the unit cannot complain to the fire department because they stand to get evicted. As long as the units are legal, the tenant can complain to the authorities and insist they be brought up to standard and therefore they can't be evicted. They won't get evicted because of it.

Mr Hampton: What do you think's going to be the outcome then? I mean, I know how the market works. I know, for example, that you can prohibit the sale of some items, but if there's a public need for them, and there's a public need for housing, then those goods, in this case illegal apartments, will go on the market in any case. If you've got all kinds of apartments around that are not subject to fire department inspection, are not subject to building code inspection, that fall far below the safety requirements, what do you think's going to happen, if the government puts people in that situation?

Mr Formica: Regardless, if a person needs a home, they will not live on the street. They will live in any apartments that are available and it is normal they will try to live in the best one. I've seen people come in and take a unit until they can find a better one. But if there are less units out there, they don't have the choice and the prices will rise. Already, on my three-bedroom units, they've increased $70 within the past couple of months.

Mr Hampton: What do you think will happen in terms of people's health and safety in those illegal units?

Mr Formica: It's not a good situation. A lot of people don't like living in basement apartments. If they have asthma or other conditions, or rheumatism, some of them just cannot live in basement apartments.

Mr Hampton: And what about the fire protection issues?

Mr Formica: The fire protection issues, you have to make sure it complies with the building code. Any basement apartment, to me, can comply with the fire codes if it's built properly. It is not that expensive to put in a fire door at the top of the stairs and a smoke detector. I don't agree that the units should not comply with the building code or with the fire code, because you can comply and you can comply cheaply.

Mr Hampton: Yet all of these are going to fall outside any regulatory or inspection measures.

Mr Formica: It can happen.

1150

Mr Pettit: I took the liberty last night to speak to a number of my neighbours in Hamilton, Hamilton Mountain, that is, in single-family neighbourhoods, and the consensus seemed to be that they're not in favour of the government legislating second-unit housing. Having said that, do you not feel that the municipalities are best able to determine what is in the best interests of their neighbourhoods as opposed to the province?

Mr Formica: If you came back and told me in the municipality that the planners were regulating where they go, I would agree with you, but if it's the municipal politicians who's doing the legislating where they're going to go, I can't agree, because what they have a tendency to do is group them in certain parts of town and they don't spread it evenly across the whole town for the community.

They put them in sections of town that are less desirable, and if a person has a house with 3,000 or 4,000 square feet and their children have gone off to college, then it's very difficult for the municipality to say, "Okay, you can have an accessory apartment," because it's in a higher-class neighbourhood. I get them in higher-class neighbourhoods and one of the restrictions was that one of the homeowners said, "Yes, I will rent you out an apartment but you must park in the garage because I don't want my neighbours to know I'm renting."

Mr Pettit: Do you think municipalities should be able to register the basement apartments?

Mr Formica: I would be in favour of that if that means we're going to keep accessory units. Let them register them; let them get them inspected. In planning, if you create areas, which we do now, industrial-commercial, residential, don't say it's residential single family.

If my neighbour next door has five people living in his house and I have two, then I should have the right to have two more people living in my house, even though they're not related to me. If you're going to legislate it planning-wise, then what you should be legislating—I'm not recommending—is that in a house you can have so many people living per so many square feet. That would be a more just type of planning.

Mr Jerry J. Ouellette (Oshawa): Just to follow up on that, don't you think, though, that if a municipality recognizes the needs for affordable housing to support low-income jobs, they would look for areas to initiate that through the political process, because you said the politicians would probably not support that.

Mr Formica: We had a negative effect in 1990 and 1991 when we did our needs study, when the employers in Vaughan were begging to have more units created and the municipality of Vaughan was totally against affordable housing.

Mr Ouellette: That seems overly counterproductive to the community.

Mr Formica: It was counterproductive because the employers themselves were saying, "We can't hire people." Especially in the manufacturing area, if they're making under $30,000, $25,000 a year, they can't afford the high price of housing. They need those bachelors and one-bedroom apartments to live in. I presume the economy of this country and Ontario is going to change, and when it does change, we don't want to put the employers in the position where they can't get employees again because of housing.

Mr Ouellette: You think the municipality should not have the option of making that decision.

Mr Formica: You should have a right to have accessory units within certain guidelines.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for attending this morning.

Mr Hampton: Madam Chair, I'd like to present a motion at this time, if that's all right.

The Vice-Chair: That's fine.

Mr Hampton: We can debate it at some later point, but this is the essential text of it:

Whereas Bill 20 has a significant effect on the natural environment and our natural resources in Ontario; and

Whereas the Mike Harris government has taken many measures to dismantle environmental safeguards that protect our environment and health during the last eight months; and

Whereas the minister responsible for the protection of our natural environment and our natural resources is not scheduled to come before this committee;

I move that this committee formally request the Minister of Natural Resources to appear before this committee to answer questions relating to the effect of the Planning Act amendments, Bill 20, on the natural environment, our natural resources and the people of the province of Ontario.

Ms Churley: I'll second that motion.

The Vice-Chair: There's just a mover required, but thank you very much. Is it the wish of the committee to deal with this at this time?

Ms Churley: If I may, I presented a motion earlier, that we could deal with it at lunchtime. However, Mr Hardeman, I don't know if you're ready for us to deal with it now, or would you rather wait till the end of the day?

Mr Gerretsen: I thought it was the end of the day.

Mr Hardeman: I have no objection to dealing with the motion now, but I think we did have unanimous consent of the three parties that we would not deal with it till the end of the day.

Ms Churley: So we'll deal with the two of them at the end of the day?

Mr Hardeman: The Chair may want to rule on it, but I suggest they are similar enough that dealing with one resolution would put the other one out of order, but that's the Chair's decision.

The Vice-Chair: I would ask, in dealing with the motion that has been put on the floor at the time, whether or not we would like to deal with it now. That's really what the question is, whether we'd like to deal with this one right now or whether we'd like to delay it and deal with both of them at the close of session today.

Mr Hampton: I'd like to ask in connection with that, is Barbara Jamieson here?

Mrs Barbara Jamieson: Yes, I am.

Mr Hampton: Let's hear from Barbara Jamieson and then we can deal with the Minister of Natural Resources motion, if that's all right.

The Vice-Chair: Before we deal with the delegation, I would like to finish off this motion. I understand that what Mr Hampton has just recommended needs unanimous consent. I would like to know if we do have unanimous consent to deal with this after this next delegation or not, or whether we should be leaving it till the end of the day and deal with them together.

I'll deal with the motion that's on the table right now and what it requires to proceed past this point is unanimous consent to either deal with it at the end of the next delegation or at the end of the day. Ms Churley has indicated there seems to be consensus to delay the other one till the end of the day.

Ms Churley: Mr Hardeman and I discussed that. My preference is to deal with them both at the same time. It just makes sense, given the motions are very similar.

Mr Hardeman: We would support unanimous consent to deal with them both at the end of the day.

The Vice-Chair: Is that agreed? Thank you.

BARBARA JAMIESON

The Vice-Chair: Mrs Jamieson, I apologize for the delay and I know we're a little bit behind. We'll try and make sure we move through this in a fair way.

Mrs Jamieson: First I'd like to thank the Chairperson and certainly the members of the committee for having me today.

I'd like to commence by stating that I support accessory apartments with health and safety standards in place. Before Bill 120 was passed, municipal zoning bylaws discriminated against the economically disadvantaged individual and householders. Without standards, families and the children of these families were at risk.

Stated in the 1990 report by the Advisory Committee on Children's Services titled Children First, "All children have fundamental entitlement to necessary health care and treatment and adequate nutrition and housing." One of this committee's statements of goals was, "Laws that affect children directly or indirectly must be written and amended to express and give force to their entitlements."

Municipalities allowed accessory apartments to grow in numbers without health and safety standards in place, ignoring this important issue. No attention was paid to the United Nations report on the world's children which made the case that children should have first call on society's concerns and capacities and that children should be able to depend on that commitment in good times and bad.

Children and their families need stability and an environment which is safe and healthy. If the power of control is given back into the hands of the municipalities, you put these families in jeopardy as they were in the past.

Our present vacancy rate is low and inevitably the greedy will exploit renters. Before Bill 120, the municipalities held on to antiquated bylaws, keeping tenants at the mercy of disreputable landlords who chose to rent basement apartments with no health and safety standards even considered, bylaws that were ineffective and whose only design seemed to be to keep many of the population in fear: fear, because some households such as young families and seniors needed to rent. People who normally were honest, law-abiding citizens were now breaking the law.

A fact sheet produced in October 1992 by the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and the Ministry of Housing stated that there were approximately 100,000 apartments in houses in Ontario. Previous governments directed municipalities through the 1989 Land Use Planning for Housing policy statement to eliminate excessive zoning standards to allow apartments in houses in residential areas. Very few municipalities complied with the policy, but basement apartments continued to grow in numbers.

There was a need for more affordable housing choices. Scarborough city, where I reside, did a study funded 80% by the province which indicated there were at least 15,000 apartments in houses in Scarborough. I just remind you, that was when they were illegal. One method municipalities used to fight legislation of accessory apartments and having to put standards in place was to claim there was a parking problem.

From a personal point, families like mine that don't have basement apartments encountered the problem because our children became old enough to own cars. A Metropolitan Toronto study found that one- or two-bedroom converted dwelling units had fewer cars than a one- or two-bedroom non-converted dwelling unit.

Municipalities knew that ignoring their very existence was not going to make them go away.

Please let us not return to the time when home owners and tenants lived under the jurisdiction of irresponsible municipalities that didn't act responsibly when for many years the opportunity was there to do so.

Let us not forget, for many families renting out can assist them in acquiring a home or even for some to acquire the ability to stay in their homes, and for renters, providing relatively affordable housing choices. I know and accept the fact that government-subsidized housing simply cannot meet the needs of many of your constituents. Renters should have the choice to live closer to special schools, parks, shopping malls and other services they may require.

Ontario's population growth rate is high, many settling in the Metro area. Let us be careful not to put into place barriers which will prevent a mix of people and housing in communities to occur.

I am sure we all recognize that poor quality housing is one of the causes for family breakdown. A family's housing situation is an important factor for the wellbeing of children. You and I must care for our children and our children's children. The present government has appealed to us to take responsibility for our relatives, our friends and our neighbours, to give them a helping hand. On the issue of accessory apartments, past experience shows us that municipalities lacked this initiative.

Leave Bill 120 intact. Don't provide municipalities the power to revert back to where "love thy neighbour" was not a priority, when accessory apartments under their jurisdiction continued to grow, and health and safety standards were ignored.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much. If you'd like, we'd like to get into a bit of a question and answer period. We do have 19 minutes left, so that's over six minutes per party.

Mr Hampton: You've hit on the nub of the issue, so I want to go over that with you. The fact of the matter is—and some of the people in the government caucus I think want to deny this—that municipalities have had the opportunity in the past to properly ensure that health and safety standards—fire safety, electrical safety and certainly health issues—were observed. They've certainly had the opportunity to deal with this area appropriately and they have chosen not to.

Mrs Jamieson: That's the truth.

Mr Hampton: So when the province intervened here we had a situation, as you point out, where there were over, as I understand it, 100,000 illegal apartments and that none of these apartments had, in effect, received the kind of electrical or fire or other safety inspections that they ought to have had. So what do you say about simply letting this go back to municipalities? What do you think the effect will be of simply letting this go back to municipalities?

Mrs Jamieson: I think it's obvious. I mean, 100,000 occurred when they were illegal. We're going to get the same again if people need them and we're not going to have the health and safety standards in place. I can't see that people who are in need are going to change that. It's going to happen. What I say is that a lot of these citizens are normally very law-abiding citizens. You're now putting them into a position where they have to be going against the law. They're going to do it anyway. I'd rather see the health and safety standards in place.

Mr Hampton: You were here when the previous presenter, Mr Formica, made his presentation.

Mrs Jamieson: That's correct, I was.

Mr Hampton: He quoted a lot of evidence that indicates that in fact the need for and the demand for these types of apartments in dwelling houses is going to increase, and in fact going to increase dramatically. Is that your sense too?

Mrs Jamieson: I think so. I look at even my own personal situation where, for instance, there's a good chance that my daughter, who's a wildlife biologist and is on contract positions—I can see her coming home again. I assume that you're aware that when the apartments were illegal, I couldn't have her live in my basement, even if I put in any kind of separate facilities. I don't have a basement apartment now, but if she needs to come back and live there, I'm going to have to put something else in there.

I think that's the problem for a lot of families now: There are a lot of children or a lot of family who are coming back. I can recall, when they were illegal, there was a gentleman in Barrie who was quite harassed by the municipality, where he had his mother living in a basement apartment and the municipality went after him and in actual fact he had to evict her and had to put her into his part of the house. They fined him heavily and he had to pay. These are the kinds of horrendous things that were happening when they were illegal. I see that continuing.

I even look at Scarborough. I have to tell you that when they did the study, which the province funded 80% of, they got the results of the study, the mayor at that time made some bizarre statement to say that one third of the residents wanted basement apartments, one third wanted them legalized and one third didn't and that meant that they didn't want them. Even some of her colleagues had a problem with those kinds of figures. It made you wonder why she was even making that kind of a statement.

On top of that, nine of the councillors in Scarborough voted to not inform their wards that they were going to have a public meeting to discuss the results of those surveys. I went around knocking on doors in my area, because we were one of the wards not to be informed, telling them that whether they were for basement apartments or against them, they had the right to go to the public meeting and hear what the results of that survey were. I was phoned and harassed by my local councillor and warned that many of the colleagues were going to go after me because I had done this.

This kind of irresponsibility in my part—if I'd had a tape, I would have loved to tape it, but it wasn't possible. There was another break of confidence which I won't go into, but it was certainly to do with Metro, with this same local councillor whom they had informed about my filling out an anonymous survey. I, fortunately, got the copy of that letter, so if I ever had to proceed with any harassment—could you imagine what it would be like for me if I ever decided to put in a basement apartment, what would happen? Because that same councillor is still there.

I saw so much irresponsibility on behalf of the municipality, which knew they were there. They even had trouble with the consultant that they hired; I must admit that the province recommended him, but they hired him. There was this firing and bringing him back and letting him go, and he finally quit, because the study didn't read the way they wanted it to be. Those are the dangers I have.

I am just recently retired and a former employee of the Catholic Children's Aid Society, and worked in Scarborough for 20 years. I went and visited apartments that you wouldn't have a dog live in, but these tenants were not able to speak to their rights because they had no rights, except the potential to be evicted. It was fear-mongering.

Mr Galt: Thank you for your presentation and expressing your concerns for those who do rent apartments. I'm a little concerned and disturbed as I think about municipal politicians and what you're saying and what you're suggesting. Where I come from, I hold municipal politicians in the highest regard. They do a great job. They try their very best. I'm not saying they always come up with the right decision. That may depend on your vantage point or where you're coming from. But you don't seem to have—I'm paraphrasing here—very much trust or faith in your municipal politicians. Do they operate differently in Scarborough than the rest of Ontario?

Mrs Jamieson: I'm not going to go on record and say that. I think I have a little more common sense.

Mr Galt: I guess I'd have to disagree; I heard it.

Mrs Jamieson: Let me say that the experiences that I have relayed to you have not made me feel comfortable towards the municipal politicians. Now, when I say that, it's like every other thing is—I don't say all of them. I'm not saying all of them would do that, but I am saying that there was a large portion who voted not to even allow us to know the results of a survey that was our taxpayers' money. We had that right. They put the advertisement in the paper and said, "Ward so-and-so and so-and-so, there's going to be a public meeting," which implied that we couldn't go, but I knew that we could. But you'd be amazed at how many people did not realize that. I must admit that I'm very sceptical. I want them to prove themselves before I can support them.

Mr Galt: The other area to toss back to you is in connection with registration of apartments, knowing where they are, making sure that they meet the standards.

Mrs Jamieson: I think that's an excellent idea. I have no problem with that. In fact, I really believe that bill would encourage people to register them. I think they should be registered.

Mr Galt: So you're supportive of registration, but you're not supportive of leaving it in the municipal hands?

Mrs Jamieson: I'm really nervous of the fact that, looking at what happened before Bill 120—and I worked on this area for 10 years—municipalities were not willing to accept that they were going up—"Let's not look at this situation"—until they got to the point where they were in so many numbers.

I guess the other thing I want to say is, I don't believe the 100,000 apartments in houses were all not good. I do believe there are good apartments out there, but you do get some pretty horrendous ones that really need to be monitored.

Mr Hardeman: I'm just wondering, on the issue of the accountability or the wishes of local council to make the decision, you suggested there had been a public meeting held but it was not very well advertised, that some members of council seemed to prefer that not everyone attended.

Mrs Jamieson: That's true.

Mr Hardeman: Having said that, would you not agree with me that this type of an issue, whether we have single-family residence areas or whether we don't, should be a decision through public consultation and the wishes of the individual communities, that this should be a decision made by those members of the communities through the public hearing process which is required through the zoning process?

Mrs Jamieson: I think it's very important that that happen. The only thing is that in our case, where there was a survey done and it did show really that two thirds were willing to have them for different reasons and one third was not, and yet it seemed as if the people who got called were the people who were sitting on the side of the municipality's feelings, just fortunately the rest of us were interested enough to keep scrounging around and make sure that we knew when they were going to have these public meetings in order to address them. So it was a concern, but yes, I do believe that public meetings should be held.

Mr Hardeman: So you would suggest that going through the local process with public meetings would tend to lead to the direction of the good neighbour syndrome, as you mentioned in your presentation where I think the neighbours agreed with it?

Mrs Jamieson: Well, I think as long you're not going to do every basement apartment or accessory apartment that's going to be built. I think that would be difficult; I mean, to inform them about everyone. You're now delaying a process that you have trouble keeping going as it is. I still think the other thing is that if there's a long delay, it could encourage people to just put them in anyway without informing the municipality.

Mr Gerretsen: Mr Galt and I agree on at least one thing. It's been my personal experience as well that most of the municipal councillors I've dealt with over the years have been trying to do their best and have usually acted in the best interests of their community. I know that during this entire process the last couple of days, we've heard all sorts of comments that people have made where maybe they've had individual experiences with local councillors that have been not only negative but almost bordering on the harassment situation etc.

Would it be fair to say that your concern can be summed up this way? You have no problem with registration, you have no problem obviously with having health standards for units and things like that, but the real problem is that a local council may try to keep the secondary units out of the so-called better residential areas where usually the bigger houses are that can usually accommodate the secondary units better than in perhaps areas of towns or cities that aren't as desirable. Is that the concern?

Mrs Jamieson: Just looking at where I reside, I would say that that's exactly what happened. It was obvious because you could tell which councillors were in the wards where there were much bigger homes that still had the basement apartments in them, but they ignored that. So yes, that did happen. It was obvious at times.

Mr Gerretsen: It's interesting that you would say that they've been ignored in some of those areas. I know too of some of the better areas of the city where I'm from where you've got basement apartments. Somehow it's not an issue to the people who live there, but it is an issue to the neighbours—not about those apartments but about the apartments that are somewhere else in the city. I guess my question is, do you have any concerns about any other aspect of the act at all; for example, dealing with the deferral of public notice requirements in the approval of subdivision areas?

Mrs Jamieson: I must say that for me, having gone from a professional status to a citizen only, there are a lot of things that I haven't been privy to as I was in the past. So I really focussed in on one of my main concerns, and that is that people do be informed. I think it's important that people have a say. But in terms of some of the nitty-gritty details, I must admit I don't have any real opinions on that, other than I think that your public, who are your taxpayers, have a right to at least be informed.

Mr Hampton: I wonder if you could agree with this statement. I come to me that the argument we've heard from you and from Mr Formica amounts to this: The choice is between accessory apartments that are regulated and that meet health and safety standards and accessory apartments that are unregulated and do not meet health and safety standards, because the market is going to exist, no matter what.

Mrs Jamieson: That's definitely my opinion. At the last set of committee meetings, one of the MPPs asked me if I really wanted children to be brought up in basement apartments, and I said to them, and I say to you now, I don't have a garage on my house and I would love a garage, always wanted one. I don't have one and I'm never going to have one, and that's part of life. Not everyone is going to be able to afford a home, so the reality is, I want what's best for them, for those who are going to rent. They're not going to have the finances or maybe they choose not to live in a home. Some of the elders like to live with their families but they want some independence, so therefore the basement apartment is an option.

I know our next-door neighbour at one time didn't believe in basement apartments, until her husband had a stroke, and what she brought in was she put in a basement apartment and they had a nurse live there who was able to help with services. So when I look at that, I say I still want those health and safety standards in place. I don't want to return to where there was a system where we just totally ignored them and some of them were in deplorable condition.

I went into a home that was a client-based home at the time, where there were two single mothers in a basement apartment who shared one living room. One had one child and one had two children and they had one bedroom between them. There was no kitchen; it was a bar, where the gentleman had pulled out the panelling and put in a fridge and a stove. This is because it was illegal, so he wasn't going to report it, and they certainly weren't going to bring the fire department in or the building code in, because they might get evicted. It was all they could afford; he charged them $500 each a month for that.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for coming and being patient with us. We do appreciate your presentation.

Before we adjourn, I'd just like to remind us that we should be back here, at 1 o'clock; otherwise we're going to back up the others as well. Is that what we agree to? Okay. We adjourn for this time.

The committee recessed from 1223 to 1313.

The Vice-Chair: I think we will proceed. Although we don't have a quorum, we have a consensus from those who are here to proceed so that we don't get so backlogged that we can't catch up to this.

METRO TENANTS LEGAL SERVICES

The Vice-Chair: We have our first delegation here from Metro Tenants Legal Services, Mr Young, welcome.

Mr Toby Young: Thank you. Good afternoon, members of the committee, my name is Toby Young and I am a staff lawyer at Metro Tenants Legal Services. I'd first like to say a few words about who we are and what we do.

Metro Tenants Legal Services is a community legal aid clinic formed in 1976 to advocate for the advancement of the legal rights of tenants in Metropolitan Toronto. We give information and advice to tenants on our telephone information lines, in our offices and by providing duty counsel at landlord and tenant court. We also provide legal representation for low-income tenants and groups whose cases have the potential to advance the rights of many tenants. We deliver public legal education targeted especially to groups who generally lack the access to information and advice concerning their housing rights. And finally, we assist tenants to organize themselves, often in conjunction with other organizations like the Federation of Metropolitan Toronto Tenants' Associations.

With respect to Bill 20's amendments affecting the apartments in houses, at the outset let me say that we are dismayed that the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing is introducing this legislation. We feel that the provincial government ought not to be abdication its leadership role in the creation and implementation of housing policy. Municipalities have been unresponsive to the needs of a substantial number of constituents in terms of providing affordable and inclusive housing choices. MTLS views the proposed changes as regressive and reactionary and unrelated to any rational approach to the housing needs of low-income tenants. What follows is a review of those sections of Bill 20 which relate to apartments in houses from the perspective of their potential impact on tenants in Metro Toronto.

I now turn to the amendments to the Planning Act, subsection 1(3) of the bill repeals the definition of residential unit, which had been added by the Residents' Rights Act. Section 8 and subsections 19(1), 21(1) and 29(5) repeal the restrictions concerning the content of official plans, bylaws and plans of subdivision with respect to two-unit premises.

We do not support the repeal of those provisions of the Residents' Rights Act which made apartments in houses available as of right throughout the residentially zoned areas of any municipality, town or village. It is our view that Bill 20 will inevitably result in less choice for tenants, as municipalities move to prohibit the development of apartments in houses by passing new bylaws. One need only to be aware that over 30 municipalities are part of a charter challenge opposing the apartments-in-houses provisions of Bill 120 to gain an understanding of local governments' attitudes towards apartments in houses.

In our view, zoning should emphasize the distinction between uses and where an area is zoned residential there ought not to be any further zoning restrictions based on the type of residential accommodation that tenants are living in. Where the premises are truly residential, we believe that the laws must apply equally to all tenants.

In our view, zoning bylaws that permit only single-family houses in residential areas are outdated and premised on a myth of the nuclear family that no longer reflects reality, nor the goals and values of the majority of members of our communities.

These bylaws may appear neutral but their impact is not. Justifications are often couched in the language of planning or drains on services, but historically these municipal rules have controlled who may live in residential neighbourhoods. Giving that power to local politicians may suit the desires of elements of a community, but such bylaws silence the voices of many others who make economic, social and cultural contributions within that same community.

These bylaws have a disproportionate impact on various groups of tenants, namely single people of all ages, single-parent families, people who are new to Canada and people whose incomes prohibit them from seeking other forms of housing. Zoning can be and is used to keep different groups of people out of a neighbourhood. In our view, the right to adequate housing cannot be at the option of municipalities.

MTLS is also concerned about the impact Bill 20 will have on tenants in these apartments as compared to other types of tenants. One of the most important protections for tenants' quality of housing is the requirement in part IV of the Landlord and Tenant Act that landlords ensure that the premises they rent are in a good state of repair and fit to live in. The apartments they rent out must comply with health, safety and housing standards.

While tenants and their advocates can find no lawful reason for those provisions not to apply to tenants living in illegal units, since they pay rent like other tenants, the courts have been inconsistent in their decisions on whether tenants living in illegal apartments in houses are covered under the Landlord and Tenant Act. These interpretations leave tenants and their advocates struggling to secure safe housing in the shadows of the law.

Judges in landlord and tenant court have managed to take away the rights of tenants if there is a contravention of a zoning bylaw. For example, in one case involving an application by a tenant under the Landlord and Tenant Act for repairs and an abatement of rent, the judge would not grant the remedy to the tenant, holding that the tenant's letting of the premises contravened the zoning bylaw and the court would not force "an illegal contract."

I'd now like to turn the members' attention to the retroactivity provisions of Bill 20. It is subsection 74(2) of Bill 20 which makes those provisions regarding official plans, bylaws and plans of subdivision retroactive. In effect, Bill 20 grandfathered existing apartments in houses which were legal on or before November 16, 1995. While MTLS is relieved that those apartments in houses will be deemed legal, there's an overriding concern that the retroactivity of this legislation is both unnecessary and potentially damaging to the rights of tenants.

The effect of this provision is that there will be created two classes of apartments in houses. There will be those that already existed before November 16, 1995 which will remain legal, if they met the planning standards under the Residents' Rights Act. Homeowners of these units will, of course, still be required to bring their apartments up to the provincial fire standards. However, new apartments created after November 16, 1995 will once again be at the mercy of their local government. Each municipality will be able to create exclusionary zoning restrictions for all new apartments in houses, determining where they can and can't exist, and what planning standards will apply.

Bill 20 will, therefore, create a double standard: one set of rules for apartments in houses created before November 16, 1995, and a second set of rules for those created after that date. These double standards will create mass confusion for tenants and homeowners. Tenants will not know whether their apartment is legal and what standards will apply. This lack of common standards across the province may result in this form of housing once again going underground in much the same way as prior to the passage of the Residents' Rights Act.

Bill 20 will undermine tenants' security of tenure and where tenants don't have the security of tenure under the Landlord and Tenant Act, they are also not secure in the knowledge that they will be able to enforce their rights without fear of reprisal from municipalities. There will be confusion created about the legality of apartments in houses and it will be difficult to advise tenants of their rights where they are caught between these two pieces of legislation.

There is a very real possibility that tenants will once again find their homes to be illegal as they become subject to zoning bylaws which once again prohibit apartments in houses. MTLS recommends, therefore, that the provisions of Bill 20 not be made retroactive to November 16, 1995. Instead, MTLS proposes that the amendments come into force on the day Bill 20 receives royal assent. Otherwise, there will be apartments in houses which will be affected and tenants' security of tenure jeopardized.

I'd like to move now to the amendments to the Municipal Act.

Subsections 59(2) and (3) permit municipal bylaws to contain provisions concerning: (1) the registration of two-unit houses and the revocation of those registrations; (2) the imposition of specific standards which must be met in order to register; (3) requiring as many inspections as necessary, prior to registration, to determine compliance with the standards.

MTLS does not support the creation of a registry for apartments in houses. We maintain that there is already a lack of available resources for the inspection of apartments and that by adding an extra layer of bureaucracy in the form of a registry these scarce resource will be stretched even further. The costs of creating and operating a registry would be better directed towards the hiring and training of municipal inspectors to enforce compliance with safety standards.

Not only does Bill 20 permit registries, but it also allows the passage of bylaws which may prevent an apartment in a house from being occupied where the house is not registered. In effect, for tenants this creates yet another reason for municipal authorities to shut down their home, that is, for the owner's failure to register. As well, it empowers municipalities to specify those planning standards which must be met in order to be registered. This enables municipalities to preclude registration by specifying a wide range of planning standards, to which any non-conformity could result in an inability to register the unit, thus rendering the apartment illegal.

In short, a registry simply sets up a whole new set of obstacles for homeowners and potential legal problems for tenants in apartments in houses. MTLS maintains that there is no evidence which warrants this type of arbitrary and intrusive treatment towards apartments in houses as compared to other forms of housing stock.

If the purpose of these provisions is to ensure that safety standards are complied with, MTLS takes the position that there are already methods available to municipalities such as the Building Code Act and the fire code to deal with the substandard apartments in houses. MTLS is concerned that these amendments will only further enable municipalities to crack down on these apartments.

In conclusion, we have to ask if these proposed changes advance the rights of tenants. The answer is an unequivocal no. MTLS does not support the repealing of those provisions of the Planning Act that restricted municipal power to exclude apartments in houses in residential areas. The Residents' Rights Act prevented any official plan or municipal bylaw from prohibiting the creation of apartments in houses in areas where residential use is permitted by law. Despite the fact that we had some criticisms of that act, MTLS supports the present state of the law in the face of the changes proposed by Bill 20.

By once again giving municipalities the power to pass bylaws which prevent apartments in houses, it is open to municipalities to zone this crucial supply of housing back into a realm of "illegality." Prior to the passage of the Residents' Rights Act, MTLS received numerous calls from tenants living in illegal units inquiring about their rights. Since the passage of the Residents' Rights Act, the number of calls that MTLS receives from tenants living in illegal units has been reduced to a few calls per month.

We would expect that this situation will change, because these amendments will reduce tenants' measure of security in their housing even further. Sending apartments in houses back into the realm of illegality will again reopen issues of illegality due to zoning bylaws.

Tenants in legal apartments in houses already face more insecurities than other types of tenants in that they may more readily be evicted for landlord's own use under section 103 of the Landlord and Tenant Act. Moreover, because these units are not required to be registered with the rent registry, these tenants are not as well protected by the Rent Control Act and are more vulnerable to illegal rent increases. As such, these tenants are already less secure than are other types of tenants, and Bill 20 can only serve to reinforce this vulnerability.

Given existing residential housing in many neighbourhoods, these amendments leave municipalities with far too much power to restrict access to available and affordable housing. Zoning, by its very essence, is a negative tool; it can only be preventive. In contrast, apartments in houses are a proactive and creative way of dealing with the shortage of affordable housing and developing vital communities.

Finally, the basic reality is that apartments in houses will be created with or without municipal sanction. This type of housing is needed by tenants and is desired by tenants. The undeniable fact is that apartments in houses exist and will continue to exist despite municipalities' attempts to ignore or eliminate them, which is clear evidence that municipalities are unwilling to recognize people's housing needs.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much. We have 10 minutes left, which will be divided three ways, starting with the government representative.

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): We should divide it two ways.

The Vice-Chair: Maybe they'll show in time.

Mr Baird: If there's still no representative from the Liberal Party here, do we get to split their time?

The Vice-Chair: Actually, we'll use that time to make up some of the time lost waiting to start. In fairness, we did agree with three.

Mr Baird: I appreciate your presentation. I just want to fundamentally underline the principle in the bill which causes concern: the issue of local municipal governments having the authority to introduce and maintain zoning requirements within their municipality. With respect to the issue of basement apartments and second apartments in the same home or semi-detached, you said it would cause chaos. Do you think there would be genuine chaos there, with the grandfathered provision? Given the host of regulations and requirements for tenant protection and what not, there will be things much more complex than this. It's simply that if you had it before November 1995, you'd be grandfathered. How would that chaos manifest itself?

Mr Young: The point I'm trying to make is that by grandfathering in certain apartment houses up to a specific date, those become legal so long as they comply with the standards at that time. However, for those units created after November 16, retroactively they will be zoned illegal when municipalities move once again, as we anticipate they will, to prohibit second units or apartments in houses in those places. There are a number of units which could be created which will fall into this grey area, this no man's land, if you will. We think that's going to create even more confusion for tenants. It would be better, in our submission, if these particular provisions weren't applied and that it just be made effective as of the date of proclamation or royal assent.

Mr Baird: With respect to municipal registration, all of us would agree that first and foremost, above anything, health and safety is a priority, to ensure that there are safe environments. What has been your experience with municipal registration in this area? What are your thoughts on how it would manifest itself?

Mr Young: As you probably heard, MTLs opposes registration. We simply don't think it's necessary. In effect, the purpose of Bill 120 and the Residents' Rights Act was to ensure that health and safety and housing standards were met in these units. The problem for a long time was that they were ignored. Finally, they were recognized and legalized and there were mechanisms put in place to make them safe. If you ask me, this legislation is simply unnecessary and can only, in my mind, be a mechanism for potential abuse by municipalities that dislike this form of housing.

Mr Baird: I know there are strong concerns in communities where people have concern about never being able to find a parking spot at their principal residence. There are some communities in my area where they put the houses as little as three feet apart and there's simply very little room for parking and what not. And there's the whole infrastructure there that the municipality obviously has to provide, from snow removal, water, sewage, basically community infrastructure, transportation, a whole host of things. It's the government's view that we want to return that authority to the local level for zoning, and it certainly isn't based on any negative aspect of tenancy whatsoever.

Mr Young: Assuming that's correct, I would still argue that the so-called drain on resources or the inability to provide adequate parking—in the evidence I've seen, that simply doesn't hold up to any kind of scrutiny. There's some evidence to suggest that people who rent apartments in houses are less likely to own cars, for example.

In terms of drains on services, the fact is that the demographics are changing. You have these big family homes now with one or two people in them. The nuclear family is much smaller than it used to be, and by putting a second unit into a house you really don't increase the volume of people in that house. They were formerly there back in the heyday of the 1950s and 1960s.

In short, we're not convinced that those arguments raised in support of this bill are persuasive.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Baird. We'll go to the opposition.

Mr Gerretsen: No, thank you.

The Vice-Chair: Ms Churley?

Ms Churley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I want to come back to the registration again. I find it interesting that you talk about an extra layer of bureaucracy and that scarce resources will be stretched even further. I agree with you that the most important area where we need to spend very scarce resources these days—with municipalities losing about 47% of transfer payments, the resources are even going to be scarcer. I find it peculiar that the Solicitor General of this government objects to, for instance, gun owners having to register their guns and justifying it on the basis of too much bureaucracy, too much trouble for the gun owner, too much expense—who's going to pay for it?—yet they're demanding that people register a second unit in a house. I just find that a weird contradiction and I'm wondering if you have any comment on that.

Mr Young: I certainly agree with your point. I would think guns are more dangerous than apartments in houses. The basic point here is that registries really just aren't necessary. The dangers that have been alluded to regarding apartments in houses and the people who live in them simply don't hold up to any kind of clear analysis. And with resources very, very limited, as you say, it would be wiser, in our submission, if that money was spent on enforcing the standards onsite by having inspectors go down to the units, as opposed to creating this bureaucracy with forms to be filed and people to be hired and what not.

Ms Churley: The question is, who's going to pay for it? Are you concerned, as I am, about the cumulative effect of this policy, which will certainly restrict again second units in housing, along with the threat of losing rent control legislation and this government also getting completely out of providing affordable housing? We've already had people freeze to death on the street. There are more and more homeless. There are kids ending up in tiny, cramped motel rooms because they have no place to live. Couple that with the welfare decreases, and these all at a certain point come together. I wonder if this is for you part of the overriding concern, that we're going to lose affordable housing in Ontario.

Mr Young: Yes, absolutely. This is just one very small part of a housing program implemented by this government which we are adamantly opposed to. We believe the provincial government has a strong role to play in the creation and implementation of housing policy in this province. So-called getting out of the housing business, to my mind, is not an adequate solution. It will leave those who are most vulnerable and most unable to find housing even more vulnerable, despite whatever good intentions the legislation may have.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for attending this afternoon. We welcome your presentation.

CANADIAN BAR ASSOCIATION—ONTARIO

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): Will the representatives from the municipal law section of the Canadian Bar Association come forward, please. Good afternoon, and welcome to the committee.

Mr Lex Bullock: Thank you very kindly. Mr Chairman, members of the committee, my name is Lex Bullock. I am the chair of the municipal section of the Canadian Bar Association of Ontario. With me is Virginia MacLean QC, the first vice-chair of the municipal section. What we'd like to do today is to divide our presentation into two halves. I will be dealing primarily with the first half of Bill 20; Ms MacLean will be dealing with section 23 on. You have our presentation before you.

I don't propose to deal with the sections individually. As a matter of principle, our section and the bar association is here today to support the government's move towards a more efficient planning process; however, of course to emphasize the importance of retaining a fair process when looking at these kinds of amendments.

When we speak of efficiency, we really think of two particular criteria: The first is the question of timely decisions and avoiding delay and the streamlining aspects of Bill 20; the second is the issue of a reasonable and affordable cost for appeals and of the planning process in general for those whose rights are affected by the planning process. It's important to remember that these are property owners, in addition to the development industry. I think that's a perspective that needs to be kept in mind: Property owners are affected by decisions made under the planning process.

If I could take you to the introduction of our submission, as many of you know—I see Mr Hardeman is here, Mr Gerretsen is here—the bar association has been very actively involved in planning reform in this province for some time. We very much appreciate the opportunity to provide input to this committee about Bill 20 and, as I mentioned earlier, commend the new government for its willingness to address unresolved concerns about planning reform. With the exception of our continuing concern—and, I would emphasize, a very serious concern—about the committee of adjustment provisions, the Canadian Bar Association of Ontario generally supports the present amendments. It is our opinion that Bill 20 has succeeded in addressing several of the major shortcomings of Bill 163, the previous amendments to the Planning Act. Ms MacLean will be addressing very specifically the issues about the committee of adjustment and our concerns in that regard.

Commenting upon section 1 of the bill, the new definition of "public body" in subsection 1(2) has the effect of consolidating provincial planning appeals with the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing. It is our opinion that such a corporate approach to planning decisions and appeals is appropriate and will encourage more efficient decision-making; in other words, a very appropriate role for the province to unify the objections or concerns of the various ministries in the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing.

However, we are somewhat concerned about the regulation-making power in subsection 1(3). If such power were to be exercised frequently, it would detract from the efficiencies previously achieved by the corporate view by unifying the appeal review power in the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing. It would be our recommendation that subsection 1(3) of the bill be deleted.

I'd next like to address section 3 of Bill 20. This section amends subsections 3(5) and 3(6) of the Planning Act to remove the "shall be consistent with" provincial policy statements test that was introduced by Bill 163. The "have regard to" test that originated with the original Planning Act, 1983, has been reinstated. We believe that this is one of the most significant and important amendments in Bill 20.

In its submission to the standing committee on administration of justice in September 1994, the Canadian Bar Association of Ontario reviewed the difficulties of complying with the "be consistent with" test. It's our opinion that the return to the original Planning Act, 1983, test is preferable, as it will alleviate the administrative burden and consequent cost upon municipalities by removing the need for a detailed case-by-case examination of each policy statement for every planning decision that's made. In other words, what you'll see, we believe, is that the provincial policy statements will be applied very much at the official plan level, which is in our view the appropriate level for them to be applied at, and then subsequent planning decisions of course will have to comply with the official plan, which has already complied with the policy statements.

We believe that the amendment, the reinstatement of the "have regard to" test, should significantly reduce the costs and delays that would have been created in the planning process if one retained the "be consistent with" test. So again we're very much in support of the section 3 amendments in Bill 20.

I'd next like to address section 9 of Bill 20. This section replaces the section 17 official plan review and appeal processes with a new, direct appeal process with shorter time frames. The section also empowers the minister to exempt official plans and official plan amendments from his or her approval and to authorize another approval authority to exempt official plans and official plan amendments within their jurisdiction from approval.

It's important to note that even if a plan is exempt from approval, the right to appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board is preserved by subsection 17(24). On a plain reading of section 21, the same right of appeal is preserved for official plan amendments, even where those official plan amendments are exempt from approval. We endorse the preservation of these rights of appeal and support the Ontario Municipal Board in its continuing role as an impartial and independent appellate body to hear appeals under the Planning Act.

The new section 17 replaces the existing official plan referral powers with a direct appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board, as I mentioned. The Bill 20 amendments provide that an appeal fee may be prescribed under the Ontario Municipal Board Act. We support the direct appeal approach because it is a simpler and more efficient appeal process. We are concerned that reasonable and affordable appeal fees be prescribed so that the appeals are not prohibitively expensive for the average Ontario ratepayer. Again, the emphasis is upon the planning process affecting the average homeowner, the average property owner in the province.

With respect to section 13, which is the section I'd like to address next, we generally support the reintroduction of shorter time frames for appeals and the direct appeal process, although certainly in our view we have always believed that the Planning Act, 1983, was a very well-drafted piece of legislation and in fact, if used appropriately, had very short appeal time frames pursuant to it as well. So we're somewhat interested in seeing the direct appeal process introduced and again very much in support as a more efficient kind of appeal process, but are wondering why there wasn't perhaps a return to the original time frames provided for under the Planning Act, 1983. With respect to the appeals under this section, we reiterate that the appeal fees prescribed should be reasonable and affordable for the average Ontario ratepayer.

I'd next like to address section 20. This section amends the zoning powers of municipal council as they relate to contaminated lands and sensitive or natural areas and further amends the zoning process to provide notice to the public of the Ontario Municipal Board's new early dismissal powers.

We support very much the giving of this notice of the early dismissal powers to the public. The act provides that this would be done in a timely way at one of the initial meetings for the rezoning. We believe that such notice will ensure that members of the public can preserve their rights in a timely way and understand that if they wish to participate in planning decisions, they need to maintain a consistent position from the initial submissions they make. As respects the balance of the amendments, we would reiterate our support for the direct appeal process, seeing it as more expeditious.

Finally, in terms of my comments, section 21: This section amends the Planning Act to restore the authority to council to pass zoning bylaws prohibiting the construction or use of two residential units within a house. I believe this was one of the issues that the gentleman before us was speaking about.

We have no comment to make with respect to the change in planning policy. However, we do support the government's decision not to amend subsection 35(2). This provision provides that the zoning power does not include the authority to pass a bylaw that has the effect of discriminating between persons who are related and those who are unrelated. This is a long-standing provision in the Planning Act. It codifies the established law of this province, and we very much support the government in maintaining what we see as an anti-discrimination provision in section 21.

Ms Virginia MacLean: Mr Chair and members, in the time allotted I propose to deal with the section 24 change and the section 26 change.

We are somewhat surprised that the government announced it was going to repeal Bill 163. Both of these sections were not in Bill 163. They were in part of the planning studies, and the Canadian Bar Association has commented eight times in this process; this is our eighth time here. We have been consistent in our comments as they relate both to the changes made to the site plan approval processes, which is what you're putting in section 24, and our comments with respect to the committee of adjustment appeal process.

The change to section 24, which is a change to section 41 of the Planning Act, is to give municipalities powers to require land for public transit purposes as a condition of site plan approval.

We would not support this recommendation or this change. It's our submission that municipalities have sufficient power already and there is an Expropriations Act and there are other means of obtaining public transit rights of way rather than putting it through the process of site plan approval.

Our concern is abuse and the potential for abuse that would reside in a municipal council if it had a power to determine something to be for public transit purposes. It may be in their official plan for five years and they may decide it's not there. What happens with that land they've acquired? I would submit that if they are going to put through a subway or whatever they're going to do, there is the Expropriations Act. It has adequate remedies.

With respect to the committee of adjustment appeal process, first of all, we'd like to say we fully support the submissions that were addressed to you yesterday by the Ontario Association of Committees of Adjustment and Consent Authorities. We endorse all the comments contained in their submission.

We have consistently, through the Planning Act review process and into Bill 163, been opposed to any changes to the rights of appeal from a decision of the committee of adjustment to the Ontario Municipal Board. We oppose this very strongly, because this is a private property owner's sole right of getting to the Ontario Municipal Board. It is designed for minor variances. As indicated, if you have the provisions which you are now providing, which give control to the council and do not have a as-of-right appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board, you're slanting everything in favour of either the large developer or the municipal corporation. The small property owner no longer has the rights that were guaranteed to him under the existing provisions of the Planning Act.

Moreover, if you're concerned about fairness of process and you have eliminated the rights of the application of the Statutory Powers Procedure Act to the decision-making powers of the council on its review, you are further eroding the rights of the individual to protect his property.

It's our submission with respect to this particular proposal that you leave it as it is, allow the rights of the individual to be exercised before that committee of adjustment and allow him to appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board.

The last section, the fee cost section of that particular section, we have not addressed specifically in our comments, but we would like to comment on it. That fee cost section, in our submission, is very onerous. We appreciate that this is an age of cost recovery, but this is one area where we submit the provision should not apply. You are taking away the right of the individual property owner to appeal if he is faced with the potential of paying the costs incurred by the board in holding a hearing. If the fees are high and are unreasonable, plus the potential penalty costs provision, we would submit that you are effectively stopping the board from functioning as it now functions in dealing with these kinds of appeals.

Therefore, in terms of an alternative, we had recommended earlier, and you'll find it in our submission, that a leave-to-appeal process could be implemented. We appreciate that one of the concerns was that the Ontario Municipal Board was burdened with too many appeals from committee of adjustment decisions. We had recommended a leave-to-appeal process, so the board could then make its own decision to determine and weed out unnecessary appeals.

Again, as I indicated, we are very much opposed to any change to the committee of adjustment right of appeal, and that is really the main thrust of our submission.

With respect to the other sections, the comments are there in the paper. Most of them that are housekeeping we have no concerns with. Some of them are necessary housekeeping amendments, and we don't propose to deal with any of the comments.

We have a number of comments on how certain of the changes proposed to the Development Charges Act, the Assessment Act and the Municipal Act will work, but they're just editorial changes and they're not anything of substance. That is really the conclusion of my remarks on those two areas.

Mr Bullock: To wrap up, we're here today very much to support efficient planning decisions. We would point out that the efficiency ought not to be at the expense of an inherently fair process, and we're here very much to request you to delete the provisions respecting committee of adjustment appeals to council and to maintain the committee of adjustment appeals to the Ontario Municipal Board.

I can really do no more than quote from the submission of the Ontario Association of Committees of Adjustment and Consent Authorities: "People rely on the fair, impartial and full hearing that is available to them, if necessary, at the Ontario Municipal Board. They may not always agree with the decision, but the objectivity, impartiality and fairness of the appeal process is a fundamental right that is critically important to the parties involved."

It's important to remember that a lot of these decisions affect what we suggest would be the smaller property owner and the property rights those individuals have. Thank you.

Mr Gerretsen: I'd like to turn to this committee of adjustment appeal matter. We've probably heard about that more than anything else. I'm intrigued with your notion that any person who wishes to appeal to the committee must set out the reasons in writing and then all parties have an opportunity to respond in writing and then the OMB could decide. Would you not agree with me that from a practical viewpoint they simply haven't been doing that, have not been using the "frivolous and vexatious" objection section?

Mr Bullock: No, I would not agree. I think the Ontario Municipal Board has been using it very effectively since the power was introduced approximately two years ago.

Mr Gerretsen: How often have they used it?

Mr Bullock: I don't have the statistics, Mr Gerretsen, but certainly it's clear from our discussions with board members and the chair of the board that it is a power that they've been using very effectively to rid the system of inappropriate or unreasonable appeals.

Mr Gerretsen: Maybe we can hear from them then because that's certainly not my impression that's been given by other presenters. In actual fact, I don't think the OMB's time really is spent with committee of adjustment matters. I believe that only 6% of their total time, according to some statistics that were given to us yesterday, is being used in dealing with minor variance matters.

Would you agree with me that one of the main difficulties is that there's a very long period of time, in even relatively minor minor variance situations—I know that's a term certainly that's subject to some debate as to what is minor and what isn't minor—in a lot of cases, to get the board to have a hearing? It's not because of any fault of theirs necessarily, but simply because it just takes a long period of time. If there was some way in which we could shorten that period of time, would that not maybe be a solution to the problem?

Ms MacLean: I think that when you shorten the time you can't do it at the expense of denying a fair hearing; that's the balancing.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm not talking about the appeal times. I'm talking about the period of time between the time when somebody appeals to the OMB and the OMB actually has a hearing.

Ms MacLean: They're about six months right now.

Mr Gerretsen: Right. In a relatively minor situation, do you think that that's too long or about right, or too short a period of time?

Mr Bullock: I think the parties would always like to see it shorter, Mr Gerretsen, but as a practical matter in this day and age—certainly something less than six months would be preferable but it's not an unreasonable length of time.

Ms Churley: I find it interesting—I was just trying to look up section 4 in here but I didn't have time to find it—that you have no comment on it, simply because John Sewell was here yesterday and said that section 4 was gobbledygook and that the government should get the lawyers to look at it. Actually my question isn't on that.

I want to come back to one of the other big issues that's been raised here, and will continue to be, and that's disagreements about "have regard to" as opposed to "be consistent with."

Mr Bullock: Yes.

Ms Churley: I know lawyers who have an absolute opposite opinion to yours, which of course in the legal community is not necessarily unusual.

Mr Bullock: Or any community for that matter.

Ms Churley: That's true. I think you're coming at your presentation very much from a legal point of view, not really examining the policy implications that much.

Mr Bullock: I think that's fair.

Ms Churley: But it has been said to the committee and to me personally by lawyers that just the opposite from what you suggested will happen, that in fact there was a tradeoff made when this bill was created, that municipalities wanted more autonomy and not have to go to the province all the time for approvals; they got that. The tradeoff would be to bring in a consistent provincial policy to have it broad enough, fair enough and with enough flexibility built in, but to make it easier for the smaller municipalities that just don't have the money and the staff to do a lot of the work. That was the tradeoff.

What we're hearing from some people is that the lack of clarity will mean there will be more appeals than ever because this gives any municipality the opportunity to look at it, then toss it aside and ignore it, and then there will be more community groups, environmentalists, all kinds of appeals because there'll be disagreements when you don't have that consistency in front of you. That's the other side of this, that it may look on the surface that it's going to speed up the process. The opposite view is that it will complicate the process and spin it out even longer because there is less clarity.

Mr Bullock: That may be the opposite view. It's one we obviously don't agree with. I think it's important to understand how the planning process works and I think it's important to understand that the primary document that will be measured against these policy statements is the municipality's official plan. Subsequent planning decisions on rezonings and variances then need to conform to the official plan.

We support it because we think that an appropriate kind of testing will be done at the official plan level and that then, once that is done, the local municipality will be able to measure subsequent decisions against its official plan. They shouldn't have to jump back, if you will, back up to the policy statements.

With respect to your comments about appeals, like lawsuits one can never stop someone from making an appeal if that's what they choose to do, but from the bar's perspective, the powers the Ontario Municipal Board has to dismiss an appeal early on in the process are appropriate. That is where the vetting will be done and an assessment can be made about the prima facie, the initial, the on-the-surface, on the face of the merits of the appeals. So that's why we support it as being more efficient.

We also support it as being a clearer test. There is established case law with respect to the "have regard to" test. There obviously isn't with respect to the "shall be consistent."

Mr Hardeman: I thank you very much for your presentation and I think it's fair to say that you are not the first presentation that has expressed some concern about removing the right to appeal for minor variances.

I found it interesting in your recommendation that the Ontario Municipal Board should be authorized to make the decision based on written submissions from all the parties concerned. From your legal perspective, would that be the same for the people writing it in? Would they be getting their fair day in court by written submissions, not knowing what the other side had written in and not being able to explain their position? By the OMB, would that be perceived as being fair and just to everyone concerned?

Mr Bullock: From our perspective, it's always preferable in our view for there to be an oral hearing. But when one looks at the recent amendments to the Statutory Powers Procedure Act it is becoming clear that paper hearings, if you will, when one looks at the cost and the cost recovery side of things and balances that with the question of having your views put forward, are becoming more accepted.

Moving with the times, perhaps we should have added to our submission that there ought to be, as you've suggested, a right of reply to the appellant and I think that's certainly implicit in our submission. If you have the appeal going in and you have the respondent writing in to say it's not meritorious for this reason, we certainly think the appellant should have the opportunity to respond, yes.

Mr Hardeman: The other issue, if I might, Mr Chairman, very quickly, is the issue of the requirement of property for transit by municipalities that was referred to. It's my understanding that the present Bill 163 allows or has that authority for the upper tiers, but it does not have it for lower-tier municipalities, that being the reason it's in there. I wondered if that would explain why it came out of nowhere as it appears to in your presentation.

Ms MacLean: That may well be the reason. Our position is still the same on it, whichever tier government has it.

Mr Hardeman: You're content that if it was good for one it's good for the other.

Ms MacLean: No.

Mr Bullock: We don't believe—it's a question, Mr Hardeman, as I think Ms MacLean explained earlier on, of surplus and what happens in those instances.

The Chair: Thank you both again for your presentation and we appreciate your comments.

Mr Gerretsen: Mr Chairman, I have a motion here that I'd like to move and perhaps we could hold discussion on it until later on in the day if there's unanimous consent.

I move that the committee formally request that a representative of the Ontario Municipal Board appear before this committee to answer questions relating to the current practice and effect of appeals from committees of adjustment to the OMB.

The Chair: Is there consent that we table this motion for debate at the end of the day? Seeing no contrary opinion, consider it tabled.

METRONTARIO GROUP

Mr Paul Mondell: Good afternoon, Mr Chairman and members of the committee. My name is Paul Mondell and I'm here on behalf of the Metrontario Group. The Metrontario Group is a group of companies that I am proud to say has been in business for the last 50 years, developing residential communities and building homes in the greater Metropolitan Toronto area. We have major development projects currently under way in Burlington, Oakville, Richmond Hill, Pickering, Oshawa and the city of Toronto. In addition to these extensive holdings, we have development interests in two other provinces and four states.

Thank you for the opportunity to address you this afternoon on an issue that is very important to our company and to our industry, an industry that has for the last five years been brought to its knees as a result of economic conditions, a lack of consumer confidence and an ever-increasing amount of unnecessary administrative and legislative red tape.

I am here this afternoon to express my support for Bill 20. I believe that the introduction of Bill 20 is the first step to a return to a balance: a balance between economic development and the protection of the environment, and a balance between the roles of municipalities and the role of the province in setting the legislative and planning framework in Ontario.

It is absolutely crucial for our industry that a new planning system be introduced that returns a balance between economic development goals, streamlining of the planning process and the protection of the environment. We need a system that clearly promotes the benefits of economic development and allows us to get back to the job of building homes and places of employment that will stimulate the economy. Our industry can and will do that if given the tools to do so.

As you know, our industry is one of the largest employers in this province and our ability to provide affordable housing and to successfully create jobs is largely determined by the planning framework within which we operate. Over the past five years we have seen an attempt to reform the land use and planning and approval system in Ontario. This review came about as a result of the previous government's desire to fix a system that it perceived was not working. Unfortunately, the current act fell well short of achieving two of the goals for which it was intended: streamlining the system and empowering municipalities.

It seems to me that the more we talked about streamlining the planning process the more complicated it became. In fact, I would suggest the current Planning Act creates greater uncertainty between provincial and municipal powers, establishes longer, more complicated time frames, and discourages a balance between economic and environmental issues.

What we have now is an opportunity through this legislation to fix the problems that were created by the current Planning Act and, as I said, to return to a balance in the process.

This government has made it clear that it understands that growth and economic development are clearly linked to planning legislation, clear policies and the process itself. Economic development has finally become a government priority equivalent to the protection of the environment.

The draft policy statements also make significant progress towards addressing the balance I referred to earlier. The new policy statements are considerably less prescriptive and more focused on matters of core provincial interest. There must be clearly defined roles for the province and for municipalities in order to eliminate the needless overlap and duplication which delays the process of obtaining development approvals.

The province's role must be clearly articulated and defined. However, within this planning framework municipalities must be given the power and the flexibility to make planning decisions which are appropriate for their communities. This, I believe, has been achieved by returning to the "have regard to" test. This respects the local decision-making process and encourages locally driven solutions while ensuring the provincial interest is taken into account.

Bill 20 also encourages a one-window approach in dealing with the province. We need to return to the days of having clear and concise guidelines. The existing act with its complex guidelines has created a system that stifles many applications.

Today I would suggest that we operate in a system that's full of documents prepared by various ministries that have the words "draft," "proposed," "interim" and "guidelines" on them. These documents have no official status but are being implemented as if they were official government policy.

The new policy statements are very clear and concise. The new policy statements, I would suggest, should also lead to the creation of a stable supply of registered lots and designated land that will help to keep our land and housing affordable and not lead to wild fluctuations in land prices.

Bill 20 also accomplishes other important objectives: shorter time frames for processing applications. This will, in my opinion, create a more efficient process.

The direct right of appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board. Bill 20 provides for the absolute right of appeal and eliminates the discretion and uncertainty associated with a referral request.

Appeals to the Ontario Municipal Board by the province may only be made by the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing. The one-window approach to provincial planning restricts the ability of other provincial agencies to unduly frustrate the process.

Finally, Bill 20 makes it clear that the appeal clock starts to tick upon the submission of the prescribed information. The onus is now on the municipalities to deal with the application once it's received. This eliminates the ambiguity of a complete application, as being interpreted under the current legislation.

It is important for this legislation to move quickly to becoming law. Our industry is in a period of transition. We have in effect three systems because of the uncertainty that's been created by Bill 163. Many of us, including myself, moved very quickly to submit applications under the previous Planning Act and as a result have still not been able to fully understand the implications of the current legislation. With the introduction of Bill 20, many of my colleagues have held off submitting new applications until the current situation becomes more clear. Once this legislation is proclaimed, it should lead to more applications being submitted as more confidence and certainty in the system is once again created, and I would suggest that it will get us back to the job of building houses in this province. Those are my comments.

Ms Churley: I perhaps missed it. There's no document, I take it, that was handed out?

Mr Mondell: No, I'm sorry. I just prepared this presentation.

Ms Churley: That's fine. Therefore, I just want to ask you, and perhaps you said it at the beginning, what is your group? I see you're land development. What do you do exactly?

Mr Mondell: We're a land development company. We are by and large subdividers of land and have a large number of projects, I'd say mostly large holdings, primarily residential.

Ms Churley: Within the Metro area?

Mr Mondell: We've got projects on the books right now in Burlington, Oakville, Richmond Hill, Pickering, Oshawa and in the city of Toronto, and as I said, we're also involved in projects in two other provinces and four states.

Ms Churley: And what do you do with the company?

Mr Mondell: I'm in charge of the land development and planning process for our Canadian operation.

Ms Churley: So you've dealt over the years then with municipalities all over, you said in other provinces as well, so all over the country.

Mr Mondell: My experience has been limited to the greater Toronto area.

Ms Churley: I see. So you've mostly dealt with the local municipal councils. I was going to ask you some questions about other jurisdictions, but I guess you're not aware of those.

Mr Mondell: No, sorry.

Ms Churley: I guess I just have a general question to ask you. Is there anything about this Bill 20 you don't like? Is it, in your view, perfect?

Mr Mondell: I would suggest to you it's far from perfect. I think there are many details that need to be examined. I'm certainly not the one or in a position to be doing a clause-by-clause assessment. There are certainly a number of things that need to be looked at, I would suggest, but I think it's returning in many respects back to where we were with the 1983 act and a system that I think most of us were quite comfortable working under.

Ms Churley: It wasn't a facetious question. It's just that most people, even those in support, have mentioned a few things they'd like to see changed.

I just remember when I was elected to a city council not all that long ago, in 1988, before I came to the province, there was a pretty huge turnover at Toronto city council because of some very, very bad, poor development going on within the city of Toronto. Partially—we refer to it, many people referred to it as the curtains down at the waterfront, that obstruct people's view. Essentially I think there's almost total agreement, perhaps not with some in the development industry, that that was a disaster for our waterfront and for our city and there was a recognition that there had to be some changes in the way city council was dealing with applications for development.

I just throw that story in, and of course there was a huge turnover in city council, and I was one of those elected under the program of more responsible development: not stopping development, but responsible development, with more community participation.

One of the things that this bill does is it really cuts down on the public participation, which I think, as a representative of the people, is very, very important. I just wonder if you have a comment, if there's any time left. I know it can be very frustrating to developers, but at the end of the day I've seen better development for all when there's proper public participation and everybody having a say who has an interest. It ends up, I think, on the whole, for the long term, better development.

Mr Mondell: I agree that there has to be a balance between the development that we bring to the table and the protection of the environment and I would suggest to you that the way Bill 20 is set out, some of the situations that you have referred to may not have happened in quite the same way.

However, I do believe that if the municipalities are not given strict time lines in which to deal with applications, they will continue to drag. I can point to many examples where we were waiting for eight, 10, 12 months for very, very simple amendments to zoning bylaws that were holding up construction, that were holding up developments that could otherwise have gone through and may have, for whatever reasons in the last five years, missed an opportunity in the marketplace.

Ms Churley: But that's a bureaucracy problem as opposed to a public participation problem, which I think has to be addressed here, the difference between giving people ample time to prepare and respond as opposed to the internal problems which we've all seen in bureaucracies in government. I believe that's where the focus should be, frankly, on trying to speed up the time.

Mr Mondell: I don't believe there's anything in this legislation, in this bill, that is restricting the rights of individuals to comment and make applications—

Ms Churley: Oh, yes, there are.

Mr Mondell: —that they wouldn't have otherwise.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Churley, that's your five and one quarter minutes. We'll move to the government benches, I believe Mr Ouellette.

Ms Churley: Do you want me to point those out to you?

Mr Ouellette: Thank you for your presentation today. The builders in the community have pointed out that there are approximately 120-odd steps that take place from the time a piece of property is purchased till the time it's developed. Do you have any idea of the percentage of reduction in steps this change represents and the costing as it relates to, say, a home buyer?

Mr Mondell: I'm afraid I don't. I'm sorry. I would say, though, that I believe with some of the time frames that have been set up, obviously time becomes money for all of us, and all attempts to try to condense the process and allow us to get on with it are going to lead to a more efficient process, as I said, and hopefully reduce the costs at the tail end of the project, when it is the consumer who is ultimately paying that price for the delays.

Mr Smith: Just a couple of quick questions with regard to practice and process perhaps. You made reference to the "have regard to" test. I just wanted to get your opinion on whether you feel the switch back to that "have regard to" will compromise either your industry's ability or municipalities' or stakeholders' in general ability to adequately test environmental concerns that may arise during a development project and whether or not the streamlining process that you referred to and the reduced municipal time frames will compromise the ability of municipalities to adequately assess a planning project.

Mr Mondell: I believe at the end of the day, notwithstanding the time frames that have been set up, our industry will still have to present its case as to why an application should move forward and the proper documentation and background studies are going to have to be prepared. So I don't believe that the municipality's ability to assess an application is going to be compromised.

Notwithstanding the time frames that have been set up, I may be able to trigger a right to an appeal to the OMB much more quickly, but I'd be foolish to do so if I didn't have the proper backup and documentation to support that by the time I got to the board. I'd be thrown out on my ear, I would suggest. So we still have to prepare the background documents. We still have to prepare the information that's required.

With respect to the "have regard to" test, I would suggest to you that the current Planning Act has got such a long list of complicated policy statements and guidelines that it's very difficult for a municipality to assess what it's being consistent with, and in many cases you may have competing interests. I think the "have regard to" test, as I said, is going to allow municipalities to tailor their decisions to their local situation, and I would suggest that as long as there is no adverse impact on a development or the proper mitigation measures are taking place, the municipality can move forward in that process, knowing that it has had regard to the provincial policies. I think that is a very, very crucial thing for our industry.

The Chair: Any other questions? You've got approximately two minutes remaining. Okay, we'll move to the official opposition.

Mr Gerretsen: Do I take it then that we have seven minutes? Are you yielding that time?

Interjections.

The Chair: No.

Mr Gerretsen: Oh, okay, I see. I'd like to get back on something, though, that Ms Churley raised earlier. It's always been my concern, having seen it from I guess all three sides over the last 20 to 25 years, that the real problems are not the time limits that are set for appeals and various processes in the act. The real problems are that, as you stated yourself, it can sometimes take eight months to get something out of city hall or eight months to get something out of a different ministry, let's say the Ministry of Municipal Affairs, or certainly it will take eight to 12 months to get a hearing before the OMB etc. Is that not where the real time delays are?

Am I in stereo here, or what? What's happening? Go ahead.

Mr Mondell: I think it's a big part of the problem. There's no denying that. I think what this bill represents, as I understand it, is that it's going to start putting much stricter time limits on municipalities so they can't drag out an application for whatever reason, whether they just don't plain like it. It's going to require the municipalities to become more efficient and to deal with applications in a timely way, and if that's one of the things that comes out of this bill, then—

Mr Gerretsen: But you know as well as I do that if you've got an application for a rezoning before a municipality and everything seems to be going along all right and they want to take an extra month or two beyond the time periods that are prescribed in the act for them to deal with it, you're not going to appeal it to the OMB. You're going to wait until they deal with it two or three or four months later.

Mr Mondell: On a minor issue, I would probably agree with you. On a major issue, I may take issue with you and say that we will make sure that if the proper steps aren't followed, we're going to push that button, because we know that at least we're going to get a date, whether that's in front of the Ontario Municipal Board—

Mr Gerretsen: You as a land developer would almost ruin the good reputation that you have with a particular municipality that you'll have to go back to maybe a year from now on another project on an issue like that, if you know they're coming your way, or if you have that feeling?

Mr Mondell: I would say every situation would certainly be assessed individually, but if the situation as you've described it—if it's a matter of waiting for an opening on an agenda because of a workload issue, you're right, I would not make an issue, as my own personal practice would be. I can't say that every municipality and every company works the way we do. We generally try to work with the municipalities and try to get a consensus before anything reaches the municipal council level, certainly. That's not always possible.

Mr Gerretsen: The other issue deals with the fact that you made a statement near the end of your remarks to the effect that we can get housing going again. We were told earlier today that there are over 20,000 approved lots—I'm not sure whether they were all single-family lots, but there were over 20,000 lots in the greater Toronto area that are just ready to go right now. Would you not agree with me that the real reason why there aren't any houses being built has got very little to do with the planning process but more to do with the economy over the last four or five years?

Mr Mondell: I would suggest to you that that certainly has an important bearing. In three municipalities that I'm currently involved in applications, those being in Burlington, in Oakville and in Oshawa, I would suggest to you that there is a very limited number of lots that are available to the marketplace today. If I had lots available within those municipalities, I would be bringing those to the market in anticipation of what we see as possibly some light at the end of the tunnel, and hopefully this year will be that year.

In many municipalities, there may be that availability of product. That does not apply on a municipality-by-municipality basis, and I would suggest to you that the lots that are available in Ajax and Whitby aren't doing me any good in Oakville or Burlington.

Mr Gerretsen: One other issue, and that deals with the issue of the one-window shopping: I personally like this notion of it going through one particular ministry, because if you phone somebody here in Toronto within government, at least you'd have somebody to contact, rather than having to contact 15 or 20 different people in different ministries about this.

There was something in your remarks, though, and we didn't get them in writing so I may have misunderstood you—it is my understanding, from what the minister said here yesterday, that if there is a concern a particular ministry has that may not be shared by Municipal Affairs, certainly in that case the minister would still launch the appeal on behalf of the other ministry—let's say it's Environment or Natural Resources—to ensure that the hearing is held. Is that your understanding as well?

Mr Mondell: I understand that the Ministry of Municipal Affairs could assign their one window to another ministry, for instance. But we have many situations where we are dealing with a ministry that is not being cooperative, that there are competing interests, as I mentioned, where the Ministry of Agriculture and Food may launch an appeal notwithstanding everyone else is on side.

Mr Gerretsen: That could still happen, though, except it's done through the one window rather than—

Mr Mondell: I understand that, but I think generally speaking the spirit in which this one-window approach is being put forward, as you have said, being able to have that person, that individual, that one ministry that can coordinate provincial concerns into one issue and hopefully prioritize what the concerns are, is going to lead to a more efficient system and make it less difficult to deal with various provincial ministries.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Mondell. I appreciate your taking the time to make your presentation today.

GEORGE AREGERS
JOHN ANGA

The Chair: Our next group up is two individuals, George Aregers and John Anga. Good afternoon, gentlemen. We have 25 minutes for you to divide as you see fit between a presentation and question-and-answer period.

Mr George Aregers: First I'd like to thank the committee members and staff for allowing us to make a presentation today. We hope you consider our recommendations and submit them to the Legislature. Before I continue reading the script that I have, I'd like to tell the committee here that we're not developers. We are small land owners who own properties on regulated land.

I've owned my land in Mississauga since 1981. I was supposed to raise my family peacefully. It's never flooded—nothing. Since 1981 I've been terrorized. The government wants the property for parks. I'd like to tell these people here that that's what the intent of Bill 163 was.

This Bill 20, we agree on it. It is a good bill but there's only one problem with it: It's not retroactive to the first reading of November 16, 1995. This morning I got in touch with the director of planning. His name is Philip McKinstry. I asked him one particular question, "Why is this Bill 20 not retroactive?" He said, "It's unfair to the municipalities." I said to him: "Let me tell you what is really unfair. The city of Mississauga"—you can see in the back of my written form there's a page—"they notified me that there was going to be an official plan proposed."

Granted, it started in 1993. Since then I've always called them up and asked: "Are there any changes? This is my land. Is it going to be affected in any way that I have to make a presentation?" They said, "No, you don't have to worry."

I got this letter and I said, "I want to take a look at the official plan." "It's not available." I said, "What do you mean it's not available?" "Well, you have to look at it after November 16." It's odd that it happened to be the first reading of this Bill 20.

I made a presentation to city council and I begged them, "Why don't you incorporate in this official plan what Bill 20, the new government, wants?" Oh, no.

My biggest concern was that I am told that the province, Bill 163, gives the power to Mississauga and other municipalities, and this is the horror in this whole thing. I own a property. Part of it's on regulated land; part of it isn't. I'm told that by their new official plan Bill 163 gives them power that if a tree falls on my house and it burns down, they will not give me a permit unless I give them my regulated land plus a buffer zone. Then they will consider a permit. But think of my friend here, John Anga. He doesn't have land. All his land is on regulated land. If his house burns down, if his garage burns down, if he lived in Mississauga he wouldn't be given a permit. That is the unfair thing.

What I can't understand is, why don't we roll this Bill 20 to be retroactive to November 16, 1995? Why are we giving all these municipalities time to incorporate in their official plans sections of Bill 163 that will terrorize small, little home owners?

We are only a very few of us left who have regulated lands. In the past 30 or 40 years, slowly the municipalities have been taking this property from us through the conservation authority. The situation we have here now is that the conservation authority has lost some of its power, and this Bill 163—what's happened, and the municipalities knew this—gave them the power to do what the conservation authority was doing, but now they've incorporated these things in the official plan to take lands from private owners.

I'm going to read this information that I gave to you, and if there's anything here that you don't understand I'll explain it to you, but please consider it; be fair. Let's make this Bill 20 retroactive to November 16, because Mississauga knew about it and there is no reason why it's not made retroactive.

The government has taken a necessary step to remedy a harsh Planning Act. This is a bad piece of legislation which should never have passed. The present government should have abolished the entire act and reverted to the old one. Since the inception of Bill 163, the committee responsible catered to special-interest groups, conservation authorities and unscrupulous municipalities. Their underlying goal was to acquire additional public lands at the expense of private owners. The private land owner's concerns were ignored: mine.

In its present form, Bill 20 is perceived by many to bring fairness and justice, and I say the word "perceived." However, this is not the case. We believe that all legislation should apply equally and fairly to all jurisdictions in the province of Ontario. I've highlighted this: Bill 20 is not fair. Bill 20 can be made acceptable and workable if it is retroactive to November 16, 1995, or beyond. We believe that any official plans incorporating harsh policies of the present Planning Act which conflict with Bill 20 must be abolished and made to conform with Bill 20. Bill 20 allows municipalities and regions a choice and sufficient time to take advantage of the existing bad Planning Act.

We believe in this case that the present government is not candid with the public. Good government should be discouraging, not promoting, bad legislation. Contrary to amendments in the Development Charges Act—this is in Bill 20—we find the opposite applies and is retroactive to November 16, 1995. Why is there a difference? Why do we have one act that's retroactive but this, on the Planning Act, is not? Is the government appeasing vocal and non-cooperative municipalities to the detriment of civil and property rights?

A retroactive date of November 16, 1995, must be incorporated into Bill 20 for this to have any credibility.

This unjustified grace period to municipalities allows the passage of official plans incorporating harsh policies and statements of the present Planning Act. These official plans become totally exempt from Bill 20. It is obvious that the government is giving ample time to municipalities to escape Bill 20's abolishment of—I've put here two points. There are others. One of the points is "all municipalities consistent with government policy statements." This applied to all jurisdictions in Ontario.

A policy was made. Maybe some of the people don't know it, but this is the policy statement that everywhere in Ontario they had to comply with. Most of the information that's in here, the diagrams and the graphs are from the local conservation authority. If you take a look at one of the diagrams, it shows you something from the Grand Canyon, where all the river valleys in Ontario are, which is not true. I have vast land in the back of me that is over half a mile. It's not the Grand Canyon, but I'm told I can't do anything with it. It's good that this government has abolished that, and the new policy statement that's out from this government is fair. I just got a copy of it last night and I've read it.

The other thing that was very shocking in the past government was that council was able to approve all uses of land in construction just with the stroke of a pen. If any constituent complained about it, took it to the OMB, the argument would be, "The province says I can do it." But speaking with Philip at the ministry this morning, he says that it's possible for municipalities to do that now still or go further. What I told him was that it's not the province delegating what you're supposed to do; it's something that you can contest now and make a presentation to council. If council oversteps it, you can accuse them. The municipality can't say, "The province wants us to do this." I really have to thank this new government for removing that number two.

Again I'd like to get back. The non-retroactive clause in Bill 20 discredits the purpose and intent of Bill 20. If this Bill 20 is approved in its present form, private land owners are at the mercy of local municipal councils, who are now more than ever capable of acquiring lands without compensation to private owners. With municipal budget restraints in progress, now all property owners are vulnerable. Bill 20 must be retroactive because harsh policies will exist in some official plans forever, and it's true. Mississauga has put all these things from Bill 163, that takes my land away from me, and no matter what happens in the future, it's in their official plan.

The present government has misled us. They promised adequate changes would be forthcoming to combat the harsh policies of the present Planning Act. Bill 20 was supposed to kill Bill 163. I was told by my local MPP that Bill 163 was like a dinosaur. It's going to be dead, but it's not.

Various other changes, such as the dismissal of automatic right to appeal, leaves the property owners without recourse and a loss of property rights. I talk about this automatic right to appeal. I understand that it's for variances. But in our area, my neighbour there has a little lot and he wants to build on it. Because his lot's not 65-foot frontage, he's denied because he abuts on to a ravine area. But in the same area, you've got all kinds of properties that were less than 50 feet that got building permits. Now with this new system that we've got here, you can't go to the OMB if the municipality favours one individual over another. It's up to them to make a decision. If this change is not accepted by this government our expectations of good government is diminished.

I'd like to end my presentation and I'd like to go back to the special public meeting. You can see what I've underlined there on the first page. They have stated to the public that their official plan—and remember how close this thing is to November 16 in this area, when they knew about Bill 20, that they said this plan "that resulted from the approval of Bill 163 and associated regulations." Well, the part "regulations" is wrong. Really what they're referring to is this: It's a policy statement, and Mississauga has placed this in their official plan.

I could give you an example if you'd just bear with me that they've taken out of here a definition, which is "development." If you look into this thing, "development" has got one, two, three, four, five different terms to it. If you look at some of the terms, like "development" to anybody who'd want to say, "We're developers," you know, if you're going to go—no. Our great past government says development is that if you want a building permit for just a board across your porch, that's development. And they've incorporated this term "development" in the official plan that if anyone wants a permit, you're not allowed unless you give your regulated lands to them, free, plus a buffer zone.

This is the last page here which I underlined, that this official plan, the draft plan was available—we don't know what was in it—to council about a month and a half prior to November 16, 1995. I called up when I got this letter. "You're not allowed to see it till after November 16." When I went there November 16, it wasn't even allowed to the public. "It's not ready yet."

Lastly, I'd like to thank this committee for listening to me, and I hope we all can agree, please, let's make Bill 20 work. Let's make it retroactive that we can help some of the small homeowners that are affected severely. I'd like to keep my land for my family.

The Chair: We have about eight minutes left, so just over two and a half minutes per caucus, and questioning will begin—

Interjections.

Ms Churley: He has some more. We'll give up our question period—

The Chair: Oh, absolutely. Feel free, Mr Anga.

Mr John Anga: My name is John Anga. I am the president of the Valley Landowners Coalition. I live in north Etobicoke in an area known as Thistletown. I am also the owner of the last farm in Etobicoke. I'd like to thank you in advance for the time allocated for me to speak, both as a private individual and also as the president of the Valley Landowners Coalition.

I am concerned about the many restrictions that Bill 163, which was imposed by our previous government, has placed on ordinary property owners like myself. Although I am in favour of Bill 20, I don't think it goes far enough to rectify the damage Bill 163 has done. For years now we have been lobbying the provincial government and the Metro bureaucrats regarding the unfair treatment of property owners of ravine lots and valley lands, but our cries keep falling on deaf ears.

The restrictions imposed upon us are horrendous, and yet the property taxes we pay are equivalent to similar homes in the area that have no building restrictions whatsoever.

Believe it or not, as George mentioned here—if, heaven forbid, my home should burn down, I wouldn't be able to rebuild it. Believe it or not, they won't even let me fence my property in against the vandals who come across on to my property at harvest time and destroy my fruits and vegetables and all the crops. I want to just emphasize something here, I grow a lot of pumpkins there. In fact, one year we had about 1,500 pumpkins and we couldn't pick one. Somebody came over and sliced every pumpkin in the field, and it's despicable.

Every time one of our members applies for any kind of building permit, it's a nightmare. The amount of red tape and the costs associated are such that usually we give up. The demands that are put on us by these authorities are horrendous. At the end, our permits are refused if we don't give in to their underhanded demands.

For example, as George mentioned earlier, in some cases they demand some of your property in exchange for a permit. We cannot appeal our decisions to the Ontario Municipal Board, but instead have to appeal to an internal arbitrator with a predetermined verdict. Over the years, appointed bodies like MTRCA have purposely drifted away from their original mandate set out by the province. They have slowly taken on different roles in order to justify their paycheques at the expense of taxpayers. The autonomous power that this appointed body has acquired is frightening. These bureaucrats have built a self-governing empire that is impregnable by any level of government.

The disrespect this authority has for private lands leaves a lot to be desired. We have been closely monitoring their activities and without any doubt they have double standards. They restrict the private sector from improving their properties while they, on the other hand, tear hell out of the valleys with their dozers and back-hoes, having little respect for the environment, the trees and the wildlife.

This city has thousands of miles of paved roads and sidewalks which, if properly delineated, can be used for bikes. That, however, is not enough. MTRCA and Metro Parks feel that we must exploit the only natural resource we have left and those are the valleys.

In their quest to pave bike paths through the valleys, they have altered the contour of the land, bulldozed through environmentally sensitive areas, cut down trees and scared off many animals and wildlife living there. They have divided the animals' natural habitats with yet another paved road. You trust these people and call them conservationists? I don't think so.

We think a closer look should be given to Bill 20 to ensure that private land owners are treated fairly. We implore you to read Bill 20 over very carefully. I'm sure you will agree that it gives us private owners very little consideration.

I have eight points here for your consideration and these are my comments here.

(1) Stop the unnecessary acquisition of private lands. The taxpayer can't afford it and the land is safer in private hands. Most people who own valley lands are naturalists. It isn't necessary to spend taxpayers' money to purchase such lands.

(2) Encourage all levels of bureaucrats to work closer with the private sector. They have created too much animosity with the private owners. This is not healthy.

(3) Existing structures that pose no immediate threat to human life should be allowed to remain where they are and the owners should have the right to upkeep such properties without any hassle.

(4) More consideration should be given to the people who live in these regulated areas. This government, along with local municipalities, should acknowledge the fact that we are legal, paying taxpayers and have the right to live in peace.

(5) Individual agreements that are mutually suitable can be drawn up between this government, local municipalities and private owners regarding any long-term acquisition. I made an example there, but you can go on forever.

(6) The constant exploitation of valley lands for bike paths should be stopped. It never should have started in the first place. Man's greed to exploit everything is the reason why this world's in the mess it's in today.

(7) We should have a proper appeal system, such as the Ontario Municipal Board, available to us to handle any land or permit disputes.

(8) Last but not least, a retroactive date of November 16, 1995, must be incorporated into Bill 20 for this bill to have any credibility.

Once again, thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you, both of you gentlemen. Given that there are just a few seconds left, we don't have time for questions from the three caucuses, but thank you both for your submissions and we'll certainly review them when it comes time for our clause-by-clause deliberation.

METRO TORONTO CHINESE AND SOUTHEAST ASIAN LEGAL CLINIC

The Chair: Our next group up this afternoon is the Metro Toronto Chinese and Southeast Asian Legal Clinic. I am told there will be a slight delay for the written handouts; they're being rephotocopied, but the clerk will deal with that.

Ms Avvy Go: I'm just going to read from my presentation here. Good afternoon. My name is Avvy Go and I'm the clinic director of the Metro Toronto Chinese and Southeast Asian Legal Clinic, which is one of the 72 clinics in Ontario that serve low-income people.

I'm going to restrict the scope of my deputation today to a specific issue. As you know, Bill 20 is a massive piece of legislation and, like the omnibus bill, it affects various aspects of the lives of Ontarians and contains many changes that I will not be able to deal with all today. In fact, I think it would be impossible for any individual group or individual person to go through every single aspect, but particularly so for our clinic, because our mandate is to serve low-income people. We provide legal services in the areas of tenant law, so I will be restricting my comments on issues that will affect the groups that are served by our clinic.

For these reasons, I will focus today solely on the amendments that affect the former Bill 120, which was introduced under the previous government. The amendments in Bill 20 with relation to Bill 120, in effect, will reverse all the positive changes that have been made to legalize basement apartments or apartments in houses in this province.

The specific amendments proposed by Bill 20 that come under this banner of apartments in houses will affect various provisions under the Planning Act, the Municipal Act and so on. I have a list of the provisions. There is section 1 of the Planning Act which deals with the definition of "residential unit;" section 16 of the Planning Act concerning the content of official plans with respect to two-unit premises; section 31 of the Planning Act restricting the authority to pass any bylaw prohibiting two-unit premises; section 35 of the Planning Act dealing further with restrictions to bylaws concerning two-unit premises; section 51 of the Planning Act dealing with approval of a plan of subdivision; subsection 6(4) of the Rental Housing Protection Act regarding restriction on issuing permits. There's a new section 207.3 of the Municipal Act concerning bylaws for the registration of two-unit houses and the right for municipalities to order that houses which are not registered vacate one of the units; and finally, the provision dealing with the retroactivity.

Our clinic was one of the groups that presented before the legislative committee when Bill 120 was introduced. We were also one of the organizations involved in the public inquiry into the issue of illegal apartments in 1994.

The inquiry was organized by the Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign. So this issue is not new to us.

I'm sure this committee has heard and will hear again from community groups and tenants' rights groups as to why we need to legalize apartments in houses. You have probably heard either from Metro tenants or from other groups about the discrimination faced by tenants who live in these apartments which, when deemed illegal, give tenants no recourse when their rights are being violated.

You have probably also heard about who these tenants usually are: low-income people, single mothers, new immigrants, refugees. In other words, these are people who are usually marginalized in so many other ways by our society that they are unable to stand up and speak out about their own concerns when they have some kind of conflict with their landlord.

This committee may have also heard that Bill 20, if passed, will create a double standard: One set of rules for apartments in houses created before November 16, 1995, and another set of rules for those created after that date. This committee may have also been told that these double standards will create mass confusion for tenants and homeowners since people will not know whether their apartment is legal or not and what standards will apply to them.

Many community groups may have told you already that giving municipalities the right to create apartments in houses registration systems is not going to solve the problem. The system would only be used by the municipalities that are hostile towards apartments in houses to crack down on these apartments.

But more importantly, the committee must have been told that the law legalizing these apartments was actually working. Not only were the tenants better able to exercise their rights to ensure safety at home, but more importantly the homeowners who were renting out their in-house apartments were in fact learning about the new fire safety standards and were doing the work to bring their apartments up to standard.

The only question that this committee needs to ask itself today is: Why change the law when it's working for everyone?

It is one thing to introduce some law without knowing for certain what this new law would do to the people. It is quite another thing to take away some legal remedies that the people have benefited from, knowing exactly that taking away these remedies would harm the people affected. By de-legalizing apartments in houses now, this government is in effect taking away something that has been of benefit to the community as a whole.

I would like to invite the committee to imagine just for a moment what will happen if Bill 20 is passed. To do so, let me take you back to an incident concerning fire in basement apartments just before Bill 120 was passed. There was a fire, if you remember, in a basement apartment in Mississauga that left a single mother's family in devastation. The casualty or even the fire itself could probably have been prevented had the landlord simply installed some basic safety measures inside the apartment for the tenant.

If Bill 20 is passed today, I can assure you that there will be more and more unsafe apartments around in this province. Landlords will not have the incentive to improve safety because they know that the tenants will not have any recourse from the court.

So let's imagine that this government passed Bill 20 today. Tomorrow there's a fire happening in an apartment which is deemed to be illegal by the municipality. An inquest is called to determine the cause of the fire and finds that the fire was probably preventable if the landlord had put in some safety measures, but no one knows about the problem because nobody came out. The tenants didn't try to enforce the law because there is nothing that they can hang on to.

At this point, can this government still say, "Well, there's nothing we could have done to prevent the fire"? You probably cannot say that any more because you have been specifically told that this is exactly what will happen if apartments in houses are deemed illegal. You have been told that landlords do change their behaviour when they know that their apartments are legal, as opposed to illegal, and if you had not taken the step to repeal Bill 120, we may not have seen the same kind of fire, the same kind of incident. So at little extra cost to the government, legalizing apartments could help prevent fire from happening and could ensure that thousands of tenants and their landlords in this province could live safely in their own homes.

On the other hand, declaring apartments illegal does pose a significant cost to this government and to our society. The cost to our society includes the cost of an increase in potentially unsafe apartments. It will also cost our economy because some people will be discouraged to become homeowners if they are unable to rent out part of their home to help pay for their mortgage. The trickling-down effect on the economy is not insignificant. At this time, when the government is so keen about boosting the economy, such a move is against even the common sense that this government has so clearly outlined in your revolution document.

In conclusion, there are undoubtedly many principled reasons why we should keep apartments in houses legal, but even for a government that may not hold these principles dear to its heart, it does not make any sense to illegalize apartments in houses when the law is in fact working.

I will just probably end on a personal note. I am a homeowner myself. I don't have any tenants. I live in an area where in-house apartments were illegal at one point. I think that to many homeowners it is not fair that some people can rent out their apartments legally and others cannot. As homeowners, I think we would also want see uniform treatment of tenants in apartments in houses across the province.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm somewhat interested in this whole notion that this party that stands for freedom of individual rights, as this government does, is bringing in a bill that in effect prevents people from utilizing their property to a greater extent than they otherwise could, or at least than they presently could.

I'm curious as to what your opinion would be with respect to the whole notion that really it's done in order to satisfy perhaps those residential areas that are better off and more well to do and those people simply wouldn't want any apartments in the neighbourhoods where they reside. How do you feel about that?

Ms Go: That was certainly an issue that was raised in the previous legislative hearing and the inquiry that we held because it does vary from one municipality to another and different city councils and town councils do hold different views on this issue. I think that there is a lot of argument and a lot of evidence that would support your argument that it is particularly in areas where the homeowners are well off enough not to have to rent out part of their homes who would have the strongest opposition to any bylaw that would allow people to rent out the apartments.

But in the end it doesn't really make much sense. I think it's unfortunate that the council or whatever, municipality, would be so much influenced by the smallest sort of segment within that community. By and large the majority of people, including homeowners, are not necessarily of an income level that would allow them to have that kind of freedom that they could own their home all by themselves.

The Chair: Mr Hoy has a comment here.

Mr Pat Hoy (Essex-Kent): Yes, I would like to make a comment. I come from a rural riding where these secondary apartment units are really not in existence to any great extent, although there may be some. I was trying to think about similar situations that might occur where I live and one of those situations that I did think of in recent days was the main streets of many of the small towns in my riding are over 100 years old. They have corner pillars that say they're 1893 or whatever. Many of the shops on those streets have apartments up above them. They tend to be for the lower-income people; not exclusively, but many are. I see a similarity between what is maybe perceived to be a Metro situation, but certainly a housing situation that has developed by ingenuity, by necessity in even the rural ridings where people are renting above a store. So I'm trying to envision the situation here as you describe it and I appreciate your comments today.

Ms Go: I think also, whether it's rural or urban, given the economic situation right now—take my clinic, for example. We are getting more calls from people who before probably wouldn't have qualified for our service. You know, these are people who may have been in a profession before, owned homes at some point in time but are now facing a problem keeping up with their mortgage payments because they lost their jobs or they have been laid off. I would probably think that there may be a situation where you may have more people wanting to rent out some part of their house to supplement their income.

At the same time, the demand for apartments in houses would probably also increase because the welfare rate cut has happened. These apartments tend to be cheaper than units in apartment buildings and so on. So the increase in demand and also perhaps more and more an increase at some point for homeowners to start thinking of supplementing their income. This problem is not going to go away, so for municipalities that are not keeping up with the progress in our society, I guess they will just not allow these apartments to exist or just ignore their existence. So some of the problems that we see with unsafe apartments because they are not legalized would just continue to happen.

Ms Churley: Hello, Avvy, nice to see you again. For those of you who have never met Ms Go before, I'm sure you will see her on other occasions. She is very modest, but Ms Go is a highly respected lawyer, who is very active in—

Ms Go: Actually, I'm not that modest.

Ms Churley: —the Chinese and Southeast Asian community and in the Toronto community at large. Whenever Ms Go comes to talk to us I listen closely because of her own firsthand, personal experience in dealing with some of the lower-income communities, at least in the Toronto area.

I'm concerned about, I guess, the same issues that you raised, especially in response to Mr Hoy's comment. I have great fear that we're going to see more fires. In the best of circumstances we know that sometimes standards aren't kept up or accidents do happen; they also happen in private homes. These things happen, but we know from experience in the past that it's much more likely to happen in illegal basement apartments, where we have had terrible tragedies in the Metro Toronto area over the past several years, which is one of the major reasons why our government decided to proceed, to make sure that we weeded out those particular circumstances.

The reality is that people are going to create these apartments anyway. That's a fact, and we can't get away from that. You can't stop it, so what we do is bring back a situation that is really just unsustainable, because especially with this government getting out of rent control, getting totally out of the affordable housing or social housing market, the other cuts, job losses and all of the other problems in our society right now, affordable housing is needed more and more. People are going to live in these homes whether they're illegal or not and will put up with very unsafe conditions.

I think you have commented on that. I'm wondering if you can tell us why you think some municipalities—because that's what this government listened to—certain municipalities really wanted this act repealed in that context. Why do you think some municipalities just don't want them, even though they're there anyway?

Ms Go: Take the mosque in East York as an example or the issue in Markham as an example. There are a lot of prejudices and biases that exist in our society and the people who are targeted tend to be low-income people or people of colour, people from certain ethnic communities, immigrants, refugees and so on. If you look at the voting record, usually only 5% to 8% of the people living in municipalities come out to vote. Right? So you tend to get a council that only represents or is voted in by a small segment of the population in that area. They tend not to represent the diversity in that area and they also tend to share some of the more biased views of the people who voted them into power in the first place. That's the situation in East York.

In the mosque situation, some members would vote against it regardless of whether the parking problem has been solved. Or the issue in Markham: You know, Chinese Canadians are simply not welcome by some of the councillors from that town. Because of the type of people who tend to live in this kind of apartment, you would attract views that unfortunately exist in our society, whether it's views against minorities or against low-income people or against tenants in general, that will be espoused by the council because of the type of people who vote them in in the first place.

It goes in a cycle. There need to be a lot of changes to a lot of things before that will go away, but for now this is the reality that we live in and I think this government should recognize that.

1510

Mr Baird: Thank you for coming and talking to us today about this important issue. We all appreciate it. The one point I take from your submission is that municipalities would immediately seek to illegalize across the province en masse this type of initiative. I think that municipal politicians by and large represent the folks they represent.

Ms Go: That's exactly the problem, that only a very small percentage of voters come out to vote.

Mr Baird: Sure. My point is I have always found municipal politicians the closest level of government. It's the level of government where can you just simply pick up the phone and call your councillor. There's a very close relationship there. I know that's been the case in the two communities I've lived in, my own constituency of Nepean and when I went to university. I went to university in Kingston from 1988 to 1992, and there was a municipal regulation in the city of Kingston. There was a very good mayor when I first arrived there, and this was a bylaw on the books.

Mr Gerretsen: Would you like to identify him or her?

Mr Baird: It's not a her, I'll tell you.

The issue was that they had a minimum of five non-related people who could live in the same household, and in Kingston the housing was very close together, very high-density, and I guess the city was very enthusiastic about its high tenant population because they were all university students, something that was a major part of the community and something that the city always worked very closely with for good relations and was very much a valued part of the community.

If we were to take that community, for example, and put basement apartments in those units, the density would become so high that you would wonder whether the community infrastructure there could support it. So the one question I have is that, you mention on pages 3 and 4, what would happen if Bill 20 was passed. Why would you suppose a municipality would want to do this and be so unrepresentative of the community?

Ms Go: Because municipalities are in general not representative of the community. It's the same problem that I alluded to earlier. Look at Markham council, for example. Over 20% of the people in Markham now are Chinese, and there is one Chinese—

Mr Baird: Their member of provincial Parliament is Asian too.

Ms Go: That's true, but if you look at the voting record, at least at the provincial level, you get a larger segment of the voters coming out to vote, but the record is just dismal for the municipality. In general, less than 10% of the people would come out to vote, so you tend to get the same kind of people being voted for year after year, and their views tend to be more insular and so on.

I'm not saying that all municipalities will then decide en masse that they will just illegalize all the apartments, which is not true. We know it wasn't the case before. In the city of Toronto, for example, it hasn't been as much a problem. But we also know from our experience that a lot of municipalities will not legalize the apartments.

I think the issue around density, or some people would talk about parking problems, if these are real problems they can be regulated better if you legalize the apartments than if you don't, because the apartments will exist in any event. If you are legalizing them, then at least you can control the density issue, the safety issue to prevent fire, or what have you. Whichever way you look it's better in terms of the control from the government perspective that the apartments should be legalized as opposed to being illegalized.

Mr Baird: Can I yield the rest of my time to Mrs Fisher?

The Chair: There is one minute, five seconds.

Mrs Barbara Fisher (Bruce): This'll take 25 and the rest can be the answer. Like Mr Hoy, I come from a rural riding where choice is something we're looking forward to. If the community probably decides to allow second units, as some would in that situation, there's an assumption, or there's coming to be a perceived assumption, that as soon as you allow it, it won't be allowed, and I don't agree with that. I feel municipalities should have the right to decide if they want second units, and if they do, then they have to be managed under the same regulations as everyone, including fire. Do you agree or disagree with that?

Ms Go: If you are concerned about managing and fire prevention, as I said before, if the apartments are not legalized, it is harder for you to manage because you wouldn't know beforehand that there was a problem. Who would come out to complain? The landlords themselves, the homeowners themselves are not going to raise their hands and say, "Look, my house is not safe." It's up to somebody else to enforce it. Most of the time it is the tenants who bring it to the attention of the authorities and then the authorities say, "We'll come in and take a look." That's how reality works.

Again, I'm not saying that the municipalities will then decide to legalize these places, but for those that are interested in safety for tenants and landlords and whatever, it is in their best interests that these apartments are legalized. If all municipalities are controlled by rational thinkers like us, then I think all of them will agree to legalize, but unfortunately that's not necessarily the case.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Go. We appreciate you taking the time to make a presentation before us today.

LEBOVIC ENTERPRISES

The Chair: Our next group up is Lebovic Enterprises, Lloyd Cherniak, executive vice-president. Good afternoon, Mr Cherniak. We have 25 minutes to dispose of as you see fit, divided between the presentation and a question and answer period.

Mr Lloyd Cherniak: Good afternoon, members and Chairman. There's a brief report which I've left with you. I just want to hit the highlights, and I suppose the major highlight is to congratulate the government on a very excellent piece of legislation.

There was obviously a problem that was created by the previous government with the introduction of Bill 163 that's left many of us who are active in the planning and development industries with a big question mark as to what it's all about. The series of guidelines and different regulations that were imposed would probably fill a whole table and are really not understood by anyone.

I just want to briefly introduce myself. I work as executive vice-president for a development company. It's in the GTA. We've been building and developing for over 40 years, primarily in Scarborough and currently now in Pickering, Ajax, Oshawa, the areas north of town in Aurora, Stouffville. So we have a variety of experience in developments and building houses. We also build factories which we continue to own and rent. We have a great stake in this province, as do you as well.

In terms of the development industry, there's been quite a bit of press to suggest that somehow this legislation will slacken the control over our industry. In researching it, I found that we're governed currently by 60 codes, 280 provincial acts, 65 agencies, and 450 statutes and regulations, of which of course the Planning Act is one of the acts.

I also found that currently, according to information I've researched and I've attached, over $65 million a year is spent annually in the GTA on planning. When I discussed that with Mr Sewell in a public debate, he sort of laughed it off, and you may notice that in his final report. That of course doesn't include the money that we as developers spend on consultants and planners as well.

Just to give you an idea of what this bill can do for Ontario by reducing red tape, the development industry or construction industry in 1991 employed 582,000 workers, or 12% of the Ontario workforce, and in 1987 paid $4.8 billion in taxes. So any improvements which help to lessen regulation and red tape and improve our industry will of course be directly transferred into better products for Ontario, more jobs, more employment.

I've also seen comments that somehow planning has reduced agricultural land. I've attached a very brief one page done by Dr White, who looked into the actual truth of this statement. He simply claims that these people are alarmists, that in fact large areas of the Ontario countryside are not disappearing as the alarmists claim. He showed that in 1981 there 8.43 million acres cropped, when prices were high, versus 7.99 million acres in 1961.

I'd also like to point out that there's been a lot of criticism of development as not paying its way, which is entirely untrue. Part of this product, I suppose, discussed some changes that might occur to development charges. We all know, if anything, there's been somewhat of an abuse of that system.

In discussions with the Greater Toronto Home Builders' Association, they've informed me that each house built creates 2.5 person years of work and 109 different workers perform onsite job functions. Also, industrial and commercial properties were doing the same. So if you translate that into the some 20,000 starts that we used to have in this province, you can see the effect it can have directly on employment.

Again, cities cover a very small part of our land mass in Ontario. It seems through the term of the last government I spent most of my time arguing with environmental groups that were brought in to stop development. I think one has to look at the conflicts that occur in the planning process. There are many different government policies, and when you weigh any one policy so strongly as it was in Bill 163, you're not going to always get the correct results. So my comment to you today is that this is not only common sense but good sense that's been introduced.

Just one small comment I'd like to make by way of comment on the bill itself, and it's a point that I've discussed with Mr McQuaid, who's given some insightful speeches on problems that arose under section 34, which was introduced under Bill 163. Briefly, these sections allow a municipality to zone land that is significant habitat or sensitive aquifer and basically to sterilize its use. Our concern in this regard is that if one is giving up land—and I've put Mr McQuaid's quotes in, which I'm sure are spoken better than myself, but in my own words, if one has put forward the proposition that this land can't be used by the land owner itself, then of course there is a public interest and the public should acquire the land. I don't think any of us who are in the development industry are attempting to suggest that we should develop lands that are a problem, but we are concerned about the abuse that could result and lack of legal interpretation in the whole area of expropriation without compensation which could arise.

As I say, these three items under paragraphs 3.1, 3.2 and 3.3 were added under Bill 163 and remain in the existing bill. It would be our request that you review those sections and see if you could help out in terms of, at the very least, giving some solid interpretation to avoid some of the problems that might arise.

Again, I would like to say that, as developers in Toronto, we congratulate you on this work and hope that it will help to get Ontarians back to work.

Ms Churley: You said a curious thing towards the end of your statement. I'm just wondering if you could expand on it. What do you mean by—I didn't get the whole sentence and it may be in here—environmentalists were "brought in to stop development"? Who brought in environmentalists to stop what development? I don't quite understand what you mean by that.

Mr Cherniak: There were certainly a number of areas where developers and the development industry participated in the creation of Bill 163. I myself sat on a committee to study the Oak Ridges moraine. These committees seemed to be weighted towards the environmentalists. There were very few of us brought in from the business community. When we were brought in, we made suggestions which were often ignored. The comments that we made were not necessarily given the weight and were often outvoted by the number of environmental groups that were on the committees. I'm not suggesting that developers have a problem with recognizing the importance of the environment; I'm just suggesting that we need more balance in terms of legislation.

Ms Churley: So you consider this bill to be balanced about, say, 50-50 or do you think it's more favourable to the development industry? What would you say, on balance, this bill is?

Mr Cherniak: I would say that the existing Planning Act, prior to Bill 163 was—

Ms Churley: I'm sorry, Bill 20.

Mr Cherniak: I understand, but I would say the Planning Act before Bill 163 was balanced. It provided for broad interpretation of environmental issues by the municipal board and municipal governments. Bill 163 went the opposite way. It took a totally extreme view and said that in any situation where there is any environmental concern, the environment shall win. So this is a return to balance which I would say is 50-50.

Ms Churley: I have a different opinion, but I just want to move on to something else. You say in your document, "But is it fair to place the burden of saving environmental features on whoever lives near natural habitat or a feature considered by others," and you know the rest of the quote. I just want to get to the developer's charge that's also going to be looked at and changed.

The government is suggesting that municipalities not be allowed to charge anything to developers above and beyond hard services. Would you say that the general taxpayer, therefore, should pay for the so-called soft services needed in a community when new sites are developed? Who should pay overall? Should the developer, the people who bought the houses? Clearly what's going to happen in this case is that the general taxpayer is going to end up having to subsidize. Would you view that as fair?

Mr Cherniak: I think your question is tilted in the way you've posed it. First, the development industry has always paid for new development and growth-related costs. When development charges were introduced by the Liberal government, there was a desire to bring a fairness back into the system and an accountability, but certainly when York region built its headquarters out of development charges—and not to blame anyone but just by way of an example—that was paid for by money that developers had contributed for new growth. So there were and continue to be abuses of development charges.

The fact is that all residents in York region pay for the regional centre in their taxes. So what you've got are new homeowners paying both through the price of a new home in development charges and through the tax base. If there are any debentures outstanding on other structures, they're also paying for that and they could well be paying for local improvements. I've yet to see any financial indication that developers have not paid their fair share for new growth and have somehow burdened the existing tax base with new growth. I don't think that's true at all.

Ms Churley: My suggestion is that that may happen as a result of this bill, that if developers are just paying for hard services, somebody's got to pay for the other services in a new subdivision. That's a reality. You've got to have schools, you've got to have libraries, you've got to have community centres, you've got to have these services.

My question still remains. I'm not talking about the past, and I quite agree with you, there have been abuses and there are problems. But I think there is going to be an even more serious problem for the general taxpayer if we don't figure out who's going to end up paying for those so-called soft services. In that case I don't necessarily think developers will be paying their fair share in setting up new communities. I don't know what you suggest, who should be paying for it.

Mr Cherniak: As I say, I don't agree with you. I think the property taxes pay for the services that the homeowner is getting in the municipality. Certainly I don't agree with you that a new homeowner coming into North York should be paying for the library books at Lawrence and Bathurst. I think one has to differentiate between the real costs of new development, the hard services, which he should pay for—and the development industry takes no issue that it should pay for it—and other costs, which are not documented, have never been calculated, have been abused in the past. There's no evidence that any of these municipalities have suffered before development charges legalized the collection of this taxation.

Mr Smith: I want to raise one point. Earlier this morning we heard a presentation from residents from King township. During that presentation they alluded to the fact that they had difficulty making a relationship between a streamlined planning process and economic recovery. I was wondering, given your comments and your presentation, whether you'd have any specific comments you would like to make in terms of that particular statement and the types of results that you would anticipate resulting from the streamlined planning process in the context of economic recovery.

Mr Cherniak: I think it's clear we're talking about an industry that is the largest industry actually in the province. You have to consider what the effects would be by streamlining. As an example, I've seen some figures in the past, that if you improve productivity by 1% in this industry, it's worth $125 million to Ontario, and you could go through each of the tax indications, the job indications and so on. As I say, there is information in this regard.

Red tape doesn't help anyone. All it does is allow someone who is sitting at a desk to say no, and we all know it's difficult for people who have no reason to say yes to say yes. But certainly it doesn't help the people in the community who are waiting for that development to occur, because that only creates uncertainty, it creates problems in the resale market and it creates general problems in their community. By having the certainty of knowing, is the decision yes or is it no, they know where they stand in the community and the jobs are created. It's nothing, as far as I'm concerned, but a win-win for everybody.

Mr Hardeman: Thank you for your presentation. Yesterday we had Mr Sewell in, who was, I suppose, somewhat of an author of the previous Bill 163, at least he did the consultation work for it, and he expressed concern about the government changing from "be consistent with" to "have regard for." He told us the general public like the wording, "shall be consistent with," and the municipalities like that wording; furthermore, the developers like that wording, because it would give them assurances of what the rules were up front. He felt that if we went to "shall have regard for," developers and the other parties would feel uncomfortable, because they would now know going in what the rules would be as they wound up with their applications.

I wonder if you could give us your interpretation of that, whether you feel comfortable with "have regard for," and letting the municipalities deal with the certainty or uncertainty of provincial policy statements.

Mr Cherniak: I have to smile a bit when Mr Sewell says he speaks for the developers. I know that representatives of the development industry spent hours with his commission arguing this very point. I'm sure there will be more learned speakers than me on this particular issue but, in my own experience, the problem it creates is, as I see it, you can have several conflicting provincial policies: one is to protect aggregate resources, another is to protect the environment, a third is to promote economic development and a fourth may be to provide housing.

How does one decide which one should take precedence? I mean, we can't follow every policy that exists otherwise we would be running around in circles. From my angle, I obviously want to see the GTA prosper and I want to see growth that's required continue. Therefore, if I had my way, I would always see growth as the key factor. I think the whole point of a board and a municipal council is to be able to balance all these considerations and say: "When is it correct and how much should we protect of the environment? Should we protect this aggregate resource or should we allow it to develop into housing?"

I think most people who are familiar with this subject would always opt for hearing all the information on each particular case and making a decision. That's why my own feeling is, by allowing the board or the council or the government or whoever is listening to the case to balance all the things that come out with the right decision, we're back to a system which we always had confidence in and under which we never once doubted that the right thing would be done at council or would be done at the municipal board.

Mr Hardeman: I did quickly want to get into the parts that you suggested that were in Bill 163 and that we left in Bill 20 about the significant habitat and sensitive aquifers. I was just wondering if you felt that those had come lately or whether they've always been there and whether or not the person owning that property knew their restrictions or their limitations prior to owning them, and if that would not somewhat take away from the fact that they should be paid for by the public sector as they would not be allowed to be developed.

Mr Cherniak: It's not so much knowing or payment per se. I think the real issue here is, what this is allowing to happen is that someone could suggest, for example, that your farm pond is a sensitive recharge area for the Oak Ridges moraine, even though you had been watering your cattle there for 30 years, and could thereby zone that piece of land "sensitive recharge" and not allow you to use it for your cattle at all.

There's a very recent case, which some friends of mine like to remind me of all the time, of a farmer in Vaughan who had a woodlot and at the edge of the woodlot he wanted to build a house for his children. However, the municipality did not allow him to build on it because they said it was regenerating woodland and, therefore, he could not disturb it.

All I'm suggesting to you is there can be many abuses and grey areas where you're allowing someone to have the ability without a real strict guideline. In the Expropriations Act it's clear, when the government files a plan to build a highway, you know you're on that highway, you know the land is being taken and you know you have rights. In this case you could very well, as I say, have a cattle pond or a woodlot that you think—and you've used all your life—is part of your property, and the government could zone it a sensitive area and you couldn't use it. I think that's the issue I'm trying to address, the abuse of that section.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm glad that you mentioned, in answer to an earlier question, that you're here for the development industry and you like to see development and that's basically where you're coming from, because there are certain comments made in your brief that are so general. I must admit that, as someone trying to find the balance in the right approach to the development industry and the environmentalists, I find some of your statements somewhat broad and general.

For example, to suggest that we can get people back working again by just merely passing this act I think is a bit of an overstatement, isn't it? We were told this morning that there are over 20,000 lots already in the Metro Toronto area that are available right now for development, except there's no housing being built because of the general economic situation. Would you not agree? Bill 163 has only been there for six months and, whether you like it or not, it cannot have had that great an effect on the development industry as far as the current building of houses is concerned.

Mr Cherniak: I think you've got to recognize a couple of things. First, if you look at the number of housing units, as I said to you, at one point in the GTA we were building 20,000 houses a year, probably under your government, and we were happy to do it and the government was happy to allow it. Therefore, that would equate your current supply to one year's supply of housing.

Mr Gerretsen: Right.

Mr Cherniak: I've worked in this business a long time and I've listened to a lot of things in the press, but when you're out there working on something that you know is going to take you 15 years to bring on stream, you're very sensitive to the criticism that will arise when that shortage occurs, and that's my concern. I would say at reasonable growth rates in the GTA we have about a four-year supply of housing stock. If one were to say it's going to stay the way it is, sure, maybe we've got 10 years, but it's quite conceivable that things could turn around very quickly.

The other thing is, it's also not fair to say we have a slow economy now, therefore Bill 163 didn't do anything. Bill 163 gave tremendous powers to the municipalities. I was in York region the day after the day that came into force—I believe it was a year ago—and there were applications lined up from one end of the municipal building, down the hall, all the way through the York region centre. If it was so beneficial to industry, why did every single person who owned a piece of land in this province make an application? It's quite clear that it had tremendous impacts, and if it had stayed in, it would have continued to have great impacts on the industry and made things very difficult for us.

There are planners I've hired that have told me that in the region of Durham they can't even understand the application form under Bill 163 and neither can the planners in the region. I think you've got to recognize that we all hope things are going to get back to normal. You've got to provide a system that's worked and has always worked; it really wasn't broken in the first place.

Mr Hoy: Your first page is basically statistical. You cited codes and acts and other instruments you must deal with, and then you talked about agricultural lands. There are probably two things people aspire to: a place to live, whether it's an apartment or a home or some other structure, and of course they must eat. The demands for land are great for two different purposes.

I'm not aware of land being left idle, as Dr White states, I'm speaking particularly of classes 1 and 2, which are the most productive of lands. That's not to say that somewhere some has stayed idle, but I'm not aware of it, unless it was purchased for developmental purposes and then simply set aside and not growing a crop of some kind.

I would also like to mention to you that the growth in agriculture is probably due to technology. Whereas when I started in the business of farming, I would be somewhat disappointed if I grew 100 bushels of corn per acre; now I'm really disappointed if I don't get 145 bushels per acre. It's a per acre technological advantage that farmers have advanced.

We are, yes, creating new lands at the same time where lands are going out of production, and technology has allowed us to do that particularly in the north and east of Ontario. I just wanted to make that point with you, that in some regards the need for development and the need for agricultural food sustainability are at competing odds, particularly when we talk about classes 1 and 2 land.

Mr Cherniak: My point, and I guess it's based more on Dr White's expertise and my own of farming, is simply that there is land which farmers hold back. I've discussed this on many occasions with the agriculture federation, and they would admit that if prices are good, then they'll get their yields up and bring lands that they're not producing on back into production. The point we're trying to make here is that you don't sort of sterilize farmland as a necessity, because even farmers don't like that.

What we're trying to say is, let the farmers run a good business, let them do what they want, and sure, they may need certain protections to become a healthy farm community, but by the same token, they've been able to keep up with the pace of growth in Ontario and continue to feed the population. Dr White's view is that it's quite alarmist to just keep counting and suggesting how many acres of land go out of production every year. It's not true. The statistics show that in fact land has come back into production if farm prices are high. Farmers are running a business like anyone else. As you say, your productivity improved and hopefully the prices improved and you tried to make more money, just like anyone else.

The Chair: That brings us to the conclusion of our time. Thank you, Mr Cherniak. We appreciate your taking the time to make a presentation before us today.

UNITED TENANTS OF ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next group is the United Tenants of Ontario. Good afternoon. We have 25 minutes for your presentation and/or questions and answers, as you see fit.

Ms Barbara Hurd: You all have a copy of our very brief brief that we've put together for this committee. I'm Barbara Hurd. I want to introduce our organization and then I would probably just read my conclusions and recommendations and maybe go to questions, and I could elaborate if you need me to.

My organization has a number of purposes, and for the United Tenants of Ontario/Locataires uni(c)s de l'Ontario, also known as UTOO and LUDO, purposes are to organize and train tenants across Ontario, to provide a means of communication between tenants, to change laws that adversely affect them, and to fight for tenants' rights to decent, affordable housing. We were founded in 1989.

The majority of our members and 100% of our governing council are tenants. We are run by tenants for tenants. Our members are from all over Ontario, from small towns and large urban centres and everything in between, and from public, private and non-profit housing. Our membership is also comprised of individuals, tenants' associations and federations and other supportive organizations.

Two years ago, UTOO appeared before a legislative committee concerning Bill 120, which gave new rights to thousands of tenants in care homes and illegal accessory apartments. From the beginning, our organization has consistently supported the legalization of accessory apartments and that is the reason we are here. We are here again to fight to keep it on the books.

I'll read my conclusions and recommendations. The recommendations that we have overall are:

(1) That the creation and regulation of accessory apartments in Ontario be allowed as provided in the Residents' Rights Act.

(2) That the education of homeowners and tenants as to their rights and obligations under the provisions of the Residents' Rights Act be continued by the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing.

(3) That the provincial government take the position that exclusive zoning for single-family dwellings discriminates against people on the basis of tenure.

(4) That the provincial government adopt the position that tenants, as taxpayers and citizens, have the right to establish homes in any residential area of their municipality.

(5) That the provincial government also present these positions to the municipalities in Ontario that are opposed to accessory apartments in order to reverse their opposition.

I want to just cover my conclusions and then I will take questions. We've concluded:

(1) That tenants and homeowners in Ontario have indicated their intent and demand for this type of housing by creating 100,000 basement or accessory units to this point.

(2) Setting standards for the creation of these units allows tenants to require maintenance and fire safety without fear of losing their homes.

(3) Passing a law and rescinding it in less than two years, leaving in its wake legal apartments and illegal apartments, creates confusion and chaos in adherence to and enforcement of standards.

(4) As citizens and taxpayers, tenants deserve more service from their municipal governments. Allowing accessory apartments would begin to address the historic neglect of tenants.

(5) Allowing accessory apartments allows tenants choice in housing arrangements and promotes positive diversification of neighbourhoods.

(6) Higher densities in suburban areas would mean more efficient use of public services.

(7) The government has not provided persuasive rationale for rescinding the legalization of accessory apartments.

(8) There are no other sources of rental housing starts besides accessory apartments, virtually speaking.

I want to just make one little correction on page 5 of my brief where I've dropped something out in the second paragraph at the top of the page, "that this society does not find it acceptable to have tenants living as fugitives." If you'd please make that note, I'd appreciate it.

1550

Mr Ouellette: Thank you for your presentation today. A couple of questions. What percentage of your organization actually live or work outside the GTA? It mentions the rural communities, but there are a lot of perceived rural communities within the GTA.

Ms Hurd: I don't know that for sure. Our representation is broad, though. We have had conferences each year. About 250 tenants come. They may not necessarily join our organization, but they are people we are in contact with. We have people from small centres like Kenora, Goderich, Hawkesbury.

Mr Ouellette: Are they directly affiliated with your own organization or are they associated with another one?

Ms Hurd: Yes, we have members. We don't have millions of members in each of those locales because there aren't millions of people there.

Mr Ouellette: Do you have any idea what percentage of homeowners actually live in the house they're renting?

Ms Hurd: Could you say that again?

Mr Ouellette: Do you have any figures that show what percentage of homeowners actually live in the houses they have other units in?

Ms Hurd: You're talking about absentee landlords?

Mr Ouellette: Yes.

Ms Hurd: Absentee owners? I don't have any statistics as to that.

Mr Ouellette: Okay. A couple of other questions. In your conclusion number 4 you state that "tenants deserve more service." Why do you feel that and what service do you feel they are deserving of?

Ms Hurd: For example, in high-rise buildings in a lot of urban areas, tenants pay for garbage collection on top of property taxes that are paid to the municipality. The homeowner gets garbage collection services for their taxes. They don't have to pay anything extra. Tenants really rely on the services of the property standards inspectors to make inspections when there are complaints about serious safety problems in their buildings.

It's been my experience when I worked in a legal clinic and through working for UTOO that inspections are extremely hard to get. At one point when I was working in Scarborough, they were talking about charging for an inspection. It used to be a real process to get the property standards inspector to come to a building to inspect an individual's unit as well as the common areas of the building. Yes, tenants do use the services of the roads and other public services, but when it comes to specific services for their specific needs—

Mr Ouellette: So you think inspections should take place without charges?

Ms Hurd: Yes, they should be part of the tax—especially because tenants pay so much in tax.

Mr Ouellette: Okay. One of the other ones was under recommendation number 4. You state "That the provincial government adopt the position that tenants, as taxpayers and citizens, have the right to establish homes in any residential area of their municipality." We have elected councils in municipalities. Don't you feel they have the ability to make those decisions where they should take place, as elected officials?

Ms Hurd: This question came up two years ago too, about the independence of municipalities, and I've always supported that, but you don't support something indefinitely if the independence means they're going to stick with positions that run against the tenants' needs or the rights of tenants. For example, single-family dwellings: You have to rent the whole house or buy a house and that's it. The point I made the last time was if there's an enlightened policy and the provincial government is going to have to impose that to get that enlightened policy sort of into a level of government that is supposed to provide that decision-making, then that's where tenants will turn, they'll support that.

That's why I put in my conclusions that I want the provincial government to take the position that tenants have rights and go and push that position with the municipalities. It would be better if the municipalities could be persuaded to adopt non-exclusive zoning, but if they don't, and oftentimes—I think that's happened in the past—the provincial government has, through whatever conclusion it has come to, felt the need to impose things on municipalities, and possibly, following that, the municipality would see the reason and adopt it themselves.

Mr Hardeman: I was just wondering, when Bill 120 was introduced, it was introduced recognizing that there were a great number of basement apartments that were not inspected and were in fact not safe for people to be occupying. The legalization in Bill 120 was put in place to try and correct that problem. Have you got any figures or any idea how many of those present apartments that were there at that time are still not inspected?

Ms Hurd: No.

Mr Hardeman: Would it be a great number, or are we getting close to having them all inspected?

Ms Hurd: I'm not sure. This isn't something our group has been able to do a lot research on. We have hardly any staff. If we were the organization we want to be and had the funds we want to have, we could do that kind of research. We could be preparing that kind of research for the purposes of enforcing enforcement. However, that's a little bit beyond our capabilities.

Mr Gerretsen: Just to follow up on that, I take it your association would have no objection to having the apartments registered.

Ms Hurd: This is something that came up in this legislation. Is that right?

Mr Gerretsen: Yes, that's right. See, there are two issues here: number one, who should have the ultimate control as to whether or not they ought to be there, the municipalities or the province; and secondly, whether or not there should be registration. I think just about everyone who has spoken in favour of allowing the homeowner the right to have a second unit has pretty well spoken in favour of registration except for one group earlier, and I've forgotten exactly which group that was. What's your view on registration?

Ms Hurd: I haven't had the opportunity to really look into it. I notice an organization that's followed this issue very closely, INC, Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign, doesn't agree with registration. We haven't had a chance to specifically look at that issue. We were mostly concerned about the rescinding of the legalization.

Mr Gerretsen: What's very interesting about this whole notion is that most of the arguments you've brought in favour of these units are usually brought up by developers or by people who aren't tenants etc. There is this tremendous fear that I sense from all the tenant organizations that the units are going to be built anyway. People are going to build the units anyway, in a clandestine manner, and quite often municipalities will have no control over it, and sooner or later we'll have to do what they did years ago with the Planning Act, where people were constantly disregarding the Planning Act and then the province would come along a year or two later and sort of certify that everything that had gone on before that was okay, and we'd go on another merry chase like that.

Is your concern that, number one, there wouldn't be too many units so your own tenants wouldn't have the same kind of choice and it would obviously have an effect on the increase in rents? Is that one of the concerns that your organization has?

Ms Hurd: No. The concern we have is that the people who live there can't resort to any—their protections are minimal, and because they feel insecure, they'll put up with illegal rents or—

Mr Gerretsen: That's if they live in illegal units.

Ms Hurd: Yes. In terms of supply, I mean, I've never thought of it as the ideal kind of supply. We were very unhappy with this government to stop the non-profit housing program, because it was to be affordable and addressing needs of the different groups within the tenant population. This isn't the answer, but as vacancy rates are dropping all across the province, this is providing some small amount of supply to a diminishing stock.

Mr Gerretsen: Did I misunderstand you? You said you were very much in favour of the government stopping the non-profit program? Is that what you said?

Ms Hurd: Oh, no, no, no.

Mr Gerretsen: No. Okay. I didn't think so.

Ms Hurd: No, I said I was very unhappy about that.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm sorry, I just misunderstood.

Ms Hurd: Given that's been undermined, and the landlords have not come forward with all their supposed offerings to build housing if tenants' rights are demolished, then where will it come from? It is slightly cheaper housing, so it makes it slightly more affordable than what might be put on the market, say, at full price or new construction, and it's fairly easily and quickly put on the market.

So it does have something to do with, first, legalizing what's there and then governing what comes after and, yes, bringing what's there up to standard. I don't know. It just seems so logical to me.

Mr Hampton: I've asked this question of a number of senior citizen organizations and tenant organizations like yourself. If the government proceeds as it has indicated it wants to proceed, do you think there will be any reduction in the number of these apartments that are already out there? Do you think we will see fewer of them built, or will the market demand for this kind of lower-cost, lower-price housing continue to bring on more supply, whether it's regulated or not?

Ms Hurd: When the existence of these kinds of units came to my attention, it was I guess in the 1980s, and people continued to advertise. This is out in Scarborough again. They were illegal, people advertised them, people talked about them quite openly. I don't know that legalizing them and taking the legalization back again will stop that. I think it will continue.

It just really makes me very concerned that we're going to say, "Okay, we're not going to legalize any more," and we'll just pretend they're not there. People are going to go with what they think is a necessary—take a necessary step to create housing, either to help them with the mortgage or, you know.

Mr Hampton: So the market demand is there, there are, as I understand it, increasing numbers of people who, because of lower pay or because they don't have a permanent full-time job any more or by reason of other factors, will be looking for this kind of accommodation. The demand will certainly be there and the supply will be there, but they will be unregulated. We'll be back in the days of health and safety standards simply not being observed or certainly not being enforced.

Ms Hurd: Right.

Mr Hampton: Municipalities have always had it in their capacity to do something about the regulation, and the government members keep going back to that, saying, "The municipalities should do something." But what we've heard here today and yesterday is that municipalities have largely ignored these issues. They've largely ignored the fire safety, electrical safety issues associated with this kind of housing and accommodation. Why do you suppose that has been that way? Do you have a sense of why that's happened?

Ms Hurd: I guess it might not necessarily be that they've ignored those issues, but I think over this issue generally they're listening to so-called ratepayer organizations who just don't want certain kinds of people and certain kinds of things going on in their very exclusive neighbourhoods. So they're the ones who are putting pressure on the municipalities to keep things the status quo. I'm not sure about whether or not they've neglected fire safety of that stuff, because I think everybody tends to find that there's just not enough inspectors when you need them or whatever, so maybe they can't cover every inch of housing, but—

Mr Hampton: At least you could make a complaint, though. When you officially recognize this housing market, it seems to me then a tenant can at least make a complaint and can raise the issue.

Ms Hurd: In an illegal apartment?

Mr Hampton: In a legal one.

Ms Hurd: Yes.

Mr Hampton: In an illegal one, the risk is you get kicked out or you're told you're not welcome any more.

Ms Hurd: Right.

Mr Hampton: What's the difference in assessment, say in Scarborough, between someone who has a legal accessory apartment, and therefore I guess would be assessed in terms of property taxes, and somebody who has an illegal one? In other words, their house is still down as a single-family dwelling and someone else's is down as a single-family dwelling plus accessory apartment. Is there a difference in how they're assessed, do you know?

Ms Hurd: That I don't know. I think when you do make changes or add to your house, there is some inspection that's supposed to be done. I get the feeling a lot of people don't report these things, whether it's about an apartment or not. But that I don't have information on.

Mr Hampton: I guess what I'm getting at is it seems to me that on the one hand you've got the health and safety of a whole bunch of people. All right? Let's assume there are in excess of 100,000 of these accessory apartments in existence around Ontario, mainly in urban areas, although perhaps not. It seems to me on the one hand you've got the health and safety issues of the people who live in those accessory apartments. It seems to me you have the potential for fire; you have the potential for other serious situations. You'd think municipal governments would take that seriously, and you'd also think the province would want to take it seriously.

On the other hand, you have the issues of, "I don't want certain types of people living in my neighbourhood," or "I want to run an illegal or unregulated accessory apartment but I don't want to pay any additional property taxes and I don't want to pay for inspection and I don't want to have anything else involved here." It just seems to me that there's a test here as to which values are more important.

Ms Hurd: Well, I don't know. The reason why I'm here is concern for the health and safety of tenants who are renting units that are being offered by homeowners and who need that housing. There are a whole lot of other issues that impinge on this, but the reason for my presence here is the concern for them.

The Chair: With that, I'll thank you both. We've exceeded our time. Thank you, Ms Hurd, for your representation this afternoon, for taking time to come down and speak to us.

KLAUS WEHRENBURG

The Chair: Our next presentation will be from Mr Klaus Wehrenberg. Good afternoon, sir.

Mr Klaus Wehrenberg: Thank you for allowing me to be present here. Since I am not part of an organization, I would like to start by introducing myself. Before I start my comments, I shall give you some background on why I'm interested in Bill 20.

While I was born in Europe and received my basic education there, soon after my arrival in Canada in the late 1960s, I got involved in land use issues, planning issues, and I haven't stopped. They were mostly local issues, but in the last 10 years I have taken an interest in provincial and national issues as well.

My involvements in Ontario's planning have included provincial appointments to the local conservation authority and to the citizens' advisory committee on the Oak Ridges moraine under Liberal and NDP governments. As well, I conceptualized and, with the help of others, organized a symposium on greenways and green space on the Oak Ridges moraine, an event that was attended by planners, developers and academics from across Ontario and that focused on alternative ways of balancing green space and residential development, obviously focused on the Oak Ridges moraine as an example.

To the dismay of the municipality, land developers and some provincial ministries, I also did not shy away from following through with OMB appeals, but they may rest assured that I do not like them any more than they do and I'm hoping never to have to be involved in one again.

In most cases, I have had to react, but always with proactive input, with suggestions for alternative approaches. That is what I intend to do here: to give you another angle on how to approach planning.

Let me now turn to my comments on Bill 20. First, some critique. The title of the bill suggests a focus on economic growth and on the environment. What about Ontario's social infrastructure? I'm leery of growth. In fact, I detest this preoccupation with more and better. To me, it looks like an illusion that you are chasing. On the back of my van I have a sign: "Wilderness is God." To me it is, and to the ecological balance in the wilderness, any economic growth often entails changing the status quo, to the detriment of wild animals and plants and to natural ecological processes—to our detriment as well, in the end.

I recognize that we have to accommodate humans, especially in a land where immigration is spelled with capital letters. But is there a need for economic growth, or should it be for economic stability? Should we not also be concerned with social infrastructure that aims at stable social environments? Should that indeed not be a major focus in planning? You might say, "Yes, but it is," but why not focus on it in your title if you are going to have such a lengthy title anyway?

The "protect the environment" on which you do focus in the title of Bill 20 should refer to natural ecology, a term that implies a much more in-depth understanding of the interrelationships of natural processes and therefore demand a different approach to planning than is indicated in the draft bill.

Enough of the critique and on with the proactive, the positive. This is where I would like to make my suggestions.

I would like you to become aware of what I consider a feasible physical framework within which planning powers could devolve safely and beneficially to the local levels of government, provided that local decisions will "be consistent with," and not "have regard to" a few provincially uniform ground rules. This framework involves placing all planning on a watershed basis so that each planning region's physical boundaries are determined by natural features.

Today more than ever, more and more people have lost touch with the natural aspects of their surroundings, aspects that were a part of everyday life only a generation or two ago. Today most people grow up in urban environments and are not aware of ecological processes and their significance to human wellbeing and survival. They do not live in nature.

This watershed approach to planning would reinject an element of the natural world into our day-to-day existence. To illustrate, this approach could be developed in conjunction with the current revamping of the greater Toronto area and the local and regional municipalities' boundaries would be redrawn to coincide with watershed boundaries.

The approach could be expanded to the rest of the province and could form one of the pillars on which planning in Ontario rests. After consideration of how the implementation of the approach could be staged, the approach could be incorporated in Bill 20, along with concurrent changes to other legislation, such as the Municipal Act.

While I readily concede that this approach involves a host of administrative and legal changes and related costs, the concept promises benefits that are hard to achieve any other way and they will entail cost savings in the future.

The watersheds, such as the Holland River in the area where I live—the Aurora-Newmarket area—and the Rouge and the Humber all have one common denominator: They have within them urban communities mostly towards or at the mouth of the river and rural components in the upper reaches of the river.

In the GTA model we are searching for just such a mix of development features or forms to allow the sharing of the advantages, such as a tax base and recreational opportunities, and disadvantages: cost of transportation and waste disposal. In the GTA we are also searching for ways to maintain community identity and already know that the currently proposed models are problematic in that respect.

While the watershed approach does not retain the focus on the smaller communities, it also does not artificially divide them. A community is generally connected to a stream or river, especially the urban nodes. Rural townships might suffer division, such as King township, but the residents' orientation towards one of the more urban nodes within the township will remain. Therefore, there might be partial disturbance of the community identity factor, but likely only of the one that relates to the artificial township boundaries. I experienced that this latter factor was the less significant of the two during the 25 years that I lived in the country.

Obviously, these few remarks give you only an inkling of what an orientation towards a watershed model would offer. But the model does offer a planning alternative which could be incorporated in the draft bill even if it were only for staged introduction.

You will hopefully recognize that planning on the basis of an area with natural boundaries has these advantages over planning based on areas with artificial boundaries. Residents can relate to areas related to rivers and streams over areas that have no boundaries with a common denominator. From that springs the sense of community identity. People belong to something they can readily express and which they can see and experience. Residents would start to care for the cleanliness of their air, water and land and could be motivated to relate to how the conditions of these basic elements of life could be maintained or enhanced.

The approach presents an option that would allow for a considerable shift of planning responsibilities from the provincial to the local level without the risks that are related to artificial community boundaries. As stated earlier, if minimal provincial ground rules were put in place and enforced, then planning could become better understood, could be a more natural part of our lives, would be less complicated and above all would be less confrontational and hence more efficient and less costly.

With planning professionals working at the local levels and public confidence in the planning process restored, perhaps the planners could then act to plan for the community rather than react to plans initiated by an individual. You have an opportunity to lay the groundwork for a real planning alternative. Would you ever serve the people of Ontario if you did that. Thank you.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation. I also noted that the first words in the bill were "An Act to promote economic growth"; the government has had a desire to put the words "economic growth" in a number of bills that I've looked at lately. Of course, there may be other issues involved, but "economic growth" is always something they put forth first.

You talked about common interest of communities or of a community. I've had presentations made to me under Bill 26, and perhaps under Bill 20, that there could be an encroachment or a disintegration of the common interest within a community or within a number of communities and I think you've touched on that here today. Are you concerned that the two bills together could be harmful to communities?

Mr Wehrenberg: Bill 26, the way I understand it, and I didn't look into all the details of it—we didn't have time to do that, so I didn't bother making comments on it—gives governments, ministers, pre-emptive powers. Especially the Minister of Municipal Affairs can do certain things and he is going to call the shots, basically.

My concern in general has been that what we are attempting to do in the GTA, and obviously we have to consider elsewhere, is going to be fought all the way by the communities because they're going to be told that they have to amalgamate artificially with others, and this is all on artificial boundaries; that's why they can't relate to any of this stuff. There is nothing in common between them. But they have to amalgamate in order to get a vote around the GTA council table, basically. That type of thing is in the making.

The communities don't want to be torn apart, but by the same token there is a lot of acceptance of the need to restructure local-level government to get efficiencies out of the system. The efficiency I think could come from having a local body of government that has some form, that has some presence in people's minds; like, they can say, "I'm from the Holland River area" or "I'm from the Humber River" or "I'm from the Nottawasaga River." We could all relate to that. We all know a piece of the Nottawasaga, we know a piece of the Ganaraska and so on of the river systems and we know basically where it belongs. We then have people speaking to something that they all have in common, and we have a mix of people: We have rural elements and we have urban areas.

We have a concern I think in the whole township, then, or watershed or whatever you want to call it later on, for instance, about how waste is going to be disposed of and how much of it they create, how it will affect their water and so on. They can control these things, because it is always in this ecologically cohesive land base in which they live. So you're going to get some interest from the community, because at all times when we talk about planning they will relate to this because they are part of this and they can have an influence and they can point to something.

These environmental issues, the environment development conflict, has pulled us apart. It has created nothing but acrimonious relationships. It has used up time. It is still not being resolved, it won't be resolved by this act and it won't be resolved by the GTA boroughs. That's one of my concerns. I think we need to get to terms with this but we have to make a big leap. There's no doubt that what I'm presenting here is something that takes a little bit of political courage. This is not something you can just pull out of the bag and say, "Well, we're going to do this tomorrow." No, it takes commitment and some real looking into, how you best restructure the whole shebang. We are not going there now. We are not going to resolve the GTA.

Mr Hampton: You're advocating something that I think a lot of the biologists who work within the government also advocate, the move to ecosystem-based planning, watershed-based planning. So let me ask you bluntly: Do you think this legislation and the policy statements that go along with it will lead towards watershed-based planning, will lead towards ecosystem-based planning or will lead in another direction?

Mr Wehrenberg: No, they will not lead there; this is obvious. In fact, the whole framework isn't there; it's not in place now and there is no hint in the legislation that this is the direction that the legislation should move. My concern, naturally, is that we also have taken away from Bill 163 basically something that we really hammered out in public meetings and it was talked about and there was the development industry and there were the stakeholders. They were all in there and there was democracy to some good degree.

We have taken away the capacity, I think, under the new legislation, under Bill 20, to address these ecological connections. Corridors and so on have been taken out of the policy statement, the concern for corridors. The municipalities have to "have regard to" or the developers have to "have regard to" policy statements. But it isn't sufficient. As I said in this documentation, we need to have some ground rules at the provincial level that all planners have to worry about, all people, all private and public interests have to worry about. If we don't have them, then we don't have any provincial interests that can be paid attention to.

If I'm going to have to stand there, as somebody who intervenes in the planning process, and gather up the expertise to show that a planning proposal has no "regard to," and then have policy statements that are equally wishy-washy, in a way, there's no way I can be involved in it. My nerves won't hold out. I did two OMB hearings, and I had to put them on the mat to be able to get my word across. You just cannot keep up this type of work, as an individual. This is what is expected here. When you have policies or when you have acts that are not precise, you then have to argue your case, but without professionals you'll go nowhere, absolutely nowhere.

I haven't got the means and the resources to garner these professionals, and not the time, under the new rules. Ninety days? Give me a break. Ninety days for an OP amendment that can have vast influences on the future of the community? There is no way I have the time. I wouldn't even attempt it, because I would lose my credibility overnight, just like that. Every time I'd go in front of the public, they would say: "Well, what the hell is he talking about? He can't talk about it, because it's not in there." So I'm dead from the word "go." There's no point in wasting my time. I've had too much experience in this. I won't do it.

Mr Hampton: This is an issue we're having some debate over. You've come as someone who is interested in environmental protection, and you're saying that this would not leave adequate guidelines, the policy isn't there to work with, the policy statements aren't there to work with.

One of the things we heard yesterday, though, from Mr Sewell, who headed up the Sewell commission, was that the government believes that by doing some of these things they'll move through the process more quickly. Mr Sewell was of another view. He said, "No, it won't move through the process more quickly, because anyone who does have a stake, anyone who does have an interest, will find ways to argue about something, will find ways to tie up the process and will find ways to simply create a number of issues around the vague language and so on." What's your view?

Mr Wehrenberg: There are two angles to this. One is what I've just expressed, that the average citizen won't even bother getting involved any more, anybody who is worried about his credibility. As an environmentalist, you are worried about your credibility, because without it you have no stock-in-trade. When I see what is in front of me, I assess what chances I have of arguing this case successfully. I can lay off there, because what I see in front of me with Bill 20 and the policy statements will not allow me to be credible, to remain credible.

The other angle of that is that if I do in fact feel superstrongly about this and I gather up maybe other organizations where we can tie together, we have a coalition or something, then we will fight and we will try to convince. But then this fight will drag on. There's no doubt about it that we're going to have arguments over arguments, and there will be all means used to drag this in one direction or the other by both sides. There just isn't the ammunition there for either side to be precise about this, and therefore we are going nowhere and you will in fact delay the process.

Now, the 90-day period, I'm not too sure how that is going to work. My suspicion is that there will be deals cut, before it ever gets to the official introduction of the application, that will enshrine positions before the public ever gets in on this. If that happens, then the public isn't going to be served by the Planning Act, period. There are going to be structural deficiencies in there that are working against the public interest, and that's all there is to it.

Mr Hardeman: Good afternoon, and thank you for your presentation. You mentioned the issue of Bill 26, the restructuring process and looking at municipal boundaries and so forth. In a number of discussions that I've had with municipalities, they find it difficult to put an outer line on the area that they should be looking at for restructuring. Is it fair to assume that in your presentation you think an appropriate way of looking at that would be on a watershed basis as opposed to the present municipal structures?

Mr Wehrenberg: Yes.

Mr Hardeman: Secondly, would you go so far as to say that a reasonable size of municipalities would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of the present areas that conservation authorities cover, or do you see that as needing to be split up?

Mr Wehrenberg: Split up? I have hesitations about it on a subwatershed basis where the watershed is awfully large and very populated. Maybe you can split it up on a subwatershed basis, but we could also think in terms of putting other watersheds together. I'm not saying that you should stay always with one watershed or with two. The Humber watershed is quite a substantial—a very odd shape, in a way. But nevertheless I think you might—that may be the outer limit of what you can put in one bundle. I haven't looked at all the details. There are umpteen watersheds tying into Lake Ontario, for instance, and others into Lake Simcoe and so on, and you have to analyse. In the north you might have to go on quite a larger area, meaning that you have to look at a dividing line that includes several watersheds.

But, yes, in basic terms, I think in a way it can move you politically away from having to deal with this infighting that's going to take place at the local and regional level, like the turf protection and all this type of thing. I think you have an out and it is a very feasible out. There isn't anything ulterior about it. It is an option that you can pursue and that I feel has a lot of validity to be considered at least, to flesh out and to maybe get into a study of it or something, I'm not too sure, before you actually incorporate it.

Mr Baird: Let me first just say we're always pleased to have anyone come before us, but I'm particularly pleased when I see individual citizens just coming forward to express their own concerns and feelings on issues. I think you mentioned at one point, if we had more concerned citizens. I think you're certainly a good example of that so I'd commend you on that.

One issue that seems to be pervading public policy areas at all levels—it's certainly part of this bill—is the issue of local autonomy, decentralizing. The federal government's talking about doing it to the provinces. The province here in Ontario has definitely talked about that direction, particularly reflected in this act.

Someone said that giving municipalities more decision-making authority means giving planning and development decisions where they can be made closest to the community. What do you think of that and how does that relate to your experience in environmental issues?

Mr Wehrenberg: I say in part of my paper, towards the end, that in effect I expect the watershed local municipality, as it were, to have the necessary professional staff to be able to cope with professionals from both sides. I think if the watershed local level is large enough, you can afford to have some staff. We used to have a combination of staff at the planner. They had some expertise in this and that and they made a plan with no problem. They had certain expertise in planning. But at the conservation authority we had the flood control people, the experts, and we had the Ministry of Natural Resources, we had the Ministry of Environment.

All of those professionals would be, in my view, attached to the municipalities at this point, provided there are some overriding provincial interest guidelines that have to be fairly firm. If they are not firm, then you are skidding right off the bat. But as long as you have a large enough municipality, you can afford to have on staff professionals who can be trusted by the public and they will in fact at all times be detached from the political influences.

The larger the municipality gets, the more detached they would be. The lower down you go, the smaller you go, the more attached they are to the political influences on a day-to-day basis.

Mr Baird: That could be said for this bill and any other. I agree.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Wehrenberg. We've reached the end of our allotted time and really appreciate your taking time to make a presentation before us today.

Mr Wehrenberg: I apologize for not giving you a copy. My computer printer broke down last night, and I had relied on it. So you can have this copy to make copies from I think, if you need it at this stage.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

MUNICIPALITY OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO

The Chair: With us next, the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, Metro planning. Good afternoon, gentlemen. We have 25 minutes available to us this afternoon. It's up to you to decide how much time to take for your presentation and how much for question and answer.

Mr David Gurin: We'll be concise. I'm David Gurin. I'm the deputy commissioner of the planning department of Metro, and with me is Chris Burke, my colleague in the planning department. Also with us and observing is Wendy Walberg from the Metro solicitor's office.

You have received, I believe there was just distributed to you, a Metro council position on Bill 20. It was actually passed about a week and a half ago and sent to the Ministry of Municipal Affairs. I think it may not have reached you, but now you have it and I am substantially going to outline that for you. So I'm very much in sync with what you have there.

I think our response is very much in keeping with those from other regional municipalities, but I think that to understand Metro's special perspective on Bill 20, it's important to understand that Metro is unique in at least two ways with regard to this legislation.

First of all, it's the only fully urbanized upper-tier municipality and therefore most development that takes place within Metro is in the form of redevelopment rather than what's known as greenfield development. We don't normally start afresh; we start from something that was already there.

Second, it's the only upper-tier municipality without approval authority for local plans. This is, in our view, a gross anomaly and it's one which we hope will be corrected by this government.

Let me outline Metro's responses to Bill 20 in five different areas: First of all, the question of approval authority, which I've just mentioned; second, the status of official plans and their relationship to policy statements; third, provincial involvement in municipal planning—and I understand very well that the thrust of your legislation is to try to decrease that; fourth, reliance on the OMB—and I think you would like to decrease that kind of reliance because of its cost as well; and fifth, Metro responsibility for the provision of infrastructure.

Let me go back over those. First of all, the question of approval authority: I cannot emphasize enough the degree to which we think it is counterproductive and expensive not to give Metro the same approval authority that is given to all the other regions. The province continues to assign all upper-tiers and counties the ability to approve official plans within the regions, except Metro.

The advantages of assigning regional government the right to approve local official plans have been recognized by the province. It expedites the development review process, it resolves disputes to avoid costly OMB hearings and it reduces provincial entanglement in municipal affairs. So as one of the conclusions council-passed material that we have in front of us is that once again Metro council requests that Metro be assigned approval authority.

Second in the list of things I've mentioned is the status of official plans. Bill 20 proposes to delete subsection 3(8), which was added through Bill 163 to provide for official plans to be deemed consistent with provincial policy statements. This provision is very important to limit recurring challenges of approved official plan policies and other approvals. So Metro council requests that subsection 3(8) be retained with the necessary modification so that it reads "to have regard to" the provincial policy statements.

In other words, we don't want to see any challenges because people, after there's an approval of an official plan, then go back to provincial policy statements. We regard the approval of the official plan as embodying the provincial policy statements.

Third, the provincial involvement in municipal planning: Again, you would like to see this minimized and that more local responsibility is embraced. The proposal to provide for exemption of official plans and amendments might be useful to an upper-tier municipality with approval authority. Without this, in Metro the minister would be the one making the exemption decisions instead of Metro council or the regional council making the exemption decisions. So the ministry would then be in the business of defining Metro interests and determining Metro official plan conformity, thus increasing provincial involvement in municipal planning matters rather than doing what your stated goal is: to decrease that involvement.

The lack of limits placed on the minister's exemption authority could result in a far more adversarial process in Metro, leaving the OMB as the only recourse for Metro council. This goes counter to Bill 20's goal of municipal empowerment and streamlining the process. We believe that this would be resolved if Metro is assigned approval authority so we could then deal with any kinds of exemptions as well as all other matters in regard to official plans within our region.

The fourth item I want to speak to is reliance on the Ontario Municipal Board. Perhaps other speakers earlier today have addressed this. We think that the referral system has worked well in allowing approval authorities the opportunity to resolve disputes. Dispute resolution is a method, a subject matter that many people have put under the microscope of late. It's always best, as you know, to try to bring the disputing bodies together, the people who are engaged in a dispute, rather than have them go into a legal proceeding.

The process of referral has worked very well, because a significant portion of matters are resolved without being sent to the OMB, and we would urge you very strongly to continue this process of referral and to save disputants having to go to the OMB. Not only does it solve going to the OMB, but through the referral process, the scoping down of objectives means that when things do go to the OMB, only very specific issues may go rather than the entire matter, and this saves both public and private costs related to the OMB.

If in fact you choose to replace the referral system with appeals, you will make the development process more adversarial and time-consuming and this will result in greater provincial involvement in local planning matters through the OMB. It will also result in significantly greater costs to municipalities and to proponents and to the province due to increased OMB costs to resolve disputes. So Metro council does request that the referral system be retained for official plans and official plan amendments.

Last, Metro responsibility for the provision of infrastructure: Metro and other regional municipalities are responsible for providing significant public infrastructure, including water and sewer systems, waste management and arterial roads. Metro has to be able to get the most efficient use of its infrastructure investment to save taxpayer dollars and to support its objectives to attract development into the existing urban area. We call this reurbanization; you might have heard it referred to as densification. The notion is that by trying to get development where infrastructure already exists, a great deal of money is saved.

Two provisions in Bill 20 may make this difficult: First, by removing the appeal of local minor variance decisions to the OMB, Metro may be left in a position of being unable to protect its infrastructure interests; and second, the lack of means to sunset rezoning as is done with plans of subdivisions, and we think wisely, in Bill 20 to allow for reallocation of unused infrastructure capacity when the approved development does not occur. In other words, sometimes zoning does give out development rights and those can go up to a certain cap of what infrastructure will allow, but if those are unused and there's no sunset provision, that will prevent other developments from going ahead.

So Metro council requests, first, that provision be made to permit upper-tier referral of lower-tier minor variance decisions to the OMB; and, second, that municipalities be empowered to provide for the lapsing of rezoning approvals after not less than five years, thereby permitting allocated infrastructure capacity to be reallocated to develop when it's ready to proceed.

That's the end of my testimony. However, I would like to ask my colleague Chris Burke to add anything if he feels there's anything in addition that ought to be brought to the attention of the committee.

Mr Chris Burke: The only thing I wondered was just to be sure that all of the members understood what the referral system is. It essentially is a system whereby the approval authority in Metro's case is the Minister of Municipal Affairs; in other regional municipalities the approval authority is the regional municipality itself for the local plans. It's a system whereby people with objections to a plan or to an amendment can ask the approval authority to refer a particular part of a plan or amendment or the whole thing to the Ontario Municipal Board, but that approval authority has the discretion in terms of the timing that it takes to send the matter to the board. If it feels that it can indeed scope down the issue or resolve the dispute without sending it to the board, it has the discretion as to when it actually sends the matter to the Ontario Municipal Board. Under the proposal of Bill 20, the direct appeals system, the approval authority would no longer have that role.

Ms Churley: Thank you for coming to present your views today. Were you consulted by the government while it was writing this bill?

Mr Burke: My understanding is that the regional planning commissioners were consulted through the Association of Municipalities of Ontario.

Ms Churley: So through AMO.

Mr Burke: Through AMO, but not directly.

Ms Churley: It's just that Metro is huge and, as you pointed out, just different from municipalities. Some of it can have different impacts on you.

Mr Burke: Yes. We weren't consulted directly, but indirectly.

Ms Churley: Right, just as part of the whole AMO structure. So you weren't given any opportunity to voice your concerns, that's what I'm trying to get at. You saw no draft or were not told what might be in the legislation beforehand.

Mr Gurin: Not directly.

Ms Churley: So you had no direct input.

I should probably know this, although my stint at city council was very short. I can't remember the historical reasons why Metro Toronto approval was not granted for approving an area or municipal plan. Can you just remind me of that? Is there some kind of turf war thing going on here? Am I suspecting that or is my suspicion correct here?

Mr Gurin: In my tenure, it's been asked for consistently. As for the original reasons why it was not given, I'll call on Mr Burke.

Ms Churley: Did the city of Toronto object? There must be some other reason.

Mr Gurin: There have been some objections—I don't know how officially they were ever made—by the area municipalities, yes.

Mr Burke: I do believe that some of the reasons were from the concerns expressed by the area municipalities. We believe that it's partly due to a lack of understanding as to why Metro would have the approval authority. It's effectively not simply to tell the local municipalities what to do but in order to be able to better resolve issues within its area, as the other regional municipalities are doing.

When Bill 163 came forward, Metro did come to a similar hearing as this one today and the same question was put by our chairman, Mr Tonks. I do recall watching that on television and seeing the answer as being, "The government is trying to deal with the whole greater Toronto area, so we're not changing anything in Metro." Yet we seem to have had no problem changing matters in the other regions, even though there's a greater Toronto area exercise under way there as well. The same reasons for the regional municipalities dealing with approval authority, in being able to come up with the efficiencies in the local area, apply to Metro as well.

Mr Smith: Earlier today we heard a presentation from the Canadian Bar Association and it dealt in large with a number of legal terminologies. As part of their presentation they expressed concern, or perhaps "opposition" would be a better word, to that provision in the bill that allows the municipality as a condition of site plan approval to require the applicant to convey land for public transit rights of way. On page 4 of your report you indicate that you're an advocate of that type of provision. Perhaps you could share with the committee why you are proponents of that particular position, by comparison with what we heard from the bar association.

Mr Burke: I think particularly within an urban area, where most activity occurs through redevelopment, very often the site plan process is the point at which these kinds of matters can be dealt with. There already was in the legislation the provision for road rights of way to be gained through this mechanism and I believe through Bill 163 the public transit aspect of it was provided to regional municipalities. It's the local municipalities themselves which actually administer the site plan process, so it makes sense for them to also be able to exercise this authority. Secondly, in a number of municipalities the transit authority is actually reporting to the local municipality, so that it would be the local government that would have the responsibility for transit matters.

Mr Gurin: I just think it's a matter of really basic and elementary planning. The market cannot conserve. It can do all kinds of things, but it cannot conserve. Rights of way are one of the things that planners can make provision for, and that's a good device.

Mr Hardeman: Going back to the comments made by Ms Churley about the consultation with Metro directly as opposed to other segments of organizations, you said they met with or discussed the change with the regional planners?

Mr Gurin: I understand they met with AMO, and there was an organization of the regional planners of Ontario that is represented on AMO.

Mr Hardeman: I would like to go on then. You also mentioned the comment about the consultation for Bill 163 and being told that things were going on in the Metro area and that's why they were being excluded from the changes. That is true today. Could you tell me how many of the changes in Bill 20 would directly impact Metro today? How much of the change is actually applicable to Metro as opposed to the rest of the regions?

Mr Gurin: I could say that there are some which might not apply to us, but most of the more important ones will apply across the board; for example, the issues we brought up, where we fear increased disputatiousness, an increased problem of going to the OMB rather than the deferral process. That applies to us as it would to any municipality within Ontario. There may be some matters which don't apply to us, but I think the great majority do. Would you concur with that?

Mr Burke: Yes, and I believe that, as requested, one is the effect of the exemption of official plans, and that's because it's putting the power to exempt local official plans and amendments, or portions of them, in the hands of the approval authority. In all other regions, that therefore puts it into the hands of the regional municipality. In the case of Metro, the approval authority is the minister because it hasn't been assigned to Metro, so it creates a different set of issues within Metro than for the other regional municipalities.

Mr Gerretsen: I'm curious about all these questions about consultation. I wouldn't like to see consultation take place just with one group and not with another. All the municipalities across the province recognize the fact that Metro is by far the largest but they are the same, and I think there's always been a feeling outside of Toronto that there's too much consultation directly going on between Metro and—

Ms Churley: Not with this government.

Mr Gerretsen: Just a minute now—and the city of Toronto and government traditionally, governments of all stripes.

Just so you can educate me more than anything else, you haven't dealt with—or if you have, I've missed it—the apartment unit issue. Is that not a Metro issue? Is that a local municipal issue for the city of Toronto?

Mr Gurin: Well, it's both. Our official plan does allow for apartment dwellings.

Mr Gerretsen: But do you take a position on whether it's a good or a bad thing to exclude them, or to bring it down to the local level?

Mr Burke: No, council did not take a position at this time. The report that was taken forward was largely on the Planning Act changes of Bill 20.

Mr Gerretsen: I see. What about the committee of adjustment? Does Metro have a committee of adjustment, or is that a local government?

Mr Burke: That's a local responsibility, which is the gist of the comments on minor variances with respect to infrastructure spending.

The Chair: Thank you very much. We appreciate you taking the time to make your presentation today.

ORLANDO CORP

The Chair: Our last presentation of the day is the Orlando Corp. Good afternoon.

Mr Phil King: Good afternoon. Thank you, Mr Chairman and members of the committee. My name is Phil King, with Orlando Corp. I've provided you with a point-form summary of the presentation I'm going to make this afternoon.

Orlando Corp is a privately owned development company specializing in industrial-commercial development. Orlando has been in existence for over 40 years and it's evolved into a fully integrated development company. We are well known for the development of controlled business parks, the latest being a 1,200-acre development at Highways 401 and 10 in Mississauga called Heartland.

We currently own and manage over 24 million square feet of industrial and commercial properties. Our integrated services include the assembly and development of land; design and construction of industrial-commercial buildings as our own contractor through design-build projects; ownership of the properties, and property management. Provision of these services has made us a one-stop shop for industry wanting to expand, and has resulted in us now being one of the largest companies of its kind in Canada. Companies like ours are at the foundation of industry, business and employment in Canada. We create places of work and employment, and our competition is not local, it is international.

Industry comes to Orlando because of its ability to provide facilities on a fast-track time frame. To do this, we need the cooperation of government to bring land on stream and provide the various municipal approvals in a quick and efficient manner.

Bill 20 provides the framework for municipalities to assist industry by reducing red tape and bringing land on stream and business to this province. We support the general direction this government is moving in by trying to reduce the time and cost of developing land for business.

We support Bill 20 with particular reference to reduction in time frames for processing of planning applications; the absolute right of appeal; using the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing as the clearinghouse for applications; to eliminate further duplication by deleting the requirement for public meetings for plans of subdivision due to adequate public consultation still being required where areas for land use is really determined, ie official plans and zoning bylaws; the clarification of what "prescribed information and material" means and when the trigger for the required time frames kicks in; also, maintaining the OMB and the inclusion of alternative dispute resolution approaches.

There are, however, some areas of concern that we request this committee to address:

The absence of property rights protection and compensation principles for land taken or sterilized. This issue is of grave concern when talking about buffers to significant wetlands and other environmental areas. In some instances, land holdings may be completely frozen or considered undevelopable.

The ability to take land for public transit rights of way without compensation. Public transit rights of way are services provided for the population in general, and it is unfair for specific land owners to contribute more than their fair share. Both of these items fall under the heading of expropriation without compensation.

Minor variance applications being appealable to municipal council rather than to the OMB. This is a concern for two reasons: (1) It will not remove politically motivated decisions which will be based on local motivation rather than planning issues, and (2) frivolous appeals will be in abundance due to the lack of preparation required to appear in front of council rather than the Ontario Municipal Board.

Appeal rights for changed conditions on subdivisions and consents. The decision regarding approval has already been handed down and should not be reopened due to a change in a condition. The decision has not changed. Frivolous appeals would result in unnecessary delays and a minor change in the condition of approval should not open up the whole process for appeal.

As a general point, we request that the provisions of the act be made clear to all government bodies to ensure that the confusion that currently exists between the old and the existing Planning Act does not continue, especially in light of us having three planning systems in effect.

Dealing with Bill 20 is a major step forward in trying to assist the kickstart of the economy by removing unnecessary red tape from the current planning system. However, as we fix one part, other impediments to growth emerge. These issues are directly related to economic growth and the development of industry in Ontario and resulting employment, and if not corrected will remove any benefit that Bill 20 generates.

These issues are primarily business concerns and can be resolved by amendments to the Assessment Act, amendments to the Municipal Act and Education Act and amendments to the Development Charges Act.

We're not dealing with increased profits to development companies; we're dealing with survival and our ability to continue to attract business and employment to this province. For business to be competitive we need changes.

Recent court cases have caused a significant appeal process being implemented by municipal governments to increase the level of realty tax on vacant industrial properties that are zoned. It's grossly unfair for a municipality to be able to tax vacant land at the full industrial rate just because the land is zoned. This approach will result in municipalities becoming owners of land due to non-payment of taxes and/or drive up the cost of land to an uneconomical level. It will also severely restrict the availability of land which is zoned and ready to go, because developers will not pre-zone lands due to the high tax cost and hence carrying costs.

Already the cost of taxes, levies and hard costs exceeds the sale price of land. Unless we change the system, industrial development will cease. This can be illustrated in the two examples attached to the brief I supplied, one dealing with the cost of land and sale price, and the other dealing with the tax differences with respect to vacant industrial land.

We believe an amendment to the Assessment Act is needed in conjunction to the passing of Bill 20 to resolve this issue by permitting recognition of when lands really become industrial, and that could be used for industrial purposes. Zoning alone is not the trigger.

Another measure that would assist new business is to stop placing the burden of cost solely on new businesses. With respect to education development charges, this can be achieved by revisions to the Municipal Act and the Education Act to permit school boards to put the non-residential education development charge component on the overall tax base.

Currently, education development charges will apply to only new industrial and commercial buildings. However, there's no relation between new industrial and commercial growth and new pupil places.

With respect to the non-residential sector, all business benefits from education, and not just new business. The boards of education in Peel, the economic development department of the city of Mississauga, the boards of trade and the development industry support an alternative which removes the burden of education development charges on new growth and spreads the impact over the much larger non-res assessment base. Amendments are required to remove the 85% relation between residential and non-residential mill rates and the Education Act to permit this alternative.

The third item is development charges, and we know this government is currently looking at the Development Charges Act, so I'm not going to get into any discussions on that, just that we will obviously be involved with UDI in future discussions on that issue.

Thank you for the time. That's my presentation, and I'd be willing to answer any questions.

Mr Galt: Sorry, I came in in the middle of your presentation, but I'm interested in your item about property rights and compensation for land taken. This was certainly a great concern during the campaign, particularly by farmers. I wonder if you would expand on some of your feelings. This morning it came out, and I had not picked up on it previously, that possibly we're in a position whereby woodlands would end up in a similar situation. I'd like to hear more of your thoughts in this general area.

Mr King: I can give you an example, which I think is the easiest way to explain this. We had control of some land in Scarborough, adjacent to one of the tributaries of the Rouge Valley, and the Rouge River park plan identified significant buffer strips adjacent to the environmental area. We're not talking about the environmental area itself; we're talking about the buffer strips adjacent to it.

Mr Galt: The 150 metres.

Mr King: Yes. That would have sterilized a 100-acre piece of land because of a tributary to the Rouge River running through the middle of the property, and that park study did not address any compensation for sterilizing or taking that land. The municipalities weren't looking at actually acquiring it; they were saying, "You just cannot develop on it." That's an example of the concern, and that can happen against woodlots, against watercourses and any other environmental area. That's the concern.

Mr Galt: The story you relate here has been related in my riding many, many times over, and it seems very unfair, as a result of Bill 163.

Mr Hardeman: Near the end of your presentation you referred to the Development Charges Act, that it was being reviewed, but just prior to that you were indicating that we should allow the development charges for education to be spread in all areas. It would seem to me that there is a connection between the two, that the review of the development charges, particularly where the development charge on education now sits—I would presume that spreading over the total tax base would not be done until the review of the total Development Charges Act was completed.

Mr King: It may be. The situation, as you may be aware, is that we've just had education development charges passed in the region of Peel, so it's a situation that exists today. Through our presentations to the schools, we put forward this alternative and had the support of industry and the boards of trade. They were willing to look at that alternative, because they recognize that they don't want to stifle new industry because of its benefits on the tax base. But we could not use that alternative because the Municipal Act and the Education Act wouldn't permit it. The Development Charges Act gave them the right to put these things in place or not, so it wasn't the Development Charges Act that was the issue; it was the other two acts. I brought this up today because of the concerns that all run together about the costs of development, especially upfront developers.

Mr Hardeman: I have one further question on the environmental areas that you refer to, somewhat from the opposite direction that my colleague comes from. Have the environmental areas that need protecting because they are a provincial interest not always been a provincially significant area, with the developer knowing in the purchase that the ability of that land to produce was the purpose that it would be designated for?

Mr King: Whether the actual area was provincially significant I don't think is the issue. I don't think we are concerned with the actual environmental area that would be running through the property. It's the extent of the buffer that's adjacent to it and how that is treated, as far as not being able to be developed or restricted in development considerably. We're not saying to get rid of the environmental areas; we're just concerned with the buffer, and some of them can be pretty significant, effectively wiping out a piece of land.

Mr Gerretsen: You're obviously a believer in property rights and that a person should have as many rights as possible as far as their own particular property is concerned. Am I correct?

Mr King: Yes.

Mr Gerretsen: Do you not think it's rather unusual then that this act would include a clause by which, in effect, the right to have a basement apartment has been excluded? I know you didn't make any comments on that, and probably as an association or as an organization you don't have any interest in that, but does that sound consistent to you?

Mr King: Having the right for basement apartments? We're not residential developers, so we've never come up against that situation. I'm not really qualified to comment on that.

Mr Gerretsen: Well, anyone can have a basement apartment now by right, provided you meet certain health standards etc, and that has, in effect, being taken away in this act and it's being referred to municipalities to deal with. Do you think that's somewhat inconsistent?

Mr King: I'm sure there are people that will be speaking in front of this committee that have a hell of a lot more basis for a discussion than I do, I'm afraid.

Mr Gerretsen: I see that you support the deletion of the requirement of a public meeting for plans of subdivisions.

Mr King: Yes.

Mr Gerretsen: As you well know, there are usually at least three parties involved: the municipality, the developer and the immediate neighbours. Being reasonable about it, don't you think it's somewhat unusual to require a public meeting in the case of a committee of adjustment dealing with a minor variance?

If this were implemented the way it's suggested, we've now got a situation or we will have a situation where a public meeting would not be required for something that's usually of a much larger scope and nature, namely, a subdivision. I realize that the land is zoned for that, but if you were an immediate neighbour to that, would you not want at least to have some input into how that subdivision is to be developed?

Mr King: I think the neighbours do have considerable input under the process without public meetings for subdivision.

Mr Gerretsen: How?

Mr King: Through the zoning bylaw and through the official plan.

Mr Gerretsen: But that's quite a bit different, though, because in a zoning bylaw you don't really deal with the particular layout of the subdivision or how exactly it's going to be implemented.

Mr King: The only thing that it probably won't show is where the internal roads go, but it certainly does show all of the different zones that are applicable and what uses are permitted on the land. I think the draft plan of subdivision is really the technical side of how to implement the zoning bylaw and the official plan.

Mr Gerretsen: But that could in fact be quite different one from the other, could it not?

Mr King: I don't believe so. I think that the zoning bylaw and the official plan is where the land use and where the concerns of neighbours, and also the site plan approval that deals with issues that come along later on—the public has considerable input into all of those areas. I think it's just adding an extra area that's not required, just adding more time.

Mr Gerretsen: I guess you and I will disagree on that then. But would you not agree that the real time delays are not so much the specific time periods that are talked about in the act, but rather the length of time that a council or a planning department or a ministry deals with a particular application?

Quite often there are time periods set out for that. As you and I well know, these time periods quite often aren't adhered to because of workload demands and one thing or another. It's really the administrative time requirements that take the time and not so much the legislated time factor. Would you agree or disagree with that?

Mr King: In a certain way I think that what this act does is permits the applicant to refer the application to the OMB if there really is not any progress on that file. I think most of us—I'm not saying all, but most developers—work with the municipalities and, provided the thing is moving along, there won't be a proliferation of appeals to the OMB because a certain time frame isn't met. But there are instances where a municipality, through political issues, will not deal with an application. It's in those situations where these provisions and the stipulations for the time frames will help.

Mr Gerretsen: But I guess my point is that the extra time that is required for the public meeting really isn't that—the word escapes me. But that really doesn't add all that much time to it; it's all the other time delays that do.

Mr King: If you're adding an extra public meeting and all of the issues that would have to be addressed after that—in a lot of instances, you're dealing with duplication. Still have the public meetings but deal with these issues at the zoning bylaw.

Mr Hampton: I want to take you back to your comments about the Rouge River Valley. Park planning there has been going on for some time. As I understand it, the Rouge River is one of the most significant watercourses draining into Lake Ontario that still has some wilderness territory attached to it, still has an opportunity to be preserved or maintained as some sort of parkland for Metro Toronto. You were talking about the protected strips along the side of ravines and so on. Is it 150 metres?

Mr King: They range, it depends. In some areas it may be 30—

Mr Hampton: The size and significance?

Mr King: Yes. In some areas it may be 100 and in others 150. It's not the quantum, it's the principle, I think, that we've got a concern with.

Mr Hampton: So you're not talking about that these are excessive?

Mr King: No. If it's deemed that the protection of that environmental area is required and it does require to sterilize these areas, it's the compensation to that individual owner. If the benefit is for the whole population, why should that one individual owner carry the burden of that? If it's deemed by government that that's something they want to protect, then it should be paid for by everybody in general, not just that individual owner who happened to have that environmental area running through the property. That's our concern.

Mr Hampton: So it's not the protection you object to, it's the question of how it's going to be handled and dealt with?

Mr King: Yes.

Mr Hampton: Did you take part in any of the park planning?

Mr King: We commented on the various reports that came through, yes.

Mr Hampton: That's all I wanted to ask.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr King. We appreciate your taking the time to make a presentation before us this afternoon.

Now, committee members, we'll move on to the three motions that were tabled earlier today. It's my understanding that the first of those motions was the one moved by Ms Churley.

Ms Churley: Do you want me to read it now?

The Chair: If you wish. Yours was the first one.

Ms Churley: Whereas Bill 20 has a significant effect on the environment in Ontario; and

Whereas the Mike Harris government has taken many measures to dismantle environmental safeguards that protect our environment and health during the last eight months; and

Whereas the minister responsible for environmental protection is not scheduled to come before this committee;

I move that this committee formally request the Minister of Environment and Energy to appear before this committee to answer questions relating to the effect of the Planning Act amendments, Bill 20, on the environment and the people of the province of Ontario.

Could I speak to the motion?

The Chair: Please do.

Ms Churley: I'm not going to take up a lot of time. There are two other motions—

Mr Hardeman: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: Is the resolution you just read the same one that was circulated this morning?

Ms Churley: Yes, it is.

Mr Baird: The derogatory "whereases" were added.

Ms Churley: The clerk told me I should just give him the motion—

Mr Hardeman: I have no objection to the resolution. I just wanted to make sure we were working on the same document.

Ms Churley: You heard that. He said he had no objections to the motion.

Mr Hardeman: Being put.

Ms Churley: In the interests of time, because there are a couple of other motions and it has been a long day, I'll keep my comments brief. It's very, very clear that the environment is a huge part of this bill. I would say a good half or almost half of the people who have come so far, and there are others coming before the committee, bring up their concerns about the implications of some of the changes to the bill which will, in their view and in my view, have a detrimental effect on the environment.

The Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing was here briefly, but it was very clear to me that, first of all, there wasn't a lot of time for questions, but it was also very clear his background is not in the environment. It was very clear he didn't have answers to questions. We haven't had an opportunity to hear from the minister her views on some of these changes and how she would ensure that environmental protection is provided once this bill is passed and the changes come into effect.

I think the committee should understand that it may appear right now that all these changes can be made and nice little words be put into the bill about environmental protection, but when the substance isn't there, sooner or later, people are going to start figuring out that this government is dismantling environmental protection, and I can assure you there's going to be a lot of concern and a lot of anger about that.

I think it would be in the interests of all of us on this committee to have the minister here to discuss some of those concerns. Perhaps she can reassure some of us about some of the issues which have been raised that seem to indicate that there could be very dire environmental consequences as a result of some of these changes. I think it would make sense for all of the committee members to hear at first hand from the Environment and Energy minister and I would certainly request and solicit the support of you all in asking the minister to come forward and be able to answer some questions.

Mr Gerretsen: I speak in support of this motion and I hope that this will be carried unanimously. We're here to get as much information particularly as possible, and if there is something that the minister can add to this, or at least give us her views on these changes, then I think that the committee work will be the better for it. I'll just leave it at that. I think there are some environmental impacts, obviously, that will result as a result of this legislation, so let's find out the ministry's official view on it. I speak in support of the motion.

Mr Hardeman: I would refer it over to Mr Galt, who is the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Environment. I'm sure he would appropriately speak to the resolution.

Mr Galt: I think it's rather interesting the comments that have been made and the motion that has been put forward. I think back over the day and a half that I've been here—I missed most of this afternoon, and I'll explain that in a moment—and as it relates to MOEE and that particular ministry, there's really been very little that's been brought forward about the Ministry of Environment and Energy as it relates to that portion of Environment.

I would point out that one of the purposes of a committee hearing is, as I understand it anyway as kind of a new rookie on the block, we're here to get input from the public. We've already received ministry input, particularly from the minister, as mentioned earlier. Also for input we have the Environmental Bill of Rights registry. This information is out to the public in that way.

As parliamentary assistant for Environment, I have been meeting with stakeholders and that's, as a matter of fact, where I was this afternoon, meeting with several stakeholders over the policy statements that we have. As a matter of fact, it was an excellent meeting this afternoon with people with various interests coming together and coming to an agreement on economic development and protection of the environment at the same time. Those who had a real interest in the environment came up and congratulated me at the end as to how well the meeting came together so that both interests could be protected.

I mentioned a second ago Minister Leach has been here, spent close to an hour and a half, a full hour in responding to questions. That is the lead ministry involved with this particular act and he did, I thought, just an excellent job in responding to the questions.

I'd point out to the member presenting this that when Bill 163 was debated, the minister, the Honourable Bud Wildman, did not make a presentation to this committee. As a matter of fact, your parliamentary assistant to Environment at the time, Wayne Lessard, did not sit on the committee for the hearings. In this case, I'm here as the parliamentary assistant for Environment, and also Bill Murdoch is the parliamentary assistant for Natural Resources. Unfortunately, he hasn't been here the first two days, but certainly will be participating in the hearings. So I think you're very, very well represented in both of those ministries.

I certainly cannot support this motion and I would encourage the members not to support this motion and would also, in closing, point out that all the information coming forward at these hearings is being provided to the minister and to her staff for consideration and deliberations as we move to the third week and look at line-by-line deliberations on the act.

Ms Churley: Thank you, Dr Galt, for that. I was quite interested in your explanation as to where you were this afternoon and, because you've offered this information, I wonder if you could table the stakeholders whom you met with this afternoon. You might be able to tell us now, but if not, table that for further reference; because you've offered this information, I wonder if you'd be willing to do that.

I would just like to quickly say that I don't accept that explanation as to, for good reason, why the minister shouldn't appear. I appreciate that you are the parliamentary assistant but so far, Mr Chair, the presenters who have talked about the environment—I've heard Dr Galt say on many occasions very nice words about how this government cares about the environment and is protecting the environment, but I have pages of evidence which I could rhyme off here in this meeting of areas where the environment has been cut, the budget has been cut.

There's been deregulation around the MISA regs. I don't know if he's aware of that, Mr Chair, but the municipal-industrial strategy for abatement plan, which all levels of government worked on—it was done in secret, they were just watered down. The advisory committee that was there to advise the ministry on such things was fired, was told, "We don't need you any more." In the meantime, the minister was busy signing regulations watering down these MISA regulations, which I think is a disgrace. That's just one example right there, and there are many, many others.

You mentioned the Environmental Commissioner. I mean, she just recently did an unprecedented thing and wrote a letter to the Speaker of the House complaining that she had very, very broad concerns about Bill 26 and the exemptions from the registry that came through that bill.

There are many other areas that have been cut and there are people out there in the community—and you will be hearing from others, and some you won't hear from, some have been writing—who have grave concerns about the implications of this bill, Bill 20, on planning as it relates to the environment.

I think the minister has a responsibility to appear before this committee to answer questions that, with all due respect, Mr Leach was unable to answer, has no knowledge of. The Minister of Environment, that's what she does day to day. I say again that nice words about how this government is protecting the environment are just not going to cut it and we need to have some real answers about the minister's involvement in the writing of this bill, which looks to be minimum, and what she is going to do to work with the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing to make sure that the environment will be protected.

Mr Gerretsen: I must admit that I'm a little surprised that the minister couldn't be made available. I totally agree with Dr Galt to this extent, that this is a public open process. We're hearing from a lot of different delegations and there are certain environmental issues that have come out as a result of that. Now, at the end of the process I wouldn't expect the minister to be here first thing tomorrow morning, but I would expect her to be here once all the public consultation has taken place. At the end of the process, there may be certain questions, as there already have arisen in certain areas, that the minister could enlighten us on.

If the whole intention is to stonewall this committee with respect to government information, then somebody say it out loud and let's clear the air and let's get on with life. I thought the request was a reasonable one, but if there's government policy to the effect that ministers do not come to a committee like this—I realize, sure, Minister Leach was here because it's his bill, but to suggest that he would have been in a position to answer the environmental questions that the bill raises or that have been raised by a number of the people who have made presentations to the committee, I think that's just going a little too far because I don't think he would have been able to.

In any event, I think the request is reasonable and I'll just leave it at that.

Mr Galt: Just a short comment in connection with Ms Churley's response. We probably would not be in this position if the overspending hadn't occurred and put us so far in debt. We have to do something about the horrendous debt that we're into, and the rest of her partisan comments don't warrant any comments.

Interjections.

Ms Churley: We're not going to keep this up, I know, but watering down MISA regulations has nothing to do with cutting the debt. But I'd just like to ask Dr Galt again, though, if he could table with this committee, the stakeholders he met this afternoon.

Mr Galt: Mr Chair, I'll investigate that possibility.

Ms Churley: That should be public knowledge. You as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Environment and Energy—what's to investigate? I don't understand.

The Chair: I believe Dr Galt has given whatever response he is going to give you, Ms Churley.

Is the committee ready for the question? Shall the motion carry?

Interjection.

The Chair: I beg your pardon. You're right, put your hands up.

Mr Gerretsen: I would like a recorded vote.

Ayes

Churley, Gerretsen, Hampton, Hoy.

Nays

Baird, Galt, Hardeman, Ouellette, Pettit, Smith.

The Chair: The motion fails by a vote of 6 to 4.

The second motion is the one moved by Mr Hampton. If you'd care to speak to the motion, Mr Hampton, the floor is yours.

Mr Hampton: Yes. As you look at the clauses of this bill and then you look at the policy statements, and we've listened to quite a lot of information provided by members of the public over the last few days, I think a couple of things become apparent.

The Ministry of Natural Resources in fact has the biologists, the ecologists and water resource people who can tell us to a large extent how this bill will work in terms of implementation and operation. As well, in related matters, you've got the policy statements: the policy statement on wetlands, the policy statement on natural environment features. You've got the issue of ecosystem planning or ecosystem management, and that all falls into the work that people in the Ministry of Natural Resources do as well.

Further, people in the Ministry of Natural Resources are often called upon to provide expert evidence, either at the municipal level or at the OMB level, as to what constitutes a significant provincial feature in one way or another, or simply to give a description of the planning area in question.

For all those reasons, I think it would be wise for this committee to hear from the Minister of Natural Resources. The minister can bring some staff people with him, as is often the case, to deal with some of the issues that have been raised frankly by some of the people who have taken the time and effort to appear before the committee.

As well, there's another issue, I think, that needs to be looked at. It's my understanding that the Ministry of Natural Resources staff is going to be cut by about half over the next 14 or 15 months. I spent some time at the Ministry of Natural Resources and it was their view that even with the old system—I'm not talking about the Bill 163 system, but even with the system that predated Bill 163—they were hard-pressed to provide the kind of evidence and information that is needed in order to do thoughtful, careful, orderly planning, planning that doesn't cost you more money down the road because it was done poorly.

I think one of the things we should perhaps hear from the Minister of Natural Resources is what is their thinking, what is his thinking, in terms of how the Ministry of Natural Resources will be able to do this planning, provide this expert advice and also work through this legislation and the policy statements if it's going to have less than half of the employees it formerly had.

If we're really serious about this legislation, and we're really serious in seeing how it will work, how it will be implemented and what will come out of it, then the ministry that does a lot of the on-the-ground work and has to deal with many of the on-the-ground problems should be heard from, as well as some of the professional staff from that ministry. That would only inform this committee and help us to make an informed report back to the House on what this bill is all about and what it can and cannot do.

Mr Hardeman: First of all, I want to say that this is a bill from the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing and the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing did appear to explain the bill in its entirety. He may or may not have answered the questions to your satisfaction. That again is a judgement call.

I do want to comment first on a couple of statements that have been made. I think Mr Gerretsen mentioned the issue of stonewalling, that in fact we're trying to keep information from the committee. I would point out that prior to the hearings of the committee, the offer by the ministry was made that they would go through it clause-by-clause and explain anything that was in the bill to the best of their ability and I would surely hope that no one on the committee would suggest that the ministry does not know what it says. They may not be able to deal with the policy direction, but as to what the clause-by-clause bill actually reads, I would be the first to suggest that there would be no better place to find that information than the offer that was made.

Also, I think everyone would agree that there is a connection or a process that this is following Bill 163. There are similarities between the direction of what the bill is supposed to do, between what was being proposed in Bill 163 and what is being proposed by Bill 20. I just want to point out that the Minister of Natural Resources at the time, Mr Hampton, did not deem it appropriate to appear before the committee or did not feel it was needed to appear before the committee to deal with those issues.

I would go on to suggest a number of issues that have been brought forward by members of the opposition that the members want to discuss that are not part of Bill 20, but issues of the direction that the government is taking on our expenditure controls and to try and get the deficit somewhat under control, as to the number of employees who will or will not be working in different ministries. I think they're very important issues, but they are not directly related to Bill 20. I would suggest that the ability to discuss that information should be pursued in an alternative method. I believe these hearings are set up to deal with the public participation in Bill 20 and to hear what the public has to say about the issues as they appear in our bill.

I also want to point out that the Minister of Natural Resources has informed me that they are prepared to answer any of the relevant questions that you may have. If you wish to forward them, we would try and get answers to them for you to help you in your deliberations.

But we do not feel it appropriate that we request the minister to appear before the committee, and the government will not be supporting the resolution.

Mr Gerretsen: First of all, I don't particularly care what happened with respect to the last government and whether or not somebody did or did not appear to a committee. I believe I've heard that at least a half-dozen or a dozen times now. As far as I'm concerned, I was in private life at the time and did not take any particular interest other than the interest as an ordinary citizen in Bill 163. I've no idea how it was developed or what the process was, and quite frankly I couldn't care less.

The issue that is being totally missed in this is that yes, there is a public aspect to the debate on this bill and that's happening on a daily basis. There's also another aspect to it and that is that the minister came here and explained the bill to the best of his ability and answered questions on it. Perhaps that process should take place at the end of the public process rather than at the beginning, quite frankly, because at that point in time we really don't know what's on people's minds until we've heard from the general public.

I guess what I'm mainly interested in—and this is right in line with what the government's purpose of this bill is, and that's to speed things along and to deal with a cost-efficient method etc etc, and I agree with that—but I would like to know how the larger ministries, that are going to have an impact on the planning that's going to take place in our communities under this Bill 20, are going to be affected one way or the other and to a certain extent how they are going to be involved in it from an administrative viewpoint. That's where my support in this is coming from.

Now, again, Mr Hardeman can disagree with me if he wants, but this is very much like the process we went through on Bill 26 as well. There is a definite attempt, as far as I'm concerned, and I'm trying to look at this in a balance, unbiased sort of way, for ministers of the crown, for whatever reason, not to cooperate with what is happening at the committee level. This is the second committee now that it's happening to as far as I'm concerned, and if that's the way we're going to play the game, then let's get on with it and let's just vote on it and deal with it.

This has got nothing to do directly with expenditure controls. The process that comes out of it may very well end up with a better system for planning for Ontario and as a result of that there could be certain public and private moneys being saved etc, but the bill itself has nothing directly to do—the bill itself doesn't save you any money. The process that comes out of it does.

Ms Churley: Maybe.

Mr Gerretsen: Maybe. That's the concern you're talking about.

There are two ministries here that are directly involved within the planning process. They are going to be circulated with the various planning documents that come out of the municipalities as a result of the new processes that we're putting into place under Bill 20.

If it's being suggested that whatever these people have to say is of no interest to the committee, once the public process or the public presentation process has ended, the I would suggest to you that you're totally wrong in that, but that's my view on it.

The Chair: Ready for the question?

Ms Churley: A recorded vote, please.

Ayes

Churley, Gerretsen, Hampton, Hoy.

Nays

Baird, Galt, Hardeman, Ouellette, Pettit, Smith.

The Chair: By a vote of 6 to 4 the motion fails.

The third motion was the one proposed by Mr Gerretsen.

Mr Gerretsen: I moved this one and I'll speak to it very briefly. In this case, we are not dealing with a government department as such. We are dealing with a quasi-judicial body. The purpose of the motion here is to deal with their administrative procedures, not with the way in which they reach decisions, and I'm going to make this quite clear. I realize that we have to be careful when you're dealing with a judicial or a quasi-judicial body. Obviously the manner in which they decide things—I may have some general inquiries about that, but that's not my main concern.

The issue of appeals to the OMB with respect to minor variances, I think it's safe to say, has been brought up by just about everyone who has commented on that section. All of these people have all had the same comment: Basically they would prefer municipalities not to be the final decider, but rather the OMB. There have been certain comments made with respect to the workload of the OMB as far as minor variances are concerned, and with respect to the length of time that it takes to get a matter heard by the OMB once an appeal has been launched for a minor variance. We've heard everything here from 12 months to four to six months from different presenters.

I'd like to know what the facts are. I would like to have somebody in an administrative capacity from the OMB—maybe its executive director, for example—come here and provide those statistics to us and also make some comment with respect to the notion I sort of floated yesterday: If the concern is to get to the final decision as quickly as possible in minor variance cases, and that's certainly something I'm interested in—I don't think people should have to wait 12 months in a lot of these cases to know exactly what the fate of their application is, or if you're in opposition to it, what the fate of the application is as well—is it possible that the OMB could set up a smaller panel of people—the same people who are there now; I'm not talking about appointing new people—who on a rotating basis would be dealing with the applications, which we heard the other day I think from somebody in most cases take less than a day to hear, to deal with them in a quicker and more efficient fashion?

This is not a government department. No minister is going to hang himself out to be potentially embarrassed by any questions that may be asked. I think it may be something the committee as a whole may be interested in finding out about. I would urge the members of this committee to support the motion.

Ms Churley: I speak in support of the motion. We have to bear in mind, when we sit on these legislative committees, that at the end of the day we will be looking at amendments. I've been in government. I know that the government members are not going to change the main thrust of the bill. That's unrealistic. I suppose I could hope that you could be convinced in the areas I'm most concerned about. But I also know, having been in government, that government members do support or make motions that the opposition will support that make the bill better. I think some very good points have been made by my Liberal colleague that this is an area a lot of concern has been expressed about.

Very few of us on this committee have the background in what can be sometimes a very complicated, very complex area, and if you don't have a background—I have a small background so I tend to understand it overall, but not everything—I think it would be useful, particularly in this area, to have officials come in to be able to answer just routine kind of technical questions that might be able to help us when it comes time to look at amendments in those kinds of technical areas where it actually, even from the government's point of view, could improve the bill. I can't understand that there would be any reason why all members couldn't support this particular resolution.

Mr Hampton: It seems to me the government has staked a lot on saying, "If we push through these amendments and these changes, planning and the planning process will move along more quickly." Then the government says it will be easier to get economic development projects off and running and put the construction industry back to work etc. We've already heard from a number of folks who have been involved in planning from one perspective or another who have said, "Well, it may not be so."

What you may find is that you've introduced a level of ambiguity and vagueness into this whole process such that everything will now be open for interpretation and therefore everything will be open to a fight, and the result will be that processes can and will take a lot longer. We heard from one individual today who said that groups will naturally tend to agglomerate around some of these issues and fight them tooth and nail.

I think it would be wise for the government, as this motion suggests, to have someone from the OMB attend and help us out in terms of whatever information they can provide. You may be right; the government may be right on this. I think you've heard, though, from enough people who carry weight and credibility in terms of planning who have said: "You're not right. This will not speed things up. If anything, it will slow things down and make things more costly and at the end of the day you will end up with bad planning which can cost you megabucks down the road as you try to repair some of the damage done by bad planning." I think it's just prudent to have someone from the OMB attend and help us out before you gamble away a big chunk of the future on something which may be very flawed.

Mr Galt: Certainly I have some empathy in listening to the suggestion. I would have to have more information about procedure with something like OMB. I also just kind of wonder if there's a need to have them come before us. They could have put forth a presentation, or the members of the opposition or third party could have encouraged them to put in a submission and make a presentation as a delegation. I would need to know some of the procedural effect of this committee inviting somebody from the OMB to come before I could vote to support it. Unless somebody has that information for us, I'm not aware of it right now.

Mr Hampton: In reply to Mr Galt, I think you'd find that the OMB would not appear here on its own will, that it would probably take an invitation of this committee. As a quasi-judicial body they would not want to be seen as in some way determining the legislative and consultative process. If an invitation came from this committee specifically along the lines that have been suggested here today, we probably would find some people from the OMB would be willing to come over and enlighten us on some of these issues. I think, just in the interest of keeping the quasi-judicial world separate from the legislative world, they won't do that without an invitation.

Mr Hardeman: I will not be supporting this resolution. The problem I see is that I think all the questions that have been put by the opposition members that they would like answers to could be put on a piece of paper and forwarded to the OMB and that information could be received back.

I have concern, as Mr Hampton mentioned, that they would not appear here on their own. I feel it's inappropriate to request them to be here. The questions would, in all fairness, relate to whether the OMB deemed government policy appropriate. I don't believe it's appropriate to put them in that predicament or that position, to have to comment on whether this will be good for the OMB or bad for the OMB. I think the opposition members would not want to put themselves or the OMB in that position. I suggest that all the questions we have could be put in writing and that we could get responses back to answer the concerns that have been addressed. I will not be supporting the resolution.

Mr Galt: I think in view of the confusion and misunderstanding of what they can or can't do, it would be wise to table this motion for 48 hours. Why can't we table the motion? Can we table it until we have further information in 24 hours?

The Chair: The Chair is at the direction of the committee.

Mr Galt: I think that's in order.

The Chair: The clerk advises me it would take unanimous consent to postpone further consideration of the question.

Mr Gerretsen: Before doing that I want to make it quite clear, just so you know where I'm coming from, that the purpose of requesting the OMB to come before this committee is not to ask them policy advice. I realize full well that policy directions come from the government and from the ministry. The political people are the policymakers, and I certainly wouldn't be asking the OMB to come here and say, "Do you think it's a good idea if we put this in this act or if we put that in that act?" My question was related to some of the comments that were made about the OMB and the length of time it takes to get hearings and that sort of thing. I made it quite clear: It deals with the administrative aspects. The policy advice is being done by the government.

Rather than 48 hours, if you want to get some further input, if you want to table it for 24 hours, let's deal with 24 hours; 48 hours brings us to Thursday and then the only day they could come, I suppose, would be next Monday, because then we're on the road. I've no objection to it being tabled so you can get some further advice on it, but I'm not here to embarrass anybody as far as the OMB is concerned, as far as anybody is concerned, for that matter.

There have been comments made about whether or not the council should be the final decider with respect to the minor variance matters or the OMB. That's a major issue with just about everybody that's addressed it and they all come down on the side that they want the OMB to do it. Then the issue as well is, if we want to speed things along, why does it take them as long to deal with a minor variance as it does to deal with a full-fledged rezoning application, and is there a way in which that can be handled quicker? So I'd like an administrative person here, not a political, appointed person who is now a member or chair of the OMB.

The Chair: Is there any further discussion? There is a suggestion and, as I said, it takes unanimous consent to defer any further discussion. Is there unanimous consent that we defer this? No? Seeing none—

Ms Churley: Till when, tomorrow?

Interjection: There was a suggestion made for 48 hours.

Ms Churley: Why not 24?

Mr Galt: I'm not here tomorrow. That was why I suggested 48, but tomorrow is fine. I think the committee needs to be better informed before they make a decision on this, because there is some merit in what's being suggested; if we have more information, maybe we could make a wiser decision.

The Chair: To perfect the suggestion being put to you, further discussion would be withheld for 24 hours. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr Hampton: At the end of tomorrow?

The Chair: The end of tomorrow? Mr Hardeman indicates he's not prepared to give his consent. Is the committee ready for the question? Any further discussion? All those in favour of the motion?

Mr Gerretsen: Mr Hardeman apparently didn't consent so—

The Chair: That's right. We're dealing with the motion.

Mr Hardeman: I believe that delaying it for 24 hours or 48 hours is not going to change the issue, and I believe it's inappropriate to have the OMB appear before this committee when all the questions that have been put forward can be addressed. If any member of the committee wishes to have them addressed, forward them to the OMB and they will be answered at their earliest possible convenience.

Mr Gerretsen: So you're saying, Mr Hardeman, just so I understand correctly, that the people of the province of Ontario are allowed to come to make a presentation here but a quasi-judicial body of the province—

Interjection.

Mr Gerretsen: That's right. You are in effect saying that the only way we can communicate with those people is strictly by way of letter and you do not want them to appear. I just want to understand that correctly, because that just proves everything I've said about stonewalling earlier.

Mr Hardeman: I would point out that if the OMB wishes to appear before the committee, the committee would hear them, but I don't believe that the request that has been put forward thus far requires any further information than what could be provided, and I don't believe we should proceed with asking them or requesting them to appear before the committee.

Mr Gerretsen: On a point of order, Mr Chair: I haven't been around long enough, but I darn well know that an agency of the government would not come before this committee on its own accord. It would be taking its own life into its hands.

The Chair: Ready for the motion?

Ms Churley: A recorded vote.

Ayes

Churley, Gerretsen, Hampton, Hoy.

Nays

Baird, Galt, Hardeman, Ouellette, Pettit, Smith.

The Chair: By a 6 to 4 vote, the motion fails.

This committee stands recessed until tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock in committee room 2.

The committee adjourned at 1800.

ET L'AMÉNAGEMENT DU TERRITOIRE

Consideration of Bill 20, An Act to promote economic growth and protect the environment by streamlining the land use planning and development system through amendments related to planning, development, municipal and heritage matters / Projet de loi 20, Loi visant à promouvoir la croissance économique et à protéger l'environnement en rationalisant le système d'aménagement et de mise en valeur du territoire au moyen de modifications touchant des questions relatives à l'aménagement, la mise en valeur, les municipalités et le patrimoine.

The Vice-Chair (Mrs Barbara Fisher): Good morning. Seeing a quorum, we'd like to proceed. I do apologize for the delay. Unfortunately, somebody ended up with a battery that was dead and then no car keys, and we have another one who's involved in the weather out there somewhere trying to get here. We didn't have a quorum at 9 o'clock either. We would like to proceed.

WOMEN PLAN TORONTO

The Vice-Chair: I do owe our apologies to our first presenter this morning. Good morning and sorry for the delay. We will proceed with a presentation period of a 25-minute allotment, and if you'd like to make a combination of presentation and question-and-answer, please do so. Welcome to our hearings.

Ms Reggie Modlich: I'm Reggie Modlich, on behalf of Women Plan Toronto, a volunteer organization with over 400 individual and group members and supporters. We assist women to become conscious of their needs in their communities and to speak up on their own behalf. We work to have women's voices heard and our needs met in municipal decisions that affect our lives.

We have been deeply involved in the Sewell commission and its recommendations and are concerned that Bill 20 pushes aside years of struggle and efforts by thousands of people, especially women, to create compact, diversified and caring communities while safeguarding our natural environments. We believe the bill opens the floodgates to unrestrained urban sprawl and exposes our environment to the whims of political discretion. Few areas of government responsibility have to respect public interest more than the policies and processes by which our communities are planned.

Democratic governments differ from authoritarian governments primarily by having to act in the public interest rather than that of a few groups. As we witness bill after bill introduced by this government effectively making the poor poorer, the sick sicker, the weak weaker, and the rich and powerful more wealthy and powerful, we start having serious concerns about which form of government we live under.

For social, economic, demographic and even biological reasons, communities affect women differently and often negatively than other sectors in the population. Women still earn three quarters of what men earn. Although over half of working-age women are in the labour force, we still carry the burden of two thirds of unpaid domestic work.

Two thirds of Canadians over 65 years of age are women and almost half of them live below the poverty line. All this takes place in a context of an astounding amount of violence against women. Over 40% of women over 16 have reported being assaulted by men, and almost 30% of married women state that they've been assaulted by their partners. These factors greatly constrain all aspects of women's lives. Thus, availability, affordability, accessibility and security of housing, services and transportation affect women more than men. The process and regulations that guide the planning of our communities are consequently of critical importance.

We are particularly concerned about Bill 20 reneging on intensification. The Sewell commission laid the basis for planning policies and processes which encouraged compact, comprehensive, lively and productive communities. Provision of hard and soft services, transit and pedestrian movement becomes more efficient, viable and therefore more affordable in such communities. The recently released Blais report estimates savings of $1 billion per year in the GTA alone if communities were built at densities of traditional Toronto neighbourhoods.

Intensification basically means a few more units on a given piece of land. This allows for lower housing construction costs without lowering the building code standards—another proposal by this government. Intensification would therefore place lower-cost housing on the market without compromising quality—particularly important to women. The problem with the slow housing markets today is not the Ontario Building Code or rigorous planning regulations, but truly a terrified workforce uncertain about how long they will have their jobs and how they will be able to feed and shelter their families, and ever-growing numbers of unemployed and elderly as well.

Women Plan Toronto is concerned about the change in the status of accessory apartments. Women, as home-owning widows or single parents or as tenants, greatly benefit from such apartments. For ever more people, and especially women, such units are becoming the only alternative to homelessness and destitution on the streets. Women Plan Toronto has fought for their legalization for almost 10 years. Such apartments were legalized precisely because for years municipal councils had refused to acknowledge and ensure the safety of the estimated 100,000 units that exist. Although the bill legalizes existing units, most municipalities know neither number nor location or condition of these units. Few councils therefore have the incentive, resources or information to develop, let alone equitably apply, the proposed regulations.

Removal of as-of-right permission for secondary units is contrary to the government's own pledge to reduce government regulation and intervention. Such free-market affordable units would dampen the blow of your cuts to cooperative and social housing. They would also help the building industry. Again, economically vulnerable groups, and especially women, will be hurt the most by these changes.

Several policy changes concern us. All policy changes have been rendered considerably less binding by changing "consistent with" to "having regard for." As long as an excuse for non-compliance can be made, policy statements can be circumvented. In addition, most existing provincial policy statements have been so compressed and generalized in the new bill that many specific aspects that have benefited women have been lost or become optional; for example, B policies on economic, community development and infrastructure.

Almost all guidelines for healthy communities have been eliminated, including support for compact communities, mixed uses, lively and safe pedestrian-oriented streets. Instead, the undefined term "cost-effectiveness" is substituted.

The stress on public transit and development densities to make transit cost-effective is reduced. This further restricts the mobility of women since they have less access to cars and are far more dependent on transit than men.

Bill 20 omits the linkage of social and human services with land use planning. We have struggled over 20 years for the acknowledgement of this link. This policy would have required municipalities to consider services such as child care centres, neighbourhood social service centres and women's shelters in their official, secondary and subdivision plans. We had hoped that the Development Charges Act would be broadened to cover capital costs of soft services. This could have enabled municipalities to bring about truly healthy communities to benefit women, children, the elderly and everybody in the community.

Housing policy changes worry us too. They no longer specify affordability criteria or ratios. This opens the door for negotiating away the already minimal requirement to provide 30% of new housing to be affordable and 15% to meet the needs of the lowest 30% income earners. Over half of the female-headed, single-parent families live on low incomes. Thus, women and their dependants will be put at a further disadvantage by this change.

Natural heritage, environment and conservation policies are weakened too. Natural heritage protection guidelines have no longer clear standards and performance criteria. Conservation guidelines have omitted transportation, waste management, site plans, building and infrastructure design. Women take major responsibility for nurturing their families and children, and elderly relatives. We are generally more aware and concerned with potential health problems arising from an endangered natural environment.

Lastly, we are concerned about changes in the planning process. Bill 20 and Bill 26 shorten or eliminate many appeal periods. The ministry gains powers to allow development to bypass normal processes. Such tightening of the time lines makes it more difficult for community organizations and individual citizens to inform themselves, discuss the issues and develop positions and interventions. With their dual and triple roles and safety concerns, women will find it even more difficult to participate.

Local councils obtain greater controls and approval powers. Committee of adjustment decisions can no longer be appealed beyond the local council level to the OMB. Many councils in Ontario are dominated by homeowners who break out in a rash of NIMBY at the mere mention of anything they fear might lower their property values. This has included such proposals as a bus stop in front of their houses; semi-detached dwellings backing on single, detached dwellings; or basement apartments next door. Such attitudes have and will favour low-density, socially manicured urban sprawl, which harms women, other vulnerable groups and of course the environment.

In conclusion, Women Plan Toronto is deeply concerned that the quality of life in our communities will suffer through Bill 20. Issues we have struggled for decades will be rolled back. To protect women and children and many other groups in the population, Women Plan Toronto therefore urges the following:

- (1) Require that the municipal planning be "consistent with" and have not only "regard for" provincial policy statements, to ensure stronger compliance.
- (2) Retain the B policies of Bill 163, particularly regarding intensification, recognition of the social services and land use link, and other qualities of healthy communities, if not as an integral part of the bill then at least as part of implementing guidelines.
- (3) Retain policies and standards for conserving and protecting the natural environment, including the protection of wetlands.
- (4) Retain the clear and simple thrust of Bill 120, permitting accessory apartments in all fully serviced houses.
- (5) Retain the time lines and public participation processes of Bill 163 as well as the possibility of appealing committee of adjustment decisions, if not to the OMB then at least to the upper-tier municipal level.
- (6) Maintain the ratios of the housing policy statements.

We ask you to hear our concerns in the spirit of democracy and compassion and social equity. Thank you.

The Chair (Mr Steve Gilchrist): Thank you very much for your presentation. We have four minutes each per caucus. The questioning will commence with the official opposition.

Mr Pat Hoy (Essex-Kent): I have a question I'd like to ask you. Are you aware of any statistic that would tell me the percentage of women who are widowed within the total population?

Ms Modlich: I'm sure they're in the Women in Canada Statistics Canada report. I could probably dig that up.

Mr Hoy: But you don't have any particular knowledge of it.

Ms Modlich: I don't have it on hand. Actually, yes, there's a whole section there on single women over 65. Now, there are many widows younger than 65, but there is a whole section on that and how their incomes are 15% less than those of their male counterparts, and that's where this 50% living below the poverty line comes from. They're single women's households over 65.

Mr Hoy: The same question could be asked about how many widowers there are in Ontario, or indeed Canada.

Ms Modlich: One third in that case, in that age group.

Mr Hoy: These widows or widowers who have homes with the ability to put in a second unit would, I think, enjoy the opportunity of having someone else in that home—I don't want to use the word as a "companion," but as a security measure for themselves. Would you agree?

Ms Modlich: I believe so, and I think surveys have shown that that's occurring, that in fact the population in those areas where there is a large extent of basement apartments or secondary units does not necessarily increase at all, especially not considering the capacity of that area, but that it's usually underinhabited houses, especially of seniors or of single people who have family-sized dwellings, that are used for that purpose.

Mr John Gerretsen (Kingston and The Islands): Have you noticed a difference in the manner in which these basement unit apartments are kept from a safety viewpoint as a result of the implementation of Bill 120? In other words, within the network that you have, do the people who live in those units feel more secure now that, first of all, they're in legal units, and is there a greater safety standard now than was the case when they were illegal, before the implementation of Bill 120?

Ms Modlich: I feel that sufficient time has not passed to make such a generalization yet. Things just started rolling with municipalities getting a hold and integrating this whole new task. All these illegal units don't come forward by themselves, because obviously it may affect assessment, so it's going to take a considerable amount of time to integrate that.

Ms Marilyn Churley (Riverdale): Thank you for coming down to present to us today. Congratulations on the work that you've done. I know that it's hard for volunteer organizations to analyse these kinds of bills and continually have to come down and speak to them. I think you did a good job.

One of the issues you raised was public participation in the process. I know you're coming at it because of the work that your organization engages in from the women's point of view, but I just wanted to point out to you that there are quite a lot of restrictions on public involvement, which is really alarming.

For instance, public notice and appeal periods are reduced to 20 days for notice of an official plan and for filing an appeal. You know, you add in weekends and holidays and all of that, people can be left with just a couple of weeks to review, analyse and comment on very complicated documents. Government review periods are shortened. Review and approval of an official plan is now 90 days instead of 150, and that was shortened from before, in Bill 163. Public meeting requirements are removed for subdivision plans, and the people who will be entitled to notice that an application has been made, that will be left to be set out in regulation, which of course can be changed any time. And of course I think you mentioned decisions to exempt minor variance from compliance with bylaw can no longer be appealed to the OMB.

There are a lot of things in the bill I don't like, but I'm extremely concerned about cutting off public participation in the process. I'm wondering if you can comment on the impact you think that will have on people.

Ms Modlich: It's quite traumatic. It's already difficult at the best of times, because most organizations have at most monthly meetings. By the time you circulate information and discuss these and come to a decision, two months are over. You know, to operate democratically, it's just not possible to respond on that basis.

Also, of course, developers always have the recourse of waiting longer and have a tacit agreement, if their application is not responded to in the 60 days, if they consent to waiting a bit longer, that's fine. But if they're bent on pushing things through, they can then push things through quickly. Community groups often are not from that vantage point. They're usually in a reactive rather than a proactive relation to a proposal, so deadlines tend to apply to them far more rigorously than the developer, who can say to the municipalities: "I know the deadline has passed. We can wait a bit longer and have things worked out." We have mostly acted at the municipal level as a group, and this is already a very, very difficult scene to intervene, precisely because of the deadlines, and now these time lines tend to more resemble it.

Also, the appeal to council of committee of adjustment applications: I'm really concerned that there needs to be a second level above a local council, because there is such a close relationship usually between these committees and council. They're very much in consent with each other. If somebody has a problem with a committee decision, it's likely they'll have a problem with council too. The same mentality exists in these groupings, because council appoints the committees, and if you don't have at least the upper-level municipal tier to go to to appeal and hope for a little bit of a broader horizon and sense of equity, these committee of adjustment things are just reinforcing the powers that exist already at the local level. Often they're narrow, they're very middle class, and social housing or anything of that nature will be ruled against and hopelessly lost.

The Chair: The questions will now pass to the government benches.

Mr Bruce Smith (Middlesex): How are you this morning, Mr Chair?

The Chair: The throat's better but my tongue isn't working.

Mr Smith: My throat's not.

Thank you very much for your presentation. It was certainly very comprehensive and thorough with respect to the issues that are being presented in the bill.

I just wanted to come back to one point that Ms Churley raised, and that was with respect to minor variance, and you spoke briefly about it. In your view, would it be more appropriate to leave the minor variance appeal process the way it is currently, or alternatively, given the government's positioning on and its desire to streamline the planning process, have you put any thought to what alternative mechanism there might be to deal with appeals dealing with minor variances?

Ms Modlich: I did suggest in the submission that maybe the upper-tier municipal level be at least one of those, an alternative to the OMB. I know that the OMB is overloaded. The alternative conflict resolution process that's been introduced there I think is a real positive thing. Maybe that could happen. Maybe that could happen at the regional or the upper-tier level. But I certainly think the local council is a poor choice for a last decision.

Mr Smith: The issue of public participation you raised and Ms Churley raised again: As someone who has been involved in the planning process—and I'm asking you this from a perspective that I have as a planning practitioner myself—have you found the public participation process an effective process as it is presented today? Do you find people understand and participate in the planning process to the extent they should?

Ms Modlich: No, of course not satisfactorily. But I think the Sewell commission did provide some improvements in that. Again, it's a question of the power structure within municipalities and their approach to public participation that can make a tremendous difference. I think the city of Toronto is probably pretty progressive in innovative and positive changes towards improving public participation under the same legislation that exists for every community. I have participated in smaller communities and I realize how narrow that can be. It can be still, I think, a fairly positive process, but it could be much more improved.

Mr Smith: So perhaps the focus should be more on education and less concern about declining or streamlining time frames, whereby we would see more participation if people understood the process—

Ms Modlich: You need both.

Mr Smith: —and the time frames are really irrelevant.

Ms Modlich: No, I don't think the time frames are irrelevant at all. I think they're still very critical. But you need both the education and the language. That is a pretty formidable thing as well.

The Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation this morning. We appreciate your taking the time to come down and speak to us on this important issue.

WINCH PLANNING AND DEVELOPMENT SERVICES

The Chair: Our next presentation will be from Mr Mel Winch, planning consultant. Good morning, Mr Winch.

Mr Melvin Winch: I want to thank the members of the committee for having the opportunity of being here this morning. It was about one and a half years ago that I made a similar presentation to the standing committee on administration of justice, and that was in connection with Bill 163, better known then as the proposed changes to the Planning Act which originated with the Sewell commission. Now, as then, my remarks will be directed towards one particular section, namely, the approval of what is commonly known as minor variances. I notice the previous deputant also touched on that as well.

As a result of my previous submission and those of others, the government of the day reconsidered the legislation back a year ago and the legislation was not changed dealing with minor variances. I believe that decision was in the public interest and hope that my comments before this committee today will allow you to recommend that the current proposal also be reconsidered.

If my comments and suggestions appear to be self-serving, your impression is correct. A substantial component of my planning practice is assisting with committee of adjustment applications and providing evidence at the Ontario Municipal Board. My remarks to this committee are based not only on this direct and substantial experience, but also as one who has worked in the public sector in senior roles for several municipalities.

Section 26 of Bill 20 repeals the current section of the Planning Act dealing with minor variance applications. The new provisions would permit a council to select one of three options for the approval of minor variance applications. Options 1 and 2 would mean that council or a committee of council in effect would hear the committee of adjustment application and there would be no appeal from such a decision.

Option 3: By this option, council could delegate the authority to a committee of adjustment consisting entirely of non-council members. With this option, the council would enact a bylaw and establish the following review/appeal procedures:

(a) Decide on a case-by-case basis whether to review a decision or forward it to the Ontario Municipal Board as an appeal; or

(b) review all decisions; or

(c) forward all decision as appeals to the OMB. The board would then conduct a hearing as is the present situation.

Under suboptions (a) and (b) the council would review the committee of adjustment decision and confirm, vary or rescind it.

Other than requiring the council to consider all submissions and responses, the new legislation does not specify how the review is to be conducted and this is somewhat disturbing. What is clear is that the Statutory Powers Procedure Act would not apply. Parties would not be entitled to call evidence nor question other parties at the hearing or review.

Currently, decisions of a committee of adjustment can be appealed to the OMB. With the new legislation, the right of appeal will be denied to applicants and objectors. It will be replaced with an optional council review which council may decide to apply under option 3 only, and only if no members of council sit on the committee of adjustment.

The new legislation dealing with minor variances is quite similar to that which originated with the Sewell commission. The commission recommended that appeals of minor variance decisions be heard by the municipal council, but this was later watered down in Bill 163 to an optional review that might occur in limited situations. As I have previously mentioned, the proposals were subsequently withdrawn by the former government.

The proposal to do away selectively with appeals before the OMB and replace them with an optional but limited review of decisions by a municipal council is, in my opinion, unsound for a number of reasons.

The significance of minor variance applications: The Sewell commission stated that minor variances deal with "zoning detail" and issues are "too insignificant" to be dealt with by a provincial appeal body.

The term "minor variance" is not defined but a successful application is required to meet four tests of the Planning Act. In the final analysis, it is judgemental on the part of a committee of adjustment or a municipal board as to whether the tests are met.

The granting or a refusal of a variance to alter, for example, the height, size or placement of a building can be quite significant to both the proponents and community in which the proposed development is situated. While changes in use are usually accomplished through an application to amend the zoning bylaw, they can also be facilitated through the committee of adjustment authority contained in section 45 of the Planning Act.

There are numerous examples of committees granting substantial departures from comprehensive zoning bylaws or even site-specific bylaws that were carefully formulated after consultation with the public. This is often done, I might add, with the blessing of the local councillor, but without the backup staff reports and without full community participation. With the new procedure, the community may lose its existing right of appeal.

It is important that a sound approval and appeal process be in place so that all the relevant issues will be thoroughly canvassed and considered, and a fair and objective decision reached. This will not happen by a review process. It is also important that the process be perceived as fair to all the interests.

While committees of adjustment are governed by the Statutory Powers Procedure Act, hearings tend to be somewhat informal and limited in time. I have never seen an oath administered, evidence led by counsel, nor cross-examination permitted. Committee members are lobbied, particularly by council members, and frequently meet before a hearing is held and arrive at an unofficial decision before hearing all the parties. It is not unheard of for applicants or opponents to say they are going through the motions and they will have their day in court at the OMB.

Under such circumstances, the appeal procedure must not be eliminated.

The municipal council as an alternative is not well suited to consider minor variance applications or review decisions from the committee of adjustment. Councils, for the most part, have legislative and administrative functions to perform, which are based on perceived political mandates. Members of council do not have the time, interest, necessary skills, but most important, the objectivity to deal with appeals of variance decisions.

Elected members of federal, provincial and municipal legislative bodies expect to be lobbied by their constituents and other interest groups. While tradition and law dictate that the courts and tribunals such as the OMB are not to be influenced prior to a hearing being held, it will be difficult, if not impossible, for councillors to avoid being lobbied and coming to a conclusion on a minor variance matter before it is heard.

Such lobbying can also be expected to influence a council in deciding either to review a decision or send it to the municipal board. If council decides to review the case, its decision is also likely to be influenced by lobbying.

Not only is the appeal or review process less meaningful with the new legislation, but it is solely at the option of the council whether it chooses to review committee of adjustment decisions. Where variances are considered by the council or delegated to a committee of council or to a committee of adjustment with at least one member of council, the appeal or review option is not available by the proposed legislation.

Part or all of a committee of adjustment can consist of council members. It is not uncommon for council members individually or collectively to send a recommendation to, appear as a deputant before, or appeal a decision of the committee of adjustment. In such circumstances, in particular, it is not possible for a council to be objective and be expected to deal fairly with the review of decisions. Council should not be judging the decisions of those to whom it delegated its authority.

If a council selects option 3, it can give itself the authority to review decisions on a case-by-case basis or forward the case to the OMB.

The public will not know in advance the process by which minor variance applications will ultimately be decided. Two similar proposals, for example, could be decided in one case by the council and in the other case by the OMB.

The public has the right to know ahead of time that the planning process operates by definitive and consistent rules.

Many minor variance applications involve a concurrent application to sever property into two or more parcels. Depending on the option council selects, appeals of minor variances may no longer be heard by the municipal board. The board will, however, continue to hear appeals relating to severances or consents. A situation whereby minor variance decisions may not be appealed or can only be reviewed by council, but the severance decision can be appealed and heard by the board, is confusing, inefficient and wasteful of resources. The same development proposal could lead to inconsistent results: one decision for the severance, one decision for the minor variance. Where does the proponent go?

If a proponent receives a negative decision from a council, committee of council or committee of adjustment, and if his review by council is unsuccessful, he still has the option of submitting a rezoning application for the same proposal and having the appeal ultimately heard by the municipal board.

Removing the right of appeal to the OMB for minor variance applications will likely increase the number of rezoning applications and appeals. This is counter-productive and is not the intent of the new legislation.

On the other hand, if an opponent of a proposal is not able to convince the decision-maker of his position, he may not, depending on the option selected by council, have the opportunity to take the matter to the OMB. This is fundamentally unfair.

If a council decides to refer minor variance decisions, either selectively or routinely to the municipal board, it could be faced with substantial fees or costs imposed by the board. This, in itself, could serve as a deterrent for selecting this option. On the other hand, council could attempt to recover such costs by increasing minor variance application fees and/or by attempting to recover their costs from the party who makes the appeal. This could discourage development initiatives or a party from pursuing his objection to a decision.

The Sewell commission's recommendation, which is more or less reflected in the new legislation, has been driven to a large degree by the commission's other recommendations which would see the municipal board take on additional responsibilities. There is also a legitimate concern with the excessive time it takes for appeals to be heard—no doubt about this. The appeal process should be concluded in a considerably shorter period of time, and there can be no doubt that the municipal board is overburdened. Nevertheless, minor variances should not be trivialized and removing appeals from the jurisdiction of the board is not the answer.

Minor variance appeals should, in my opinion, be continued and they deserve to be treated with the same degree of importance and impartiality as do appeals of official plan, zoning, subdivision, severance and site plan control matters. This should go hand in hand with efforts to reduce the number of appeals by increasing mediation and by screening of appeals and by arranging for hearings expediting decisions within reasonable time frames.

This can best be accomplished by strengthening the resources of the municipal board. The highly politicized environment of a municipal council is not an appropriate forum to review appeals.

The Ontario Municipal Board has well served the residents of this province in acting as an impartial and fair decision-maker in planning and land use disagreements and disputes. If the government wishes to review the desirability of maintaining an appeal procedure and role of a body such as the municipal board, I would suggest with respect it should do this systematically and not arbitrarily decide to eliminate one type of important land use decision from the jurisdiction of the board.

I thank you for your patience and having the opportunity to speak to you today. I'd be pleased to answer any questions that you may have.

Ms Churley: Mr Winch, thank you very much for your presentation. It's very clear and written in plain language and could be an educational tool for anybody, I think, who doesn't understand this process. It's very clear that you've had a lot of experience in the field.

I couldn't agree with you more when you talk on page 5 about municipal councils not being appropriate review bodies. I think I heard my friend from Kingston muttering along in agreement on that one. It's not because you're saying that municipal councillors are corrupt in any way, but they are politicians. I have been—mind you, for a very short time—on city council and know exactly what you mean and understand the implications of council. I would expect that councils wouldn't want to be put in that position.

I wonder if you could tell me—I suppose I should actually be asking government members themselves, the minister—why they've chosen to do this, given that as you know, as you said, it was recommended by the Sewell commission and then we were convinced as a government to back off from that. What's this all about? Is it about trying to speed up the system by going about it, in this case, in a wrong-headed way?

Mr Winch: I think there are two motives behind the legislation, Ms Churley, one of which is to speed up and expedite and streamline the process and I can't disagree at all with that situation. I'm suggesting, as one way of doing it, obviously to pre-screen some of the appeals, which the board is now doing, attempting mediation to reduce the number of appeals and therefore provide more timetable, more schedule for the board to deal with applications more quickly.

The second motive, I believe, is probably trying to return decision-making to the local level. I don't disagree with that either. I think the grass roots is the appropriate place for decisions to be made. We are talking, however, here about an appeal, an appeal procedure. I have no problem with a committee of adjustment dealing with the initial application, hearing the application, but we must understand that at the local level there are these political motivations which influence decision-making.

When push comes to shove and when the decisions finally must be arbitrated, and the name of the game is land use planning and good planning, it really must be ruled at that point and put into the lap of an appellate body such as the OMB.

I think there are two reasonable motivations, but I think the second motivation is somewhat faulty in terms of how things really work, perhaps at the municipal level in terms of appeals.

Mr Bill Murdoch (Grey-Owen Sound): Thank you for your submission. I'm certainly glad that you're up front and said it was self-serving. I can see that and I think this is the reason why, though, minor variances aren't being sent to the OMB, because of people in your profession who sometimes can drag these things out. It takes too long for development to take place and I think this was the problem.

The only thing I can agree with you—maybe severances shouldn't be there either—but I would go the other way and say maybe they don't need to go to the OMB because a lot of people use this process to drag out development. I think this is what's happened in Ontario and this is what's slowed down development.

I would just like to ask you what your idea would be of what elected councils are actually for. We do elect people to make decisions. Maybe you disagree with that, but I would like to know why you'd say we elect councils.

1000

Mr Winch: I have no problem with council making decisions, Mr Murdoch. What I'm suggesting is that the total planning process must be considered. If, after these many years in this province, decisions should be taken philosophically not to permit appeals from local planning decisions, I can live with that, but I'm suggesting that to make that systematic, make it across the board.

Mr Murdoch: I could agree with you—

Mr Winch: Don't differentiate minor variances from zoning, official plan matters and subdivisions, because minor variance applications, in my experience, can be just as significant as those other matters.

Mr Murdoch: I'd like to disagree on that, but I think there could be some more maybe put in there and not appealed; I could agree with that. We could put some as the severance. Again, though, I think that's why we elect councils and that's what we have the democratic process for, and those are their decisions.

Mr Winch: The difficulty at the council level is, it's very difficult to set up the procedure, put the apparatus in place for a full hearing to get all the facts before the council. Even at public hearings, time is very limited and councils tend to be rushed. They have lots on the agenda for that evening, even at public hearings. It's very difficult to ask questions of other witnesses, of other people who make presentations. This, to me, is very critical, which is not occurring now at the council level.

Mr Murdoch: Maybe in some places, obviously in the ones that you've been in, but I've seen where they have. So again, maybe some of the experiences you've had have been wrong, but I think councils do that, so I guess we have a philosophy difference.

Mr Gerretsen: First of all, sir, I think this is an excellent presentation. Having been involved for 25 years at the municipal level and looking at this whole problem from a municipal level, from the applicants' level and from the public's level—I've represented all sides at various times—you've hit the nail right on the head, that it's an appeal we're talking about here. It would be like making a municipal council the adjudicating body to deal with bylaw enforcement etc. We have judges to do that. The real problem here, and I agree with the government's attempt to try to speed up the process—that's what this is really all about. How can we deal with minor variances at the OMB level a heck of a lot quicker than with gigantic rezoning applications and official plan amendments?

You may be interested in knowing that yesterday we put a motion before the committee in which we basically asked the OMB to appear before us to give us information from an administrative level as to how that could be done. That's where the crux of the problem is—I totally agree with you—and the government members voted against that. They don't want to hear from the OMB. They said that if the OMB wanted to appear, it should have applied just like everybody else, which I checked out last night. It's absolutely absurd for an agency of the government to in effect ask to make a presentation here without it being requested to do so. It would be highly inappropriate to do so.

I'm a great believer in municipal councils, by the way, and in municipal decision-making, but we are talking here about an independent appeal. We should not just be looking at this problem from just a municipal council's viewpoint but also from the general public's viewpoint and from the applicant's viewpoint. Those individuals and organizations which are part of the municipality most of the time have rights as well. Do you have any comment on that, sir?

Mr Winch: I think you've supported what I've said to a certain extent, but I have no difficulty with council dealing, as Mr Murdoch said, with planning issues, providing a forum is established, that all the facts be put on the table, that there's a proper consideration of the issues and an informed decision is made.

There are many motivations that enter into any decision, and you are correct: In terms of the public's perception of things, it's important for them to believe they've got their day in court. It's important to actually be in attendance, so I think that comment is a fair comment.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Winch, for fighting the traffic to come down and see us this morning and making your presentation.

WEST SCARBOROUGH COMMUNITY LEGAL SERVICES

The Chair: Our next presentation will be from West Scarborough Community Legal Services. Good morning.

Ms Sheeba Sibal: Good morning. My name is Sheeba Sibal. I'm a community legal worker at West Scarborough Community Legal Services, a non-profit organization which provides free legal aid and advice to low-income people who live within our catchment area, which is west Scarborough. We are bounded by Victoria Park on one side and Midland on the other, going up to Steeles and down to the lake.

Today I will be talking only on the aspect of Bill 20 which deals with two units in a house, more popularly known as basement apartments or accessory apartments.

We work closely with tenants, and prior to the passage of Bill 120, which Bill 20 seeks to rescind completely, we found in our experience that it was very difficult to advise tenants who were living in second units because second units were illegal in Scarborough, as in many municipalities. When a tenant had a problem with the landlord not fixing the place, not maintaining it up to health and safety standards, the question was: Does the tenant want to save his home or save his life? Basically, it boiled down to that, if it was a health and safety issue. If the landlord refused to do any repairs, then the recourse the tenant had would be to call the property standards to make the landlord do the repairs. If the landlord refuses to follow the work order, property standards can just close the unit because it is illegal, period; the tenant loses the house. If the tenant chose to go to court, to get the court to enforce his or her legal rights, the courts had two views. Most of the decisions in the courts were that because second units were illegal, therefore not protected under the Landlord and Tenant Act, tenants lost the house, their home, basically.

With Bill 120, that issue was resolved because across the board, with certain exceptions, most second units were made legal. From the side of the homeowners we found also that those homeowners who did want to get their houses checked out to see if things were okay and wanted a second unit for a second income or a supplementary income would fear to call the city because that meant they would get a notice to shut it down. With Bill 120, the situation had become clearer and that fear had gone. Now Bill 20 comes and rescinds Bill 120.

I'd like to examine the impact of the provisions of Bill 20 in the light of the commonsense approach and the philosophy of less government, which this government says is its cornerstone.

It is a commonsense view that simple laws and laws which reduce complications are the best. However, Bill 20 will complicate matters for tenants, homeowners, municipalities, courts and legal clinics. It will increase the paperwork for homeowners and will lead to more government instead of less. Let's see how.

With the implementation of Bill 20 there will be four categories of homes or houses created, which could be legal or illegal, depending on when they were constructed, when the permit for construction was issued and in which municipality that particular second unit is situated.

Under this bill, those units which existed prior to November 16 will be deemed to be legal, provided they were legal under Bill 120. That's the grandfathering clause you have. Those units which were under construction or were constructed after November 16, 1995, but on the basis of an unrevoked permit which was given prior to November 16, will also be deemed to be legal, again provided they met the requirements of Bill 120. The status of those units which are being constructed or have been constructed on the basis of permits given after November 16, 1995, we don't know. That will depend on the interpretation of the courts, because if a municipality cannot deny an applicant a permit, since Bill 20 is not yet law, Bill 120 still prevails. The legality of those units which will come into existence after the passage of Bill 20 will depend upon the municipality permitting the units under the power given under Bill 20, which is, if the municipality wishes to allow you to have a second unit, then it will be legal. If you build it without permission, it will not be legal.

Apart from this, Bill 20 gives power to the municipalities to get these units registered. The wording is "may register." It doesn't say that the municipality will have to make sure that these units are registered. It also gives power to the municipality to make such bylaws to enforce registration, to see that compliance is made to property standards. They can also fix a one-time registration fee. 1010

Let's see how this impacts on the tenants, homeowners, municipalities, courts and legal clinics.

Tenants: Let's talk about tenants first, since we represent tenants most of the time. The biggest issue we see with tenants is that at this point in time there are not many vacancies, which is well known. It's less than 1%. So one of the avenues for a tenant to find a home would be in a second unit.

After Bill 20, the tenant goes to the landlord, seeks to rent the place, wants to be sure that this particular unit is legal and will have to ask several questions to find out whether or not this unit is legal. The landlord would probably just refuse this person. He's being too nosy; he knows his rights too much maybe. We don't know, but from experience we know that the less the tenant asks, the more chances the tenant has to get a place.

The second problem: Once in the unit, if he has a problem and does not know whether this unit is legal, the tenant is again going to fear whether or not he should call the city to see to it that the place is in good state of repair, that the landlord is made to repair the unit or keep it up to health and safety standards.

The other problem the tenant may face is that in some wards units may be permitted, in some wards units may not be permitted, but there's nothing to stop landlords from making units without permission. So how is a tenant to find out in which ward it's legal and in which ward it's not legal? It's going to lead to too much confusion. It's leading to more complications.

Homeowners: Under Bill 20, if the municipality chooses to get the units registered, the landlord will have to register it, but the landlord will have to show that the unit existed prior to November 16, 1995. How's he going to show it? There has to be some procedure. Municipalities are going to have their own requirements. Every municipality may have a different requirement. If a homeowner happens to have homes in different municipalities, what is he going to do? He'll be dealing with several municipalities with different sets of criteria to prove that his unit was there before November 16, 1995.

If his unit doesn't get registered and he has to appeal, the only recourse is that he goes to the Ontario Court (General Division). Going to court is not a cheap remedy. If a homeowner only owns one home and is trying to rent out the basement where he or she lives, it's going to be too expensive. It may not even be worth doing it.

The other aspect which we see is of a prospective home buyer. In this market it's not easy for someone to buy a house. A prospective home buyer may be willing to invest in a house if there's a chance of getting a supplementary income to pay off the mortgage. That could come from a second unit. But if this is the procedure, if this is what he has to go through, the homeowner may or may not be able to get a second unit legalized in his home, and that will rule out that possibility too.

The fourth problem that we see is setting up registries in different municipalities which will have the power to impose different standards and bylaws. That means another set of bureaucrats that a homeowner with properties in different municipalities will have to deal with. This is not less government, but more.

Municipalities: If municipalities decide to get the second units registered, they may have to appoint a registrar to register two units. To enforce the relevant bylaws, they will also have to designate one or more persons, as set out in section 59 of Bill 20.

In this era of budget cuts and reduction of deficits, where does the province expect the municipalities to come up with the money to pay for these persons? It can only mean that either the municipality will not pass any bylaw for implementing section 59 of Bill 20 or will divert the personnel from other required services to effectively enforce the bylaws.

If the municipalities do not implement section 59 of Bill 20, the whole purpose of rescinding Bill 120 and grandfathering the second units in existence prior to November 16, 1995, becomes redundant. If the municipalities pass the bylaws but do not assign a person or persons to enforce them, again the whole purpose of Bill 20 becomes redundant and is an exercise in futility. What is the point of wasting taxpayers' money on a toothless and ineffective bill? This goes against all common sense too.

Courts: Tenants living in second units and landlords of such two-unit homes are bound to go to court under the Landlord and Tenant Act when the disputes arise. However, now there will be another issue the courts will have to decide, that is, whether the second unit is legal. The courts will have to decide this in those cases where municipalities have not set up a registry for two-unit homes. This translates into more time taken for trials of such cases. This will be particularly true of second units which are being constructed or have been constructed on the basis of permits given before November 16 but revoked because of the bill, or permits given after November 16.

Again, with the pending budget cuts which this provincial government is set on, the courts will be expected to do more with less. The officials of the courts will have to find a way out. In such a scenario, denial of access to the justice system to poor tenants or to small homeowners is not only conceivable but is a reality. This is not simplifying matters. Bill 20 is complicating it.

Legal clinics: After the passage of Bill 20, if a tenant calls on us to find out their rights to enforce the Landlord and Tenant Act, especially in relation to health and safety and property standards issues, we will have to first find out whether the unit is legal. This is not going to be an easy task, as tenants will probably not know. In such a situation, our mandate to help a poor tenant will become more difficult and time-consuming. To get the relevant information, we'll have to spend more time getting details before we can give any advice. We will not be able to advise or help tenants trying to enforce the property standards, health and safety bylaws, as that may lead to the tenants losing their homes. This is going to lead to dangerous conditions, including an increased risk of death by fire.

There are other issues I would like to address too. The first is discrimination. Blanket power given to municipalities to permit or not to permit the existence of two-unit houses as and when they please, without any guidelines, can be open to blatant abuse. This bill gives too much power in the hands of a local government which can be swayed by people with the NIMBY syndrome or who have racist attitudes or are merely prejudiced against the poor.

In Scarborough, Mr Wolfgang Droege, a known white supremacist, contested elections from ward 1. At the time of the last municipal elections, there were 18,497 registered voters. Mr Droege obtained 802 votes. Mr Harvey Barron, who won the election, obtained 4,915 votes. The fact that Mr Droege contested the elections and obtained 802 votes shows us that there are people who unequivocally support the views of white supremacists. There are probably more than 802 people in ward 1 and other wards who hold similar views. Such persons can raise vocal objections to neighbours who may want to put in second units merely because their colour of skin is different.

To support my point that racism exists, I will quote some observations of a particular community group of Scarborough. I quote from the submission to the standing committee on general government regarding Bill 120 by the Scarborough Access to Permanent Housing Committee, dated February 8, 1994. On pages 7 and 8, under the subheading "Discrimination," it was stated as follows:

"Our experience has led us to a more sinister aspect to the issue of legalization of accessory apartments. It is the issue of discrimination that verges on a level of defamation and hate. On this issue we have encountered racism, classism, sexism, homophobia, anti-tenant and anti-youth expressions.

"We have encountered opponents of legalizing accessory units who proffer the cultural background and colour of one's skin as reasons to prohibit accessory apartments. A deputant at a Scarborough council meeting on the matter stated that he did not want coloured people living next to him in a basement apartment. Council did not challenge nor reprimand him for these statements.

"In a separate meeting, a member of Scarborough council said to a delegation which included Scarborough Access to Permanent Housing Committee members that he did not feel that certain people of African origin would 'fit into' his 'community' and that if basement apartments were legalized, his 'community' would be overrun by such persons."

Obviously, if we have councillors in Scarborough who hold such views and we have residents with such attitudes, the fear that powers granted to the municipalities without any guidelines are open to abuse is valid and real. This may be true for many other municipalities as well.

Shortage of housing. In a February 1996 article by business reporter John Spears in the Toronto Star, it was pointed out that there is going to be a serious shortage of rental apartments in the next two years. The vacancy rate at present is less than 1%. No new rental apartments have been built for a long time.

According to Greg Lampert, who prepared a study on rental housing policy last fall for the Ontario government, 22,000 condominiums flooded the rental market in the late 1980s. Then the Ontario government financed a big wave of non-profit construction in the early 1990s. However, both of these sources have dried up. According to Mr Lampert, new owners are buying up the condominium surpluses and taking them out of the rental market, and this government has stopped funding non-profit housing.

In light of the above, it would have made more common sense if this government had encouraged another private source of housing, that is, second units in already existing homes. It would have made more common sense if this government had made provisions in Bill 20 encouraging homeowners and municipalities to create second units. This could have been done by:

Not repealing the provisions of Bill 120 relating to two-unit houses;

Laying down time lines for the municipalities to get units registered;

Ensuring that the least amount of red tape would be required for such units to be registered, either at the request of the landlord or the tenant;

Encouraging and supporting municipalities to direct appropriate resources to ensure the adherence to property standards, health and safety standards bylaws in such second units;

Amending the Planning Act appropriately so that the municipalities will have greater power to readily recover the costs they incur repairing private residential premises in case of non-compliance of work orders; and

Amending the Planning Act appropriately so that the municipalities can exercise collection procedures available to creditors under the Execution Act, including those procedures permitting the auction of the property.

Job creation and economic development. It is the opinion of financial analysts that investing in a home for the purpose of investment to build equity is a thing of the past. Buying a home in this economy is still a distant dream. It is a fact that sales of new and used homes are low. There is at this time no incentive to prospective home buyers to buy.

One incentive to a prospective new home buyer to take a plunge in the housing market in an area of his or her own choice could be the prospect of financing part of the mortgage by renting a portion of the house. This will not only boost new home construction but also encourage renovations in older homes. This translates into job creation and economic development. However, the introduction of Bill 20 has done away with this source. This goes completely against the government's objective of job creation and economic development. It seems that Bill 20 sacrifices common sense at the altar of political expediency.

In summary, we recommend: The provisions of Bill 120 relating to two-unit houses should not be repealed by Bill 20; and the provisions of Bill 120 should be strengthened by amending Bill 20 to encourage single-family homeowners to bring up to standard second units and build new second units and bring them into the rental market.

The above can be achieved by:

—Laying down time lines for the municipalities to get the second units registered. That will ensure that the municipality knows where these units exist and will know how to enforce the bylaws.

—Ensuring that the least amount of red tape would be required for such units to be registered, either at the request of the landlord or the tenant. The reason we recommend tenants also is that sometimes landlords who know their units don't meet standards do not want to incur the expense and are using that particular unit just for purposes of making more and more money without investing in it. A tenant will be more interested in getting it registered so that he or she can be protected under the Landlord and Tenant Act and get the property standards bylaws and health and safety bylaws enforced.

—Encouraging and supporting municipalities to direct appropriate resources to ensure the adherence to property standards and health and safety standards bylaws in such second units. This is again to address the issue which a lot of municipalities are raising, that second units are dangerous, are fire traps. Yes, they are fire traps, because property standards and health and safety issues have not been addressed in these units. One way would be to get the municipalities to have the resources to do it.

—Amending the Planning Act appropriately so that the municipalities will have greater power to readily recover the costs they incurred repairing private residential premises in cases of non-compliance of work orders. That has been another complaint of municipalities, that if they do enter the premises and do the repairs, they cannot recover the moneys. Therefore, we're saying amend; give them the power so they can do it and recover. How they can recover is by amending the Planning Act so that the municipalities can exercise collection procedures available to creditors under the Execution Act, including those procedures permitting the auction of the properties.

The above recommendations we believe will benefit the community at large, including homeowners, tenants, the construction industries, the unemployed and the economy of Ontario.

The Chair: An extensive presentation. We actually have less than a minute per caucus. I don't know if any of the members wish to ask questions. We'll start with the government members, if you do, but please respect the time lines of the other groups coming after.

Mrs Barbara Fisher (Bruce): Thank you very much for coming before us this morning. I represent a rural riding where we also have a need for second-unit apartments. We also have municipally elected councils who have shown responsible decision-making in the handling of these. We have tools available in the Planning Act, we have the official plans, municipal bylaws, the site plan agreements, plans for subdivision; we also have fire regulations etc. The municipalities would have an option to register these units as well. Why do you feel Scarborough council can't do that as well?

Ms Sibal: Because of the way Scarborough council has behaved in the past. I pointed out the quote which I read. One particular Scarborough councillor certainly had views which said he did not want African people in his community. We don't know how many other councillors have that view. We know that Mr Wolfgang Droege contested elections from Scarborough; 802 people supported him. They were there and they voted for him. We don't know how many more people have similar views. We fear.

If the council is given the power to deny or to give permission at the whim of neighbours, that is not going to be a fair process. There is no guideline as to what procedure this council is going to follow to grant a second unit. Under Bill 120, guidelines were laid. Zoning bylaws permitting, if the parking space was enough, if the height was the right amount, second units had to be permitted. There could not be a denial of making a second unit.

No one is forcing anyone to make a second unit. If the homeowner or the landlord thinks it's too much of a problem, they're not going to make it. But when the process comes to the municipal council where a homeowner has to go and ask permission to make a second unit, where it can be brought forward and the neighbours who raise objections can say no to it, and the councillor refuses, for political expediency or for personal attitudes, or the council refuses, it will not be a fair process.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for your presentation. We don't have much time, but I would like to make a comment. I find your submission, when you're talking about discrimination, to be very sad indeed. It's an appalling situation, to say the least.

I also want to confirm with you that I too believe that having a home in this area is a dream for some people. I have had people in the area tell me that themselves, that they have absolutely no hope of ever being able to afford a home in the markets that exist. You offer an excellent overview of the situation in regard to the topic here and you offer substantive solutions, and I thank you.

Mr Howard Hampton (Rainy River): Maybe you can help me out on this. It's my understanding that at the time Bill 120 became law it was discovered there were about 100,000 illegal second apartments in the province.

Ms Sibal: Yes. It was discovered prior to Bill 120 and that was, we hope, one of the reasons, because it made no sense to have those units illegal. They were there; they were in existence. People were living there in unsafe conditions.

Mr Hampton: So the reality was that municipalities were in effect allowing, or ignoring the existence of 100,000 illegal units. In some cases those units didn't meet the fire code, didn't meet electrical codes and didn't meet the building code.

Ms Sibal: Yes.

Mr Hampton: If this legislation passes and we go to the scenario you have painted for us here, do you think illegal second units will disappear? Do you think there will be more illegal second units? What do you think will happen?

Ms Sibal: My personal opinion is that when people need houses, when people need to live somewhere, they're going to look for places to find it. Homeowners who have the place will produce the place for them to live in. In this economy, when the vacancy rate is less than 1%, where are these people going to go? One of the resources will be living in second units and homeowners will make them available. Illegal units will come into being, not because people don't want to live in them but because the government says they are illegal.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Sibal. We appreciate you taking the time to make a presentation before us this morning.

Ms Churley: I just have another question between presentations here. Even though I see that Dr Galt, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Environment and Energy, is not here, I'm wondering if his office has tabled the list of stakeholders he met with yesterday which I requested after he brought it up?

The Chair: The clerk indicates he has not received anything as yet.

C.N. WATSON AND ASSOCIATES LTD

The Chair: Our next presentation will be from C.N. Watson and Associates. Good morning.

Mr Cameron Watson: I would like to take perhaps half the time to walk you through the presentation that I think you all have before you. First of all, a little bit of information as to who we are.

We are a small land economics consulting firm, 10 people, Toronto-based. We've been in operation for 14 years. We have done this kind of work for some 250 Ontario municipalities, school boards and utilities, as well as a couple of dozen land developers and some cities across Canada. As you can see from page 2 of the presentation, there is a list of 146 municipalities and school boards for which we have done full Development Charges Act studies over the last five years. I think it is therefore fair to say we know something about that particular topic.

What we are seeking to do today is to provide constructive input to this committee on a very limited segment of Bill 20, that is sections 47 to 57 and section 74. Those are the sections that deal exclusively with amendments to the Development Charges Act. The submission is organized into four parts: The first touches on the purpose of the bill. The second is asking and answering the question, are the problems the bill addresses real? Then it looks at, what does the bill change? The fourth is, what new problems is the bill creating? It's creating problems today because it's proposing retroactive legislation. The third chapter is in the form of a very brief conclusion.

Let me start with the question, are the problems that the bill is addressing real? The intent of the bill, as I understand it in the Development Charges Act part of the bill, is to remove an obstacle to growth. The obstacle is presumably a development charge that is too high or is going to be increased so that it will be too high, and that's retarding housing development, or development in general, and that is not doing everything we can to stimulate employment. We certainly support that objective without question.

The underlying assumption for introducing close ministerial control over any changes in municipal development charges bylaws is, as I say, presumably that the charges are too high and they're moving upward and this is needed to curb that.

If you would look at figure which is pages 5 and 6, that summarizes some research we have just conducted. We've triple-checked this and we have extensive background to support this, and what it does is it looks at what has happened to development charge amounts in 54 of the largest urban centres in Ontario. As you can see, we have the large urban centres from virtually all of the regions, and over on the right-hand side at the bottom we've added a number of large centres across the province.

The table is set up in five columns, and from the left we have "Outright Decline in DC." Those are municipalities that during the past four years have actually decreased the charge. The charge today in absolute terms is lower than the charge it was in 1991. You can see who they are, and at the bottom right-hand side you'll see that 12 of the 54 have actually decreased their charge voluntarily during that period.

The next column is "Decrease in Real Terms"; for example, those who chose—once again voluntarily—not to index their charge each year. That's permitted and invited by the statute. The purpose of indexing, of course, is to ensure that the purchasing power of the development charge remains constant as construction prices go up. Obviously, you need to compensate for that. There are 22 of the 54 municipalities that in the interests of stimulating development have chosen not to index the charge, or have not indexed it each and every year, so that their development charge in real terms, in real purchasing power terms, has declined over the last four years.

Then you have the middle column, "No Change Other than Indexing." That literally is no change in the real magnitude of the development charge. We have 15 in that category.

That only leaves five of the 54 major municipalities in Ontario that actually, in real terms, have increased their development charges in the past four years. In three cases these are relatively small charges: Vaughan, Cambridge and Sarnia. In a couple of those cases, the increase between 1991 and 1996 simply occurred because they phased in the new charge that they adopted in 1991. They didn't put it in place fully at one point in time. In the interest of assisting development they phased it in, so it's a little higher in 1996 than it was in 1991.

There are larger increases in two of the municipalities: Oakville and London. We did both of those studies. In the case of London, that charge was done in close concert with the development community and it was not appealed; it was deemed to be reasonable. In the case of Oakville, the charge was appealed but the amount eventually arrived at was arrived at through a settlement.

My point from all of this is that this material, and we could go on and add to it, does not suggest to me, I don't think it would suggest to anyone, that we have an unreasonable situation in Ontario in terms of how municipalities have been handling development charges. I don't see any sign of abuse of power or any absence of concern for development.

The next question is then, why did development charges increase so much between, say, 1985 and 1991? They did increase substantially. In some cases they tripled from a relatively low base. There are four very good reasons why they increased during that period, and those are mentioned on page 8.

First of all, inflation was 28-36%, depending on the index you use. Housing prices during that interval went up 70%. I think that's beside the point in a way, but it's background.

The second point, and the point that is often missed by those who are critical of development charge size, is that there was a statutory requirement for costs to be moved from development agreements into the development charges regime.

Subsection 45(1) coupled with subsection 3(7) of the Development Charges Act required that to be done. It prevented a municipality from using a subdivision agreement to ask a developer to pay for work external to the plan of subdivision, and it prevented a municipality from asking a developer to pay for oversize works within a plan of subdivision, so you $2,000, $3,000 per dwelling unit removed from one pocket and put into the other pocket, namely, on to the development charges. You had development charges moving up for that reason—not one dime of additional cost attributed to that; it's just moved from one area of collection to a second.

The third reason is that the Development Charges Act considerably broadened the services for which charges could be collected. In particular, schools and hydro facilities, and also rolling stock and furniture and equipment and so on, were explicitly added within the act, and municipalities and school boards have merely proceeded to recover growth-related costs in that way. Once again, I don't see any sign from what occurred of unreasonableness or abuse of power; it's simply municipalities following through on the legislation that's been provided to them.

The third point is, are development charges already unacceptably high? I won't spend much time on pages 9 and 10, but it seems to me that there are at least half a dozen fundamental questions that have to be asked, ought to be asked in that regard in terms of looking at development charges as a user-pay, benefits-received type of system, and examining closely what happens if you reduce the charges by $1,000 per unit, for example, or you increase them, whether there's a magic number that development charges shouldn't go beyond etc.

Our point here is that before you make fundamental changes to what we are characterizing as one of the most reasonable and thorough statutes of its type in North America, the Development Charges Act, it would seem to me that you would want to answer, have answers to these questions, and I don't believe that these questions have been properly addressed and they ought to be.

Are development charges likely to increase in the future? I think there are a number of reasons—particularly when you talk about services other than sewer, water and roads, namely, recreation and parks and administrative facilities and libraries and that kind of thing—for believing that development charges are going to fall, have been falling and will fall for those categories, for the simple reason that the act requires charges to be based upon service standards and the service standards are falling.

The service standards are falling because development is decreasing, because grants are decreasing, because affordability is decreasing, and frankly because a number of municipalities are becoming even more reasonable in terms of how they address all this. They are concerned about economic growth and ensuring they capture their share of it, and they are looking very carefully at the standards for which they are recovering development charges.

For the studies we've been doing, we are seeing in many instances those service standards moving down and that inevitably will bring down development charges. It's not bringing down development charges, however, because all of that has been brought to a complete and utter stop by this bill, Bill 20, because Bill 20 says that retroactively to November 15, sections 3, 4 and 5 of the Development Charges Act will be repealed and that the minister has the right to approve or not approve of any change.

What that says to municipalities is that there's no point in doing anything right now, because whatever they do right now will be rendered ultra vires by the passage of this particular bill, or rendered null and void, I guess, by the passage of this particular bill: "There's no point in proceeding at this point in time. We might as well just wait."

The other half, and I guess the answer to that question is that certainly as MTO grants are with withdrawn and other grants are withdrawn, there will be some upward pressure on the cost of hard services. But that's an inevitability. That has to be dealt with by municipalities in terms of how they're going to finance growth-related capital costs of sewer, water and roads. I don't see any signs of unreasonableness in the approach being adopted, but the funding has to be found and development charges have to play a reasonable role.

Another question is, have municipalities been failing to account properly for development charges spending? One section of the Development Charges Act amendments of this bill puts in place the requirement that municipalities report annually on expenditures, revenues and credits. We're simply making the point here that that's a desirable thing to do, but in our view it isn't going to change anything. That already is a municipal requirement. It's in the regulation. It's something the municipalities, in the vast majority of cases, are all doing. It certainly doesn't hurt to move it from the regulation to the act to give it a little more prominence, but I just wanted to make the point that municipalities are very careful about how they are reporting on the use of their development charges. We have a couple of examples of the sorts of statements produced annually by municipalities in appendix A.

On page 12, what does the bill change? I think I've already touched on that. Actually, on page 13, indented, we have a summary.

On page 14, what new problems is the bill creating? I have touched on those, and I think they go to the retroactivity clause. What's occurring is that the bill has not been proclaimed so the minister does not currently have development charges bylaw approval powers, but when the act does come into force, the sections of the Development Charges Act which would be used at this time to make any change to bylaws will be repealed. That will invalidate whatever action was taken by the municipality unless the minister subsequently approves of the action retroactively and unless the unapproved time periods can be covered off. In other words, the bill will be passed and the minister's approval presumably won't be the same day; there are gaps, there are problems, there are uncertainties.

You have 150 municipal bylaws, or more, expiring this year. As I explain at the bottom of page 14 and on page 15, you have dozens and dozens of municipalities that need to do something today with their development charges in order to provide services for growth. These are municipalities whose development charges are not of complete coverage. They weren't able in 1991 to know exactly what had to be charged for all storm drainage requirements or all sanitary sewer requirements. So there are gaps in their bylaws and they now are coming back to try to fill those gaps, in Cumberland, in Niagara-on-the-Lake—I have a couple of dozen examples in appendix B—but they can't fill the gaps because of this bill. This bill has brought everything to a halt.

It's my submission that, although we support the spirit behind the bill, we think its effect is the reverse of what it is set out to do. It is set out to remove obstacles to growth and stimulate development, and I don't think that's what it's doing. I think it's doing exactly the reverse, which brings us to the conclusions, page 16.

I think the first and second reading of this part of the bill has been a useful wake-up call to municipalities and to people like ourselves. It does emphasize and re-emphasize the importance of not having development charges or any other obstacles to growth impeding development and the employment that goes along with it. We do have the greatest respect for the Minister of Municipal Affairs and for his staff and for what they're trying to do to improve a situation that does need improving in terms of this particular industry.

However, we think the amendments under Bill 20 do not have the potential for providing net benefits to the province. As a result, we believe that part of Bill 20 should be fundamentally reconsidered, and we think, with respect, that should be done on an urgent basis. Personally, I don't think a few months from now or next summer, when all of this is finally decided upon, is sufficient. Something should be done immediately.

Mr Gerretsen: It's all so ironic, isn't it? Here we have a government that wants to give municipalities all the powers because they've cut off their grants, except that they also want to do a favour to their friends in the development industry, who basically don't want to get involved in development charges at all because it raises the cost of their development and would rather have the general taxpayer pay for all these costs. A government that believes in municipal autonomy would in effect, through this act, not allow municipalities to do what they would feel is right as far as development charges are concerned. I should indicate that I'm from a community that has very little development charges at all. We're basically just involved in infilling etc, so I have no axe to grind with anybody.

I'm very struck with your comment that this bill has brought everything to a halt and that this government, that claims to be doing everything in order to get the economy moving etc, in effect is doing the exact reverse. Could you expand on those comments you made about municipalities not doing anything with respect to the developments that are in front of them because they really don't know what the situation is with this act or with development charges in the future?

Mr Watson: There are two aspects to that. One is that the municipalities are all facing a deadline relative to their development charges bylaws, that is, a five-year lifetime. That lifetime, in most cases, expires in the fall of this year, and therefore all the municipalities were impelled and had an incentive to go back in and update things and make the changes that had to be made. They no longer have that incentive because this bill permits them to remove the five-year time horizon and to give their bylaw indefinite life.

Second, the municipalities facing area-specific situations—I'm not here saying that each and every one of them is doing nothing, because that's not the case; we are working with some of them. But I'm saying the bill is making it much more difficult, much more uncertain and much more time-consuming to know what to do.

For example, in Cumberland, where I'm with council next Tuesday, there's a major growth area. We now have the costs of servicing it, substantial costs. They're not in the present bylaw, so we would like to go back and replace the bylaw, but the sections of the Development Charges Act under which the township of Cumberland would be acting have been deleted by Bill 20 retroactive to last November, and they've been replaced by a provision that the minister will decide whether or not what they're proposing is satisfactory.

But of course the minister can't decide today, because the bill hasn't been passed, and the bill won't be passed, as I understand it, until possibly the middle of this year. We don't know when it'll be passed, so we are in a state of limbo, a moratorium state, for that kind of situation. Some municipalities are—well, I don't know. There are going to be all kinds of different responses, but one response will be to sit on their hands.

Mr Gerretsen: Maybe word should go out that the Minister of Municipal Affairs is anti-development.

The Chair: Sorry, Mr Gerretsen, time's up. That's a minute over, actually.

Mr Gerretsen: On a point of order: We started 20 minutes late today, and I've noted that every delegation—

The Chair: What has that got to do with the 25 minutes allocated to each group?

Mr Gerretsen: That's exactly my point. If you'd let me make my point of order, maybe you could then rule on it. We started 20 minutes late, and there's been an attempt to get that time back by making the delegations shorter and shorter, which in effect is cutting into our question-and-answer time. I suggest that tomorrow we start right at 9 o'clock whether the government members are here or not. We all saw these little caucuses going on beforehand among government members in terms of whether they were here in sufficient numbers etc, but we have our right to question the delegations and to take our 25 minutes.

The Chair: You're absolutely right, Mr Gerretsen, and not one group has gone less than 25 minutes. That's not a point of order.

Mr Gerretsen: You're incorrect on that, Mr Chairman. You wouldn't know because you weren't here at the beginning.

Ms Churley: Mr Watson, I wish we had received your comments earlier on in the process, because a fair number of developers, not surprisingly, have come to speak to us in support. They obviously have a self-interest; they want to spend as little money as possible in their development plans. It's interesting, and I think part of the problem here—we just had Winch Planning and Development Services tell us that they feel removing the right of appeal to the OMB, for instance, for minor variance applications will likely increase the number of rezoning application appeals. You say that in this case the government again could be inadvertently, I think, actually going against the grain of what it had hoped to achieve here, and that is speeding up the process and cutting red tape.

Part of the problem is the fact that the government moved so quickly on its agenda that there was very little consultation and therefore a real lack of understanding of the implications of what it was doing. In cases like this, I would suppose that the government will reconsider what it's doing here if it can be convinced that in all likelihood this would be the opposite of what it hoped to achieve. That is, I understand, what you are saying, and that you are suggesting—and this I want to be clear on—that they should reconsider this part of the bill. Are you saying they should just remove it entirely and keep it at the status quo for the time being?

Mr Watson: That's my belief in terms of what they ought to do, but of course I'm not privy to the many things that go into making this decision.

Ms Churley: I just want to be clear on your recommendation, because I'm not entirely clear. You're saying it should be removed from this bill.

Mr Watson: Yes.

Ms Churley: In your presentation, you made it clear that you think there are a lot of misconceptions about the status quo; that the status quo is actually working fine and there is no need for change at this time.

Mr Watson: It's not perfect, but I think it is working fine. As I say, I think the process has been benefited by the bill to date—it was a wake-up call—but it's time to get back to business.

Mr Jerry J. Ouellette (Oshawa): I met with a number of builders prior to these hearings, and they expressed the concern that although the development charges were collected, there were no statistics or figures to show that those charges were actually spent in the area they were collected, so any fees collected could be spent or distributed throughout the community and not in the immediate area. Do you have any figures to back that up or to contradict that claim?

Mr Watson: The question is whether the development charges collected are spent in the physical area in which they were collected? There is a statutory requirement, section 16 of the act, that requires a municipality to spend the charges for the purpose for which they were collected. Every municipality has a clear policy report which makes reference to service standards and to projects, and there's a statutory requirement that it follow through on that. Not all those projects are going to be in the immediate area. In some cases, you've got central services. There may be an expansion to a central library. There may be reasons for spending money in areas other than the immediate growth area, but that ought to be consistent with what was put before the development industry and the public when the bylaw was passed. They then had an opportunity at that time, through a series of public meetings and appeal rights and everything else, to say: "We don't think your capital spending program is valid. We think you ought to substitute project A for project B." But once they've gone through all that, the municipality simply follows through on that; it's required to.

Mr Ouellette: So you don't have any figures to show where the actual spending is done, and you don't have a problem if the spending does not take place in the immediate area that it's collected?

Mr Watson: I would only have a problem if the spending were not, in a fundamental way, consistent with the plan that underpinned the development charge in the first place. I think you'd have to get back into each and every municipal situation to decide whether there was a problem there. But it's certainly a difficult area; it requires scrutiny and monitoring. I don't say all municipalities are perfect in that area; they're not.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Watson. We appreciate that. Our 27 minutes are up.

GEORGIAN BAY ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next presentation will be the Georgian Bay Association. Good morning.

Mr John Birnbaum: I'm John Birnbaum, executive director of the Georgian Bay Association. By way of introduction, we're a voluntary umbrella group representing 25 associations and about 5,000 families on the eastern and northern shores of Georgian Bay and the adjoining inland lakes. We've been actively involved in the consultation process through Sewell, which resulted in Bill 163, and with the new land use planning system consultations of the Ministry of Natural Resources. Up until now we had not participated in any of the discussions around Bill 20.

It's our understanding that the Federation of Ontario Cottagers' Associations will be making a submission to you in another location at another time representing the overall provincial interests of cottage country, but we would like to share today our views, since we represent a significant number of ratepayers and some unique planning challenges.

Our presentation will be made by two volunteers from our association. Mr Mario Buszynski is the volunteer chair of our land use and planning committee, and Mr Rod Northey is a volunteer member of Georgian Bay Association's environment committee. I'll turn the microphones over to them.

Mr Mario Buszynski: I am Mario Buszynski. I'd just like to give you a little bit of a background, a regional context if you like. Our member associations come from the district of Manitoulin, Sudbury, Parry Sound and Muskoka. With the exception of the district of Muskoka, the government organization and planning expertise in these other areas is based for the most part on contract planning staff. The databases aren't very comprehensive. I was in Simcoe county yesterday and they have a very comprehensive geographic information system program. They're developing a very comprehensive database. The Ministry of Natural Resources is plugging into it. You'll have maps that will identify areas of environmental concern. I'll talk a little bit more in detail, but in our area—it's a very fragile area on the Canadian Shield—data are incomplete. For the most part, planning approvals rely on the input of the Ministry of Natural Resources and specialized consultants.

There's permanent snow cover for a large part of the year and you can't get on to the properties to see if they're suitable for the placement of septic systems. In many cases you have to go by boat or long, poor-quality roads. Access is a problem. So in a number of these issues we'll talk about, in streamlining the process, how it can make it very tough in cottage country.

We'll look at Bill 20 and compare it a little bit to Bill 163 in three areas: streamlining the planning process, empowering the municipalities and protecting the environment.

Just to shake you up, I'm going to start with concern 2 as opposed to concern 1, looking at the "have regard for" provision, which I'm sure you have heard a fair bit on already. However, our concern is that there are different legal interpretations and applications of the term "have regard for." We're concerned that in fact you may not streamline the process, you may bog it down, because there may be Divisional Court appeals.

In the old Bill 163 wording, "be consistent with," I think a lot of people were thrown off by the thickness of the implementation guidelines for the policy statements, and I agree they shocked me somewhat as well. However, they did try to provide a clear direction. We're not certain that we have a clear direction, and we're recommending that there be some clarification to the legal intent of the term "have regard to" related to the provincial policy statements. Otherwise, we feel that it's not going to streamline the process.

Mr Rod Northey: Good morning. My name is Rod Northey, and I am going to now get back to concern 1. I asked Mr Buszynski to help me out on going to concern 2, because I think when you look at what you have before you for concern 1, what we really need you to consider is the integration of a number of problems raised by Bill 20.

The main point we're trying to make is that although it may appear that letting the Ministry of Municipal Affairs have sole jurisdiction to decide whether things should go to the OMB at the ministerial level—in practice that's going to lead to a very complicated system of interministerial discussions and, we think, in the present climate, to an abdication of the province doing anything at the level of dealing with planning approvals.

I'd like to just explain that in the context of a couple of the ministries that deal with the environment, which is of major concern in the Georgian Bay area. Presently, you have the Ministry of Natural Resources and Ministry of Environment and Energy both with some role over the environment, and not particularly clear roles between the two of them of what they're doing. But the most important point is, in terms of what they are doing today and have been doing, it's not entirely clear what they have to do. The standards are not clear; there is a great deal of discretion.

What that means is, if you look at the standard and then you come through Sewell, which has tried to create an approach where because of a requirement to be consistent with what was set out there were in fact provincial planning standards, we now have a situation where you've moved back away from "be consistent with" to this "have regard to" language, which in our view takes away the point that there are standards. It means there are a lot of things everyone's going to have to go and look at—that includes the provincial ministries—but there's really no stopping point. There's nothing where anyone can draw a line in the sand and say, "You cannot cross here." Because at the end of the day everyone can have regard to a number of different documents, and we're going to have to all go to the Ontario Municipal Board, where it will be the final arbiter and say: "Here's the line in the sand. Yes, everyone's had regard to a number of things, but this is where we draw the line."

What we're trying to say here is, with your one-window approach, if you look at what's going to happen without the clarity of standards—we use the example of drinking water standards. The Ministry of Environment says, "We think we've got a concern with this proposal on the drinking water area." Now, the developer or somebody says, "Well, we've had regard to the policy statements." The ministry says, "Yes, we've had regard to them too, but we think the standards are what apply here," but the developer says: "Well, there aren't standards. It's just required that we look at these things and have regard to them." So we go back and forth. Then the developer says: "We don't agree with where you're going on this. On your one-window approach, we see that you need to get the Ministry of Municipal Affairs to agree with whether you are right or wrong."

Presently, what can happen is Ministry of Environment can say: "We don't agree with you. We're going to file an appeal." So there's an incentive at the front end of the process to try to get the two to at least come to a reconciliation. Well, what happens here? Is there a streamlining with Municipal Affairs involved? No. What you're going to have is that Ministry of Environment needs to consult with Municipal Affairs. Municipal Affairs will then need to get itself involved in a process where presently it has no involvement. So instead of having two ministries deal with the environment, we're now going to have three ministries every single time there is a controversy on environmental matters in the areas of concern. We think that's inconsistent with streamlining.

More to the point, when you look at what the practical effect will be when you move from Ministry of Environment getting frustrated because Ministry of Municipal Affairs is not letting them go and launch these appeals, you're going to get the Ministry of Environment saying: "Why are we bothering? Why are we even bothering to review these appeals? We know the minute it goes over to Municipal Affairs, they're going to stop us, so why bother reviewing this stuff? Let them go forward; let Municipal Affairs deal with this."

So the question is, either you are going to have a lot more discussions between ministries, in which case you don't have streamlining, or you are going to have provincial ministries saying, "We don't have a direct role any more in this. It's Municipal Affairs," and from our perspective that's an abdication of provincial responsibility for the environment.

So looking at the big picture, what's going to happen when you say one window, your view is you're not going to get streamlining and you're not going to get better protection of the environment.

Dealing with the issue of minor variance, presently the process provides for an appeal to the municipal board. As you know, you've got a very extensive code in Bill 20 to try to give municipalities some flexibility to deal with this and make their own decision as to whether things should go to the OMB.

The concern we have with that is trying to understand whether in fact municipalities are the best judge of what minor variance matters should be and whether they are the problem or the solution. Looking at the practice of this, it's our perspective that municipalities are very often part of the problem, not the solution, and the problem is that they are guided by other considerations than good planning. There may simply be politics, if I can use the word that way, rather than good planning.

What you have in the present system is an ultimate arbiter, the OMB, which says, "We are going to deal with politicians playing politicians instead of planners, and we are going to deal with minor variances and make sure that, at least, good planning is maintained on a consistent basis." The approach that's taken by Bill 20 is to really require municipalities to decide that they want to let the OMB have a role, rather than have the province say the OMB has this role. We think perhaps there are ways of circumscribing it, and we've suggested here that perhaps you limit minor variance appeals to one-day appeals so that they're expeditious. But the concern on the provincial level is that there be good planning, and our concern is that municipalities aren't always making decisions that represent good planning. Taking away the right of appeal and letting municipalities have the sole discretion on that is really going to make political what is now principally a planning matter.

Mr Buszynski: Our fourth concern relates to the reduction of time lines for approval and appeals that are put forward in Bill 20. We feel there is a high degree of risk in this approach. We also feel that for our constituents, it represents significant hardships. For instance, we've talked about our geography being a little less hospitable, the database being less well defined. The other area is that it's our understanding from the press that there will be massive cutbacks in the civil service, which will relate to fewer numbers of environmental stewards and others looking at these applications, which means the people who are there will be more overworked and they'll have less time to deal with them individually.

We've had many of our water bodies developed through multiple consents rather than plans of subdivision. This in itself can lead to planning and environmental problems because a comprehensive approach may not be taken to the review of this type of development. We are concerned that with the lack of MNR staff in areas like Manitoulin, Sudbury and Parry Sound district, the municipalities that are there are going to have to rely exclusively on a consultant's interpretation and guidance and that possibly the most detailed information and adherence to good environmental planning may not occur.

Our recommendations are that the present time lines be kept. Certainly we heard from others, when Bill 163 was being put forward, that these were fairly onerous. I've had experience in other jurisdictions—for instance, in the States, in doing environmental impact assessment work dealing with the US Forest Service—where I've gone in as a proponent looking for comments back. They have time lines that are dictated, and talking to the staff, staff have said: "I'm sorry. If you expect us to get our input back to you within those time lines, forget it. It's not going to happen." That's a fact.

We're concerned that if you implement Bill 20 with even more restrictive time lines, people who are empowered to make decisions will throw their hands up and say: "It's not possible. Go to the OMB, and you'll just backlog the OMB."

So we're recommending that the approval time lines and the appeal processes are maintained. This will also enable us to ensure that our membership receives adequate notice. A letter can take five days to reach Toronto from Parry Sound.

Mr Northey: Moving on then, concern 5, I think it's fair to say that's dealing with the flexibility to determine a complete application, as I review the bill. I think there is that flexibility provided, so I think that concern is addressed in what I see in Bill 20.

Just to add to a point made on this public notice, I think the difference, as we've put in our recommendation, between 20 and 30 days is significant. If you're dependent on regional newspapers or things that are monthly to get your notice, a 20-day period means that the month is not quite going to work, and I'm not sure that that 10-day period is all that important from a time line perspective, but it may be very important from a public input perspective.

Mr Buszynski: Our sixth concern relates to public meetings. In our area—we have a summer residence in the Parry Sound area—we have developed a very cooperative approach with developers. We'll receive notice of a development, we'll evaluate it and we'll meet with the developers, and if we have some concerns, we'll try and iron out some ways to mitigate those concerns. This has worked effectively for our association in the past, and it prevents down the road conflicts. We feel that if you remove the requirement to hold public meetings, what may happen is that down the road you'll spend more time on appeals because people won't be properly consulted. In fact, inappropriate decisions may be made, because people who are resident in the area may be able to help someone out who's a proponent of a development, something that they've overlooked.

Mr Northey: Moving on then, the final one I will deal with is concern 7, and this is something I'm sure you've heard about, which is the infrastructure issue. Under Bill 163, one of the innovations was to make provision for a municipality or a board not to hear something, in other words, to put a stop to something where there was a view that the infrastructure was not adequate. By taking that away from what you've got here, and it exists, as you will know, under the official plan issue, under the zoning issue, under the subdivision issue, you're really perpetuating discussion and you're forcing things to go to a board hearing or past municipal council level, rather than cutting something off at the early stage of an application by allowing a municipality to say: "This is premature, in our view. We don't want to deal with the infrastructure issue right now. We don't think this development application should come in at this time until we've got infrastructure dealt with."

To conclude, then, looking at the larger picture, the difficulty is, if you want to streamline the process and give municipalities empowerment, in fact, with what you are taking away here, you are doing the opposite. You're allowing hearings to go ahead where municipalities have to spend resources dealing with infrastructure matters, and in terms of the time lines, you're involving extending the time out when people can just keep pushing a process or an application along.

Mr Buszynski: In general conclusion, of the three precepts, those being streamlining, municipal empowerment and environmental protection, we feel you're achieving the municipal empowerment. We don't feel the planning process will be streamlined, for reasons suggested before. In fact, in the end, an agency such as Ministry of Natural Resources, if it's not involved up front and there are significant environmental impacts, may wind up laying charges in the end of the process, which may make it more costly for the developer and may take a lot longer time. Good planning means understanding everything up front in the process to save time in the end.

Environmental protection we feel won't be enhanced under this scenario. There will be a drastically reduced number of environmental stewards in the province as a result of the government cutbacks.

Then, taking not an appropriate amount of time to consider the development applications may lead to significant environmental damage, and it's fine for someone, the Ministry of Natural Resources, to go in at the end and lay a charge because environmental damage has occurred, and it has every right to do so under other acts. That doesn't alleviate the fact that the damage has occurred, and we may not be able to repair it.

What we would like you to do, if possible, is to consider our concerns and see if you can build them into the review of the bill.

Ms Churley: I think you've outlined many of the problems that we've been discovering as we progress along with this bill. I think it should be called an environmental destruction bill at this point. It is going to cost us all a lot more down the road.

I'm going to come back quickly, as others might, to your comments about the "have regard for" as opposed to "be consistent with." We had a Mr Mark Stevenson from the Ontario Society for Environmental Management, chair of the policy committee, in here yesterday saying the opposite of what you're saying, that this is preferable to go back because it will speed the process up. I know you're a lawyer. I rest my case. There are different opinions on this, and it's going to keep coming up over and over again. Could you clarify again, as a lawyer who has dealt with these issues, why you think it's actually going to increase the time frame?

Mr Northey: Because, to put it very bluntly, "be consistent with" sets a standard and "have regard for" sets out a process. If you're trying to streamline something, you want a standard, not a process. So you've lost. Looking at the Planning Act, there is nothing that you could regard as a hard and fast standard when all you're saying is, "Everyone, you must have regard for" something.

Ms Churley: So what you're saying is people could end up—and this is what we're hearing on this side of it—there'll be more OMB cases, there'll be more community groups, because there's no certainty.

Mr Northey: Absolutely.

Mr Ernie Hardeman (Oxford): I just wanted to go to number 7, your concerns with the right to refuse because of the prematurity. I just wanted to point out that many people have expressed the concern that by having it in there, the OMB could refuse the application for a hearing based on the prematurity of the application of non-servicing. The people who expressed a concern felt that they should have a right to the hearing to put forward the argument that someone had made a misjudgement on the prematurity of it, that that was something they should be allowed to have their day in court on. The OMB would still have the power to refuse the application, based on that the servicing was not available, but they would have a right to that hearing. Do you see that taking that right to the hearing away and not being able to put their case forward is taking away the democratic right the developer would have in this application?

Mr Northey: I think that's a fair comment. I think if you reflect back on what we were saying about the other appeals, which were the minor variance, you have spotted an inconsistency with what we're saying, because we're saying on most things there should be that ultimate right of appeal. I think, though, if I could put it this way, perhaps a fairer resolution is to have in the OMB some very abridged process for dealing with the issue of infrastructure.

The concern is that if you have the OMB appeal that can go ahead for any length of time, the infrastructure does not get resolved early on. I guess, to be fair to a developer on this, there should be a way where they can have an independent judgement on the prematurity point.

But I think equally there should be a way for a municipality to say: "Look, we don't want to get into the overall planning merits of everything going on with this application. We think there is a problem with the infrastructure point. Can we have a very abridged hearing on this point?" I do take the point you've made, but I think there needs to be some process where a municipality can put its foot down, so to speak, and say, "We don't want to get into the merits of this application holus-bolus; we want to have some ability to control our infrastructure process and when things should happen," not just lay it at the whim of developers.

Mr Gerretsen: I completely concur with your comment relating to concern number 6 that public hearings or meetings with respect to subdivision plans and severances are an absolute necessity, or else the public, particularly the public that may be immediately affected by living adjacent to it, will be totally left out in the cold without at least having their say about the matter.

But what I wanted to get your opinion on deals with this whole one-window approach notion. Let me tell you, I like the one-window approach notion from the point of view that everybody knows who the heck the lead organization is.

But your comment that the environment will not be better served as a result of this—and particularly when one reads the Globe and Mail this morning with respect to dump sites and the relaxation of environmental regulations, which obviously indicates to me where this government is heading that way—would you agree with me that what's really important is that there are some definite guidelines and procedures that all of us know about within the various ministries that are involved in the one-window approach, that they need to be set out so that everybody knows what the rules of the game are in dealing with it?

Mr Buszynski: I don't know, maybe Rod would like to supplement. I'd like to try to answer one thing, because I have had experience. I've worked in the provincial government. I'm now a private consultant. I've seen it from both sides. I've worked for developers; I've worked for government.

As I say, I was in Simcoe county yesterday at a government office, and they were busily preparing their input for Municipal Affairs, a map showing their concerns, their environmental concerns.

Municipal Affairs in the one-window approach would essentially do a checklist. For instance, if they see it's near a watercourse or a significant promontory, then they check off; there may be some heritage concerns. Now, if you have a map showing MNR concerns that says it's a deer yard or a wetland or whatever and they have a geographic area, you look at the development application. Perhaps you can say: "Yes, okay, it's in that area, so there's an area of concern. So we'll check it off, we'll circulate it to MNR."

The concern that this staff person addressed to me was that, number one, things aren't static in time. Things change, new information is brought in all the time. It's a question of trying to keep this updated.

What you're doing is you're asking somebody in the Ministry of Municipal Affairs to be the final arbiter. They're sitting in Toronto, perhaps never having lived in or experienced any of the areas outside of the greater Toronto area. They may not be really aware of what's a significant concern. And what you can give in the way of a map at a gross scale may not adequately provide enough information, and this one window, this one person in Municipal Affairs, has to provide that function. They may not be adequately prepared.

If you have the agencies like MNR, that pride themselves on being in the field, being out there and aware of what the impacts are and what the environment is, if they're not figured prominently in the process up front—and I don't think they can be under this system because it would become too onerous—then what you're left with is, when the damage occurs, then the ministry will go out under another act and charge the person.

I don't think that's the way we want to do it. I think we want to review it.

I would be the last person, having worked for the development industry, to say the existing system is great. It doesn't allow for a speedy resolution of the issues. I think one thing is a lot more emphasis has to be placed on mediation. That's something that really is lacking and something that I haven't really seen addressed strongly.

We're doing that on a local basis with our association and any development applications, and I can give you the names of developers we've worked with who are satisfied with the process.

I don't think that reducing the time lines—

The Chair: Excuse me. I'm going to have to cut you off, because we're already past 28 minutes. We appreciate your comments. Thank you very much for taking the time to make your presentation today.

COMMUNITY HOUSING PARTNERS PEEL

The Chair: Our next group up is the Community Housing Partners of Peel. Good morning, gentlemen.

Mr Bob Freeman: Okay. My name is Bob Freeman. I am employed by the Social Planning Council of Peel, which is a social research planning and coordination body in the region of Peel. I also chair Community Housing Partners Peel, which is a loose coalition of agencies providing housing and related services.

I'd like to indicate at the outset that I'm not a lawyer or a developer or urban planner. Part of what we do at the council is assess the possible implication of legislative or social policy changes on certain segments of the population. I'd simply like to provide a brief profile of the clients who are served under this program and to identify some possible implications if Bill 20 is passed, implications for the clients we serve. Then I'll turn things over to Aubrey Carrega and he will talk in more detail about the situation in Malton, which is a section of Mississauga. 1130

Typically, the people served by the program are those with low income; often they're on some form of social assistance. Many are new Canadians. Quite a number are ex-offenders, single-parent households and people with psychiatric problems. The major activities we conduct are housing help, that is, linking landlords with people looking for housing; mediation in landlord-tenant disputes; and counselling. Typically, clients require other forms of counselling: life skills, how to live within a budget and so on.

A consumer profile—and this we presented to the Ministry of Housing that funds this service; a survey we completed earlier this year. Of a total of 1,344 clients in the period of a year, from September 1994 to August 1995, it indicated that 23% of those were single, 44% were the head of a single-parent family—typically, women—and 18% were family households.

The primary source of household income for the same period: Of 1,165 households, 21% had no income, 24% received general welfare assistance, 14% received family benefits assistance and another 27% received family benefits assistance in addition to employment income—typically, the working poor.

The primary reason for people seeking help in the same period: 36% were identified as homeless, either living in a shelter, on the street or sharing a home; another 25% indicated that the rent in the current unit was too high. The greatest housing needs identified were among ex-offenders, single-parent families and newcomers to Canada. The groups hardest to house that we identified were ex-offenders and single-parent families, typically because of discrimination on the part of private landlords. The groups most vulnerable to losing their housing among people served were people with mental health problems and young adults with low income.

One of the major features of the service we provide is a housing registry of private landlords, and there are approximately 370 of those, with a little over 500 units that we have access to. Of these, one third are rooming houses or shared housing, typically a basement apartment situation or an apartment in the house.

The average rent on the part of people looking for this kind of accommodation was in the area of 60% to 70% of income. The cut in the rates of social assistance which went into effect last October has had the effect of resulting in more people looking for cheaper accommodation, more families looking for cheaper accommodation and certainly more sharing of accommodation.

Just some background within this environment, some features of Peel's rental housing market. The vacancy rate as of last October, as identified by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp, was 0.7%. Peel continues to experience high migration and population growth in the area of 17,000 to 20,000 people a year. With the moratorium on social housing that went into effect last year, there were only three social housing projects on stream which will bring in another approximately 250 units, which is certainly not anywhere near meeting the need out there.

There are approximately 20,000 household applicants for social housing. Most of those are Peel Living, which is the major landlord in Peel, and the Peel Regional Housing Authority, which is the local housing authority for the Ontario Housing Corp.

While no one has done an actual count, it is estimated that there are 18,000 apartments in houses in all of Peel region. At the same time, the rent supplement program—I am told that many of these units are being phased out of private buildings, so slowly, another avenue for people who typically can't afford to buy houses or live in market rents is being denied to many.

A study by Peel Living indicated that nearly half the residents living in non-profit housing are single parents. Also, 42% of Peel Living's residents were identified as coming previously from shared accommodation, typically with three or more people, and of those, more than three quarters were living in overcrowded conditions.

I'd like to conclude simply by saying that any legislative move in the environment being experienced in Peel region may have the following consequences: further discrimination, particularly against large families with three or more children, single parents—roughly 80% of those are women—people on social assistance and people with disabilities. Another implication will be growing homelessness, and, as we saw in the late 1980s, the intensification of practices such as key money.

At this point I'd like to turn it over to Aubrey Carrega to talk about the situation in Malton.

Mr Aubrey Carrega: Good morning. My name is Aubrey Carrega, and I'm the community housing worker of Malton Neighbourhood Services. I try to match landlords and tenants with safe, affordable housing. On a daily basis, I meet tenants who'd like to rent rooms in people's homes or I speak with landlords who have dwellings they would like to rent.

One of the things I've noticed in Malton is that quite a lot of new Canadians are arriving there and they want to settle with their sponsors, who are usually the families who sponsored them. They would be in the basements of those homes. My concern is that if Bill 20 goes through, would that be severed completely? Would we still allow second families to be in a basement? That's my concern.

I'm a bit nervous, because this is new to me.

The other thing is that the new arrivals do not have jobs. It takes a while for them to get jobs and settle down and get the first and last month's rent. It takes a while. If we don't have somewhere for these new arrivals to stay, there's going to be a problem. Where will these people go? They will encounter severe hardship, and if they have to rent from private landlords they will not have the money. I notice that in Malton a regular one-bedroom will go for about $650, whereas if there's a unit in somebody's home, it may go for $250 to $450. There's a big difference there.

The new Canadians help to stimulate the economy, in my opinion. Because if they are staying in somebody's basement, a relative's basement, they're not paying the regular market rent; they're saving money. From saving their money, they're allowed to get a down payment to get a new home, purchase a home that somebody else doesn't want. They want to move on to another unit. To me, that indirectly creates jobs, because you have to construct new homes for these people.

I was talking about the first and last month's rent. Private landlords, in my opinion, are much more flexible. We have situations in the Malton area where people have a poor credit rating, they do not have the first and last month's rent, they have too many children—all kinds of reasons they couldn't get into a regular apartment building. The private landlords with a unit in the basement are more flexible. They're willing to say: "Okay, let's work something out here. You don't have the last month's rent but you can move in and pay me in instalments. You have too many children? It's okay, come in." That helps the vulnerable people to find accommodation.

We have situations of landlords who have already modified their basements. They have put in a separate entrance and have spent a lot of money to bring it to the standard required in Bill 120. If this bill is repealed, what happens to those landlords who invested that kind of money? I don't know.

I've had situations too where elderly people want a couple to move in with them just for companionship. What's happens there? That's a second family moving in. The elderly people may not want to rent it, they just want companionship for safety or whatever reason. That's a concern, and I've seen this a lot in Malton. I don't know what will happen there.

In conclusion, I strongly recommend that Bill 120 not be repealed. It should still stand, but we should have more inspectors going out to deal with residents, particularly in Malton, because I've seen some situations that maybe shouldn't be rented. I agree that we should still have Bill 120 but more inspectors going out there to inspect the premises. Thank you.

Mr Smith: Thank you very much. It's been interesting to hear the various presentations from tenants' groups. There's certainly consistency in the type of information that's being presented. It's refreshing as well to see the type of detail you've presented with respect to the Peel demand.

The irony in this, if we want to call it that, is that it's sort of all or nothing. Obviously, the government has articulated its position with respect to having municipal autonomy and decision-making involved in this process of apartments as a second unit. Concerns have been raised by tenant groups about potential discrimination on the basis of a number of reasons.

The previous group, West Scarborough Community Legal Services, provided some alternatives. Are you aware of any models or alternatives that might find common ground to this issue? Have you had the opportunity to experience that, or are you aware of other situations where the concerns you're expressing can be married in some part with the government's view that this really is a municipal issue? Are you aware of any solutions, or can you provide any solutions to this dichotomy that exists?

Mr Freeman: Looking at the problem, it's such a multi-pronged problem. On one hand, there was quite a bit of social housing development going on in the 1980s and early 1990s; that's been identified as being too costly, too time-consuming. I really don't think there's any silver bullet out there. I think it takes a number of different approaches to start to adjust the problem, and my point is that people don't choose to live in basement apartments. They live in them because they have no other choice. With the situation, as I mentioned—the moratorium on social housing, the rent supplement being repealed—this only makes the situation worse, in addition to an already low vacancy rate in the rental housing market.

I know there have been a lot of discussions on repealing rent control. I don't have a firm opinion on that, but again I don't see a single or even a two-pronged solution. I just fear, if the current legislation is repealed and basement apartments and apartments in homes are made more difficult to access, for what people will end up doing.

Mr Hardeman: I just want to clarify the second presentation. There's some discussion based on what will happen to the existing landlords that have apartments in their houses and how they will pay the mortgage. I just want to point out that Bill 20 does not make the existing establishments illegal; in fact, it allows them all to remain legal, those that were in existence or those for which building permits were attained before the deadline date. So we are talking about the future as opposed to the present, existing apartments. I want to ask if you do not feel that the decision of where these apartment should or should not be allowed and where they should be serviced is not a more appropriate decision for the local municipality rather than Queen's Park?

Mr Freeman: This is an ongoing discussion. I know in Peel, especially in the discussion of where to put social housing developments, it's been a long standing debate that the municipality should have that control and I'm not in principle opposed to that as long as the decisions that are made do not discriminate against a certain segment of the population who are most vulnerable to being homeless or to losing their apartments or not being able to enter the rental market.

Mr Hoy: Good morning. In the last six or so weeks, there's been a lot of discussion about special interest and special-interest groups. Generally, it contains a negative connotation or at least people perceive it to be that way. However, I have a different view of things. I think that people who are interested in an issue and want to help others, as you are here today, are special. So I congratulate you on your presentation.

I want to particularly say that your statistical analysis in the first presentation helps to understand the people who are affected by or potentially will be affected by Bill 20, and it gives a kind of face to who we are talking about. I appreciate that part of your presentation very much, and your effort and your desire to see that the best outcome of Bill 20 that affects these people is actually put in place, and I appreciate your presentation here very much.

Mr Hampton: We've heard from a number of groups and individuals about the issue of second apartments. I wonder if you can confirm something for me. It's my sense, from hearing all the groups, that whether or not these apartments are illegal, they are going to exist in the future and they are going to exist in greater number in the future, because there will be a growing demand for them and because many people who own homes will have their incomes decreased somewhat and will be looking for ways to help enhance their income. Would you agree with that?

Mr Freeman: Yes.

Mr Carrega: Yes, I do.

Mr Hampton: What's going to happen, though, is if we move back to a world where these apartments can be declared illegal is that we will see more of these apartments not meeting the fire code, the electrical code, the building code. In other words, the people who live at them will have their health and safety at risk.

The third sense I get is that these people will be denied the kinds of legal rights we would usually associate with citizenship. Those legal rights would be the right to complain about living conditions that are unsafe or in some cases unhealthy because if you do you'll get kicked out, is my sense. What it comes down to is, is the government interested in the values of all these people who I think will be placed at risk and will be denied, I think, what are commonly called the legal rights of citizenship? Is the government interested in those folks or is the government interested in catering to all sorts of—

Interjection.

Mr Hampton: No, Bill, I take this issue very seriously.

Mr Murdoch: Well, you should but you're—

Mr Hampton: Because in effect what your government's doing is it's ghettoizing a whole group of people.

1150

Mr Murdoch: What you're saying is that we should have the municipalities—

The Chair: Order, Mr Murdoch.

Mr Murdoch: Well, he's asking.

The Chair: Through the Chair, not directly.

Mr Hampton: I'd like to ask one further question. My sense is that municipalities for a long time had jurisdiction over this, yet the information we've received is that all kinds of illegal apartments that were not inspected, that fell below the health and safety guidelines, that fell below the electrical standards, that fell below the fire standards, were allowed and in fact existed across the province.

Mr Carrega: This is why I was saying that I agree with having Bill 120, but you must have more inspectors going out there and checking the units. I agree with that, and this is part of the thing I said before. Yes, I agree we must have inspectors out there.

Mr Hampton: Have municipalities in the past looked after this issue in a responsible way?

Mr Freeman: I'm not going to touch that one. In Mississauga, which tends to be, more than Brampton, a little more cognizant, or tries to enforce zoning bylaws that would maintain single-family houses, you may recall that in the last couple of years there have been some fairly high-profile cases of lives lost through fires and there have been inquests, and I believe there was one in Brampton. So as far as responsibility is concerned, I think it just indicates that there is a gap in the mechanism to ensure that apartments in houses are up to a level of safety, with regard to fire standards in particular.

The Chair: Thank you, gentlemen, for taking the time to make presentation this morning. We appreciate it.

CITY OF TORONTO

The Chair: Our final presentation this morning will be from the city of Toronto legal department.

Mr Dennis Perlin: Happy Valentine's Day.

Ms Churley: Oh, brought some candies for us?

Mr Perlin: No, just a wonderful submission that I hope you'll adopt. My name is Dennis Perlin. I'm the city solicitor for the city of Toronto and with me is John Paton, who is the assistant city solicitor.

We've submitted a few pieces of paper to you this morning. First of all, there's a formal letter to the committee attaching the city of Toronto brief with respect to Bill 20. Also, just in case anyone wants to follow the submission I was going to make this morning, it's also set out for you in a separate piece. The brief is this, and it has attached the council minutes and the submission this morning in terms of dealing with two particular points, which is the document that has the big print on top: "Bill 20."

If we have time, we'd be glad to go into a little bit more on the brief itself, but the two points we wish to deal with and we hope all members of the Legislature will see—especially in the first point, one that is truly neutral but truly a streamlined measure, one that can save significant dollars in terms of legal fees, survey fees, registration fees and just time in itself, and one we hope you would see as a streamlining measure that could be adopted.

It deals with—I know it will seem like a very mundane matter compared to some of the policy issues you're dealing with—an important matter to many people who deal with development where site plan control is in effect, which is of course most, if not all, of the urban areas of the province, but particularly in the city.

The present system by which a municipality secures its approval and ensures that it gives notice to future owners and mortgagees, and then is binding on those future owners and mortgagees, is by way of the creation of a development agreement, its registration. What we are seeking as an alternative is one that would allow for an option in the bill that would allow simply notice to be done by way of recording the approval with the zoning bylaw status information system that municipalities have.

As many of you know, it's due diligence, common real estate practice, in fact required standard real estate practice, and indeed for those owners who do their own real estate work, for them to go to the municipality and seek a letter of compliance with respect to what are the zoning matters, are there outstanding work orders etc. What we have and what I know most municipalities have recorded with their zoning bylaw information is whether or not a site plan approval has been given and what conditions have been attached.

Because the present act provides for agreements and the registration of those as the way of giving notice to future owners and mortgagees, the question arises whether the approval in itself is notice to future owners. I am one of those municipal solicitors who believes that it is, but I have to tell you that there's a great deal of doubt, and I have some colleagues who think there's even greater doubt than others because of the fact that the Planning Act at the present time provides only one option with respect to notice and that is the creation and registration of an agreement.

Some of these agreements, as you'll see in the presentation—I'm trying to keep it short because I know you want to leave in time to have some lunch—can be anywhere from $500 to $2,000, and this can sometimes be on a very simple site plan matter for a small developer, because while we in the city, for example, create agreements, some smaller municipalities require the developers themselves to have it drafted. In any case, even if it's drafted by us, it has to be reviewed by other legal counsel.

There are legal fees for getting it executed, for getting it registered. There are survey fees in some cases to have it registered, or sometimes when there's a lane conveyance or a small piece of road allowance to be conveyed a survey has to be created. As I said, those fees are anywhere from a minimum of $500 to $5,000, whereas in most cases people can get the information in terms of a site plan approval and will get it when they send in their letter to the municipality when they're buying or when they're mortgaging for notice. They will get the notice as to what it is that the zoning bylaw provides and what it is that is the site plan approval and what are the conditions that are attached.

What we are trying to do here today is ask you to allow for an optional method of recording these approvals with the zoning bylaw status information register at a municipality. You have it, for example, in Bill 163 for registering municipal properties; you have it here in Bill 20, depending on your debate on second unit registrations in section 59 of your bill. There are many registers, and of course zoning bylaw status is something that a municipality has to give, and it's not a letter that a person can avoid. You have to send your letter of compliance even if we've registered an agreement. People will still have to send their letter to find out what's the status, what isn't in compliance.

What we developed at the city and what we're here for is to seek in the bill clear authority for what we are now doing. I show you at the end of our presentation—there are two sheets at the end, the two last pieces of paper. You'll see there's a statement of approval/undertaking which is the second last document. What you'll see is signed by the planning official as the site plan approval and on the back you'll see the owner. You have an initial developer-owner who indicates that in this case she has accepted the approval and the conditions.

I purposely tried to show one on Coxwell that had three important conditions, but would at least from a municipal perspective—but frankly, to spend $500 in order to have this registered is perhaps not necessary, especially when one can go get that information.

As per the next document that you see, the last document, which does have the department of buildings request, what we call the form letter that goes out as a letter of compliance, you will see on it the undertakings for 339 Coxwell, what the status of the conditions is etc. It does achieve what an agreement registration would achieve. That's the first point we would ask you.

We do give you wording—you'll see it on page 4 of the letter or on page 4 of the brief, in both cases—in which we add to the registering of the agreements the recording of "the approval and conditions under the same system used to record the zoning status of properties by the municipality." It streamlines this process tremendously and it saves significant dollars.

The last issue I will mention with it is this. The reason, of course, that we have to put the agreement on title at the present time, if you're using a fail-safe method, is to secure it against future owners and mortgagees. In order to do that, you have to get what's called a postponement agreement—I'm sure many of you are familiar with it—from mortgagees that may be there at present.

We have had the unfortunate circumstances sometimes that in order to get those particular postponement agreements, not only are there fees, legal fees for preparation and execution and registration charged by the mortgage company; sometimes mortgagees have charged additional money in order to give the postponement agreement or have even raised an interest rate under a mortgage in order to give the postponement agreement.

That, I would say to you, is a rather unsavoury practice, and this type of practice we're now attempting to have put into the Planning Act will avoid that type of practice as well. I've seen it all too often during my 23 years in municipal law practice, so I commend that to you. I would hope that is one that you could adopt without a great deal of debate.

The second one may be a little bit harder for you: that city council would like the OMB access to remain for committee of adjustment variances. We have 1,000 or more applications to the committee of adjustment. We appreciate the city of Toronto is the largest area in terms of the province, in terms of committee of adjustment variances, and we have sometimes 200 or 800 appeals. Sometimes the municipality goes on 20-some appeals a year.

We do not believe that you should charge the municipality or the appellant for access to the OMB. You've given options; I appreciate you've set out options, but they should not include a requirement that in order to access the OMB appeal option, you have to pay a cost. We believe section 69 of the Planning Act, as it is, will allow us to pass that cost on to the appellant. That cost can be quite significant.

We're concerned that people of means perhaps can afford it. We're concerned that people will avoid going with minor variance applications and go with zoning bylaw applications because then they can get free accessibility to the Ontario Municipal Board. So it may not be encouraging what some may have hoped, that this will be a more efficient practice. It may turn out to be a less efficient practice as people look for ways to get to the OMB by doing a zoning bylaw application as opposed to a minor variance application.

More importantly, it shouldn't be downloaded on to the municipality. We have no control over the costs of the OMB. We don't make the appointments, we don't set out its administration, we don't determine its salaries; you do, and the OMB does itself under the regulations that you provide for them. We have no control over those costs. For most boards we create we can control the costs because we control the budgets. I think it's an unfair practice to put it on a municipality. We don't wish to take away from any of the options that you've put there. There are some municipalities that will be glad to do the minor variances—they have very few and do it themselves—others that will appoint committees with a council and it will be a final decision, and others that might like to do the review process.

But it's a lot to expect a municipal council, in terms of a large city, to be able to handle 800 review requests or perhaps even more, because you now still have to pay a $125 filing fee for an appeal. So we would ask you to respectfully leave all of the options in the bill but please make sure access to the OMB an option that's available without cost to the municipality or the appellant, other than the usual filing fee that they have right now. That's our second point.

I commend, as I said, the whole brief to you including, you will see, city council's position on the issue you were discussing with the last application, that city council does not wish to see you repeal section 16 or section 35, those sections that allow for the as-of-right second residential unit in singles, semis and row houses. It has worked well in the city. There was a great hullabaloo that this would be the end of life in the R-1 sections of the city of Toronto; it has not turned out to be that case. I would commend that city council would ask you to please keep those provisions in the Planning Act.

Mr Hoy: Thank you very much for your presentation. The three areas that you covered are significant enough. I was particularly interested in your comments about the OMB and that whole discussion that you had there as to cost and downloading. I think they are significant concerns for all municipalities, whether it's the region of Toronto or elsewhere. I happen to be from a rural riding quite a distance from here and I know that costs, in light of a previous bill that was passed, are something they'll be very concerned with in regard to OMB etc. I thank you for highlighting those. Our party will discuss those.

Ms Churley: Thank you for your presentation. Happy Valentine's Day to you too.

A number of questions came out of your presentation, particularly the first one, which was quite technical, and I think I agree with you. I don't see any reason why the government should not agree with that. Hopefully, we can make such an amendment.

I wanted to ask you about municipal councils being given the power to consider minor variance applications or review decisions from the committee of adjustment. In other words, which would be the body that hears the final appeal? We've heard from a number of people that that's not a good idea for obvious reasons: that councils are very political and it is sometimes hard to be objective. I wonder if you can comment on that. Do you think it's a good idea, a bad idea?

Mr Perlin: In terms of the position of the city with respect to these OMB appeals, this should continue, and that is the preferred practice. Some of the most important planning matters that people ever face in their lives are these small minor variances; they sometimes cause the greatest problem in our city in terms of neighbourhood disputes and community disputes, and "the day in court" that the OMB provides to them is a very important matter.

It's also an important issue, sometimes, for owners-developers who feel they've tried very hard, with neighbouring owners and neighbouring groups, to reach agreement with them and they can't, and feel that they too should have access to the OMB, and they're not all big. Sometimes they're just home owners, they have very limited means, they are trying to get a porch or an addition on and feel that their next-door neighbour or others are being quite unfair and would prefer to have the OMB as the body that does hear that particular dispute and settles it.

In the city of Toronto it's a system that works quite well and indeed provides the greatest deal of problems, in most cases, for matters of dispute. People really do look to the OMB as that neutral body they can go to that's not appointed by city council—so that's one strength, if you like, to it—whereas the committee of adjustment is. Sometimes there's a concern that if you're going for a review, you're going to the same council that appointed the same committee of adjustment, so what type of neutral review are you going to get?

As many of you may know—some of you have worked in municipalities—it's the one time or sometimes the only time in people's lives where they will have the experience of fighting in the neighbourhood for something they really believe in and that they think is going to hurt their community, or, vice versa, something that somebody wishes to do with their property, and it's the most important thing they will ever do. They won't be building Raptor stadiums and SkyDomes and convention centres or going for those major rezonings. Minor variance is their day, and they want their day in court.

Mr Murdoch: Thank you for your presentation. On the first problem you brought up I would like to say to Mr Hardeman that maybe he will take that back and have our legal people look at it and see what they think. You do have some good points there, and we should be able to work something around that.

The second one, and I may be getting it wrong—you're saying we should have an option in there that something like the city of Toronto could choose the option that minor variances do go to the OMB. I come from rural Ontario, and a lot of times I can see where minor variances shouldn't go there. I think councils have a responsibility to make some decisions, and a lot of the time what happens is that minor variances can be held up for a long time with really frivolous objections. I think that's why councils get elected sometimes, to make decisions. Am I hearing that right, that there should be an option in there that, "save if the city of Toronto wants that option," that they should be able to make that the way they would handle their problems?

Mr Perlin: Right now, you have that option in the bill. You have three options. The one that you're speaking to, Mr Murdoch, and that option could be chosen by that council, could stay either final by the council or by a committee of review or a committee that has a council member on it, and that's fine for those municipalities. In the city we're looking at about 150 to 200 that are appealed. It's very difficult for city council to try and deal with those requests, so in effect, in the city the option of going to the OMB is perhaps the most practical option.

Our concern is—not that you take away any of the other options that other municipalities might wish to use—only that the cost should not be charged back to the city of Toronto. That's what this bill provides, that the Ontario Municipal Board may charge the cost of those appeals back, and our concern is that it's unfair to do that to the municipality.

Mr Murdoch: If they choose that one option, yes.

Mr Perlin: If they choose that option, and some people will go with rezonings in order to ensure they get that option, as opposed to minor variances, and that will go without cost to the OMB.

Mr Murdoch: You like Bill 120—you just threw in at the end there that things are okay with basement apartments and that and you like it the way it is now.

Mr Perlin: The city council likes it the way it is now.

Mr Murdoch: Okay, that's just to get it on the record.

The Chair: Thank you, gentlemen, for taking the time to make your presentation this morning.

That being the last agenda item on this morning's calendar, this committee stands in recess until 1 o'clock, back here in room 2.

The committee recessed from 1213 to 1307.

CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO

The Chair: First up this afternoon is the Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto. Good afternoon. We have 25 minutes for you to use as you see fit, divided between the presentation and question-and-answer time.

Mr Malcolm Shookner: Thank you. Our intention is to take about 15 minutes of the 25 to present our brief and then have time for questions. My name is Malcolm Shookner. I am a member of the board of directors of the Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto. I have with me here today Ann Fitzpatrick, who is a community worker for the agency, and Michael Johnson, who is a volunteer on our housing committee.

This submission will outline the mandate and client profile of the Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, the scope and recommendations in our submission, and the negative impact that we believe Bill 20 will have on the wellbeing of children, youth and families with whom we work.

The Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto is the largest board-operated child welfare organization in North America. Annually, our organization works with over 8,000 families and 17,500 children and youth. The Child and Family Services Act mandates our organization to protect children up to age 16 who are at risk for abuse and neglect. Where it is required, we also provide high-quality substitute care and adoption for children. In addition, our services include prevention and support programs to keep children with their families whenever possible.

The children's aid provides social services to some of the most economically and socially vulnerable children, youth and families in Ontario. Fifty-one per cent of our clients are lone-parent-led families; 56% of our clients are in receipt of social assistance; 35% of the children, youth and families we serve are members of racial minorities; 70% of our clients rely on private sector rental housing, 30% of them on subsidized housing.

Since we are one of the few mandated services which visit families in their homes, we have a unique perspective on the impact of accommodation on children and families. Accessing safe, adequate and affordable housing in the public and private housing sector is very difficult for many of our families, including youth in our care who are moving to independent living. Large reductions in social assistance rates for families, extremely low vacancy rates for rental housing in Metro Toronto and long waiting lists for government-subsidized housing have combined to make it very difficult for our clientele to find and keep suitable housing that they can afford. We expect this trend to continue.

The children's aid and other child welfare experts recognize the relationship between children's wellbeing and accessible, affordable and safe housing, and it was for that reason that our board of directors developed a housing policy and adopted it in 1981: "Everyone has a right to adequate, affordable housing, and furthermore it is the role of all levels of government to set and enforce policies in such a way to ensure that this occurs."

Research carried out by the University of Toronto and the children's aid found that housing problems were a factor in 18% of the cases where children were taken into our temporary care. Therefore, housing was a factor in up to 250 child admissions to care in a one-year period. The average cost for a child in care is $1,560 a month. In contrast, prevention and support services to children at home with their parents cost about $124 a month. The emotional and social costs are much harder to measure. We do not think that governments at any level can afford to ignore the basic housing needs and rights of children, youth and their families.

The scope of this submission relates specifically to the sections of Bill 20 that will regulate houses with second units and directly impact on the safety and housing needs of children and youth. In this brief, the terms "accessory apartments," "second units" and "apartments in houses" will be used interchangeably. On all occasions, we're referring to a second, self-contained apartment unit as defined under the Planning Act and the former Residents' Rights Act.

The children's aid worked with hundreds of organizations and individuals across the province leading up to the proclamation of the Residents' Rights Act. We appeared before a standing committee to support the bill in 1994. It is with great disappointment that less than two years later we're facing the repeal of this law.

The Residents' Rights Act was a step forward towards the provision of safer housing for children and families while legalizing and encouraging a small-scale addition to affordable rental housing supply. This legislation created a new level of consistency in every jurisdiction regarding fire safety and planning standards, benefiting homeowners and the children, youth and families living in these apartments.

To repeal this legislation by proclaiming Bill 20 will only serve to hide the development of new accessory units, once again placing children, youth and families at risk. The number of child deaths in unregulated, illegal apartments in houses prior to the passage of the Residents' Rights Act underscores our concern.

We recommend that the section of Bill 20 pertaining to apartments in houses be deleted from this legislation, and we further recommend that the provisions established in the Residents' Rights Act remain in force. This is in the interests of children and families who rely on housing that is accessible, affordable, safe and includes security of tenure.

Now I'd like to ask Ann Fitzpatrick to speak.

Ms Ann Fitzpatrick: I'd like to talk about the impact of Bill 20 on child welfare in terms of access to housing, affordable housing, safe housing and landlord and tenant rights.

Accessing housing is a major problem for many families involved with the children's aid society, and we support every government initiative that expands the number of rental housing options. Approximately 12% of the families we work with lived in basement apartments or apartments in houses in November 1995.

This form of housing provides additional choice for families regarding the housing they can access. Their choices are already seriously limited by low vacancy rates for rental housing—which are at 0.6% in Metro—tenant selection policies that screen out tenants on the basis of their income, long social housing waiting lists and high rental costs.

Apartments in houses are not just a source of housing for our clients; they make up a substantial percentage of the rental housing in the community. The recent Lampert report commissioned by this government states that accessory units "contribute 9% of the 'non-conventional' private housing stock in Ontario."

Since the passage of the Residents' Rights Act, the Ministry of Municipal Affairs has been trying to tabulate the number of new units created. Although not all municipalities gave their stats, as of September 1995, 433 new units have been created, 119 units have been upgraded and 280 inspections of existing units have been completed, 53% of which required smoke alarms.

Apartments in houses are a viable form of housing that expand the choices for low-income parents and children.

The children's aid supports laws and programs that will result in the development of affordable housing options. Many families involved with children's aid pay a large percentage of their income for housing. Since the social assistance rates were cut in November 1995 by 21.6%, the numbers of evictions have reportedly gone up in Metro, there are more households on social assistance unable to pay their rent and the shelters in Metro Toronto have noted a 52% increase in homeless families in the past year. There are over 600 children and another 600 adults who are living in cramped motel rooms on Kingston Road that represent the shelter overflow in Metro Toronto. The CAS has had children come into our care, which is very expensive, due to parents' inability to feed and house their children. More than ever, the province needs to show leadership in supporting solutions to increase affordable apartments to meet this need.

In terms of our experience, apartments in houses are a more affordable form of housing and this has been supported by research done by the Ministry of Municipal Affairs in their report Apartments in Houses, October 1992. Furthermore, the Lampert report once again speaks to the affordability of apartments in houses and they quote:

"Not only do they augment the total supply of rental housing, but they add variety, and particularly with accessory apartments, they comprise a low-rent, low-cost addition to the rental stock that would not be possible without subsidized new construction."

Planning experts, housing experts and child welfare experts have recognized that this is an important source of affordable housing and we think it's necessary for the government to catch up.

We think Bill 20 is going to create obstacles to the development of affordable housing apartments. It removes the overriding as-of-right provision for homeowners who want to add a unit and it returns the powers to municipalities to invoke historically restrictive zoning and planning standards. Mandatory registration systems will add even more red tape and bureaucracy that homeowners will try to avoid.

If history repeats itself, we predict that Bill 20 will reduce the number of legal apartments that are installed, but it will not reduce the number that are created underneath the view of the municipalities. Before the Residents' Rights Act was passed, we need to remind ourselves that 100,000 homeowners in Ontario defied local zoning. They created an underground market of housing units. They were exercising what they saw were their property rights and in some cases it was an economic necessity to prevent mortgage foreclosure. The Residents' Rights Act finally legitimized and regulated this form of affordable housing.

We think homeowners who install apartments in houses are part of the housing solution in Ontario without cost to the government. Private rental starts are at the lowest level in 50 years and there's no solution on the immediate horizon. It's unclear why a public policy that promotes privatization would implement a bill that effectively attacks homeowners' options to make their housing more affordable while meeting a community need. Bill 20, with the added zoning restrictions, will create needless obstacles to inhibit the development of affordable housing.

CAS is concerned that Bill 20 will not be as effective as the Residents' Rights Act in ensuring most apartments in houses are safe and regulated. Our workers make home visits regularly and it was because of some of their concerns about apartments in houses that we advocated for Bill 120 to be passed. We saw Bill 120 and the Residents' Rights Act as the most significant advance in terms of the safety of apartments in houses. The law did provide enforcement tools to a municipality that did not exist before, such as an amended fire code and building code. In contrast, Bill 20 will result in confusion in standards that various apartments must meet and will create greater problems with safety.

From our perspective, there are going to be three tiers of apartments in houses in Ontario after Bill 20 passes: grandfathered units that have one set of standards, a second set of standards for municipalities that allow zoning for new units, and a third tier which is going to be the one where homeowners continue to defy zoning. This is going to be a nightmare in terms of enforcement and in terms of tenants even knowing what kind of housing they're living in.

With few exceptions, prior to the Residents' Rights Act accessory apartments were not permitted in most cities and in most areas across Ontario, which left tenants and homeowners with no property standards, enforcements and supports. Tenants could not, if they were living in an illegally zoned apartment, phone their local city to enforce any standards because they would be at risk of having that unit shut down. People want safe housing; they don't want to lose their housing. Under Bill 20 tenants have little to look forward to. Once again, in unregulated housing they're going to be in a safety limbo.

One of the tools municipalities have as the result of the Residents' Rights Act is an amended fire code that makes specific standards for basement apartments and apartments in houses. Section 9.8 of the fire code came into effect in July 1994, and within 30 days homeowners had to install smoke detectors. Since the passage of Bill 120, there has been one fire fatality in Ontario, in contrast to seven fire deaths between January 1994 and July 1994 involving several children.

In July 1996 further regulations will come into effect regarding exits and fire containment. We believe this new fire code regulation was a big step forward in promoting safety for children and families. Homeowners can face big fines and there are liability issues if they don't comply, and tenants don't have to be afraid of losing their housing if they phone to complain. With Bill 20, we're not certain how homeowners are going to see whether they need to comply with this or not.

Regarding enforcement powers, Bill 20 proposes to give municipalities added powers to have every home registered. In our opinion, this is an excessive regulation and will do more harm than good. Apartments in houses represent 9% of the non-conventional housing market and as such they should be considered part of the regular housing stock and should not require a parallel system of enforcement. Apartments in houses and their tenants should be treated in an equal fashion with other tenants and have the same access to property standard staff and fire staff on a complaint basis.

A separate costly registration system for over 100,000 units is going to be another disincentive for homeowners to come forward and will result in an underground market of these units. With municipal grants reduced on an average of 20% or more, it's not economically feasible to set up this kind of system unless it's financed by homeowners, and fees are expensive. Wouldn't you rather see homeowners spend their money on smoke alarms and safety upgrades rather than registration fees?

Prior to the passage of Bill 20, if tenants were living in an apartment in a house that was illegal due to zoning, legal clinics and tenants faced confusion and inconsistency in landlord and tenant court. Tenants were in a legal limbo, they were like second-class citizens, and in all cases they did not have their rights upheld regarding evictions, privacy and other aspects of the Landlord and Tenant Act. The Residents' Rights Act finally ensured that tenants in accessory units have the same rights as other tenants in Ontario. Bill 20 will leave a growing number of tenant households vulnerable and uncertain in terms of their landlord and tenant rights.

Mr Shookner: A couple of concluding remarks: The Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto has had years of direct experience working in the homes of families, children and youth who live in apartments in houses. We urge this committee to delete the section of Bill 20 pertaining to apartments in houses and recommend that the provisions established in the Residents' Rights Act remain in force.

By enacting that law, the former government showed leadership by effectively balancing the safety and rights of tenants, homeowners, the need for affordable housing and good planning with long-standing municipal resistance to accessory units. This law was in the best interests of children and families who rely on housing that is accessible, affordable, safe and includes security of tenure.

Apartments in houses are a reality in Ontario. Families, children, youth, students, seniors, the disabled and thousands of social assistance recipients rely on this form of housing. Again, the Lampert report estimates it's about 9% of the non-conventional housing stock.

Many centres in Ontario, including Metro Toronto, are facing a crisis in rental housing with vacancy rates nearing zero. Homelessness is on the rise, and overcrowding. As Ann mentioned earlier, we've already filled up the motels on Kingston Road with homeless families that the shelters can't take, and this is before the changes that we anticipate coming from this new legislation. We may have to start using the hotels downtown pretty soon to fill them up with homeless people because there won't be any place else to put them.

We believe that the province of Ontario must take responsibility by investing in creative and sustainable housing solutions. The Residents' Rights Act was a positive solution, long overdue. It would be a serious mistake to repeal this law and would jeopardize the wellbeing of thousands of children and families. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Hampton: One of the arguments that the government is making is that this whole issue should be left in the hands of municipal authorities, that municipal authorities are in the best position to deal with this issue. What's your sense of how responsibly municipal governments have dealt with this issue in the past? Do you have any views on that?

Ms Fitzpatrick: Sure. I would be very concerned about putting the powers back into the hands of municipalities. I have had direct experience in trying to support, make deputations to city councils, making these same arguments. Since 1989, when the Liberal government introduced the housing policy statement, very few municipalities on a voluntary basis came forward with bylaws that would permit accessory apartments in certain areas. There has been a vehement opposition to apartments in houses by municipalities, and I see no reason why that's going to change.

The other thing I've seen at first hand, being on the board of a shelter that was developing in one city and being familiar with the non-profit developments across municipalities, is that the not-in-my-backyard syndrome is very pervasive when it comes to trying to get planning approvals for housing developments that relate to low-income people. Our history has been that zoning and planning decisions are being made on the basis of who is going to live in a development, as in an accessory apartment or a social housing building, versus legitimate planning concerns. In answer to your question, we aren't confident that municipalities will act progressively or responsibly on this issue.

Mr Hampton: We've had a number of presentations on this part of the bill. The sense we get is that the market for these types of apartments is going to grow astronomically. Whether they are legal or illegal, the market is going to grow astronomically because there will be so many people in need of less expensive housing in apartments and there will be a number of homeowners who, in effect, need to supplement their income.

The sense I get is that the choice is not between having these apartments and not having them. We will have them. The choice is between ensuring that they are safe, that they meet fire code, that they meet electrical code, that they're healthy places to live, on the one hand, which I think would come with regulation and as of right for property owners, and on the other hand, ignoring their existence and putting up with all kinds of unsafe conditions in terms of fire inspection, electrical inspection and other things. What's your sense?

Ms Fitzpatrick: I agree with most of what you said except that I don't necessarily think, based on history, we're going to see an explosion or a flood of new units. I think there is a market for them, but homeowners have to be in a special situation to want to add a secondary unit to their home. I think if you look at the statistics that the ministry has collected over the last 18 months when the Residents' Rights Act has been in place—we haven't heard from every municipality, but you're not seeing a flood. There still will be some homeowners who may put in units without safety standards, but the idea is they're in the regulatory framework and they can be brought forward.

But I think the issue is, all the other statements that you said I think are true, that they're going to keep coming on stream in a regulatory framework or not, and providing the as-of-right zoning provides one less burden for homeowners and I believe provides more of an incentive for homeowners to phone the city and say, "How do I do this right?" because they're not in fear that they're going to be told, "No, you can't do it."

Mr Murdoch: Do you actually believe in municipal government?

Mr Shookner: Yes.

Mr Murdoch: Okay, that's one good thing. What about local autonomy then?

Mr Shookner: Where local autonomy results in people being put at a severe disadvantage or their health and safety being at risk, I think there are limits to local autonomy, which is where a provincial role comes in.

Mr Murdoch: So you think the provincial should do that. Okay. I just want to know where you're coming from.

It's really strange to sit here and listen to people advocate, basically, that if we don't do something, people will break the law. I mean, they're breaking the law when they put apartments in houses when it's against the zoning. That's against the law. We seem to sit here, or some people do, and say: "That's fine. That's going to happen willy-nilly. It doesn't matter. We can break the law in this country and it doesn't really make any difference."

I find it really disturbing that our society has come to that and that you could sit there and say, if we pass Bill 20, people are still going to break the law. This is very disturbing for society, and if that's the way you feel society has gone, then I think we're in trouble, because that's what you're saying.

Ms Fitzpatrick: On an issue like this, when a homeowner puts an apartment in against zoning, I think in a sense they're voting, they're trying to tell elected officials what makes common sense in their lives and in communities. The fact of the matter is that they're not breaking into stores, they're not imposing on someone else. What they're trying to do is create some housing within their own private property and they're providing housing for another tenant.

We're not advocating for people to break the law. We're asking for municipalities to catch up with the economic realities of our time. Both homeowners and tenants have a lot of economic needs that our governments are not addressing and maybe cannot be expected to address. We're saying give homeowners the autonomy.

Mr Murdoch: It's strange, though, we vote by breaking the law. That's why we have elections. They get a chance to vote for these people in their elections.

Mr Hampton: Bill, who's the Premier who said that tax evasion is only human nature?

Mr Murdoch: Howard, if you'd like to debate with me, why don't you ask the Chair if maybe we can have a debate here?

Mr Hampton: Bill, I'm trying to help you out. Who's the Premier who said that tax evasion is only human nature?

Mr Murdoch: I don't know who the Premier is. That's your job, to find that out, not my job. I'm saying that here we're advocating to vote by breaking the law.

Mr Shookner: Excuse me. I think you have misunderstood what we're trying to say. We did not say what you're suggesting we said.

Mr Murdoch: The lady said we vote by putting that in there—

Mr Shookner: Your interpretation of that is wrong. I think the record will show that.

Mr Murdoch: —and that's not the way to vote. We have elections to vote.

Mr Shookner: We also have committees and legislatures to vote.

Mr Hoy: Thank you for being here today. I assume you're good, outstanding citizens who are not here with any intention of condoning the breaking of laws, but I do understand that you want to amend or change an impending law. Your presentation is probably testing the capacities of the present provincial government to make good law. I appreciate your being here. The question of whether we require municipal levels of government or provincial government is not really the question here. We're talking about Bill 20 and a change to some law.

You mentioned the municipal grants that have been cut, and you mention 20%. I assume you chose that figure for some reason, maybe a generalization. I can tell you, just during the noon-hour break I was looking at a municipality's cut of 31%. The government would say: "If municipalities must do some inspection of these apartments, they can charge fees, and there's no problem here. You can be cut 32%, 20%, 18%, as a municipality, and you have the ability to charge fees." Fine. What about the ability of those to pay the fees? Do you have any comment about that?

Mr Shookner: As a corollary to the statement that there's only one taxpayer, there's only one taxpayer-feepayer, in the sense that whatever requirements of the provincial or municipal governments to raise money to conduct what they think is important is going to come out of the pockets of all of us in varying degrees. To shift the focus to municipal governments and put them in the position that they have to charge fees for services like this, if they're going to try to do the right thing, they're going to take the heat as well for the adverse affects of this kind of legislation.

I think an underlying question here is, what are the appropriate roles of the provincial and municipal governments in trying to create an adequate environment within which—what we care about here today is environments within which children and families and youth can live in a reasonably healthy and safe and secure way. Governments have a role to play in this. The market will not do the job. We know from experience that that's the case. That's a long answer to your question.

The Chair: Thank you, all, for taking the time to make your presentation before us. We appreciate your comments.

Ms Churley: Mr Chair, before we go to our next presentation, I'd like to make a motion. I move that this committee formally request the Minister of Environment and Energy to appear before this committee during the first day of clause-by-clause deliberations to answer questions relating to the effect of the Planning Act amendments, Bill 20, on the environment and the people of the province of Ontario.

I make this motion because yesterday when I made a motion to request the minister to appear before this committee during public hearings, the government members denied that request. One of the reasons given by Dr Galt was that it was not necessary for the minister to be here because he is the parliamentary assistant to the minister and could act on his behalf. Well, he isn't even here today.

I will be introducing amendments to Bill 20, because I see this as a very destructive bill when it comes to the environment. I believe it will take us back decades in terms of environmental protection. We have not heard from the Minister of Environment and Energy at all regarding this bill, and she has to be accountable to the people of this province regarding the areas of the bill that relate to the environment, of which there are many, and she must be available to provide comments and information on such a very important bill that seems about to be passed by this government.

Mr John R. Baird (Nepean): Mr Chairman, I would respectfully say that we had the debate on this yesterday. It's relatively the same motion. Could we just call the question and vote on it?

The Chair: That's a function of when debate ceases, Mr Baird. Any further debate?

Ms Churley: I want to make it very clear that this is a different motion from yesterday. We're about to hear from CELA. I've had a chance to look through this document. This is a very well-respected organization, consisting of environmental lawyers and policy people. They have, as we will hear in a few minutes, very serious concerns about the impacts this Planning Act, if it's passed as it's before us now, will have on the environment. I think it's absolutely crucial, and I would expect that the backbenchers of this government will want to know, before just willy-nilly going along with passing this bill the way it is, the implications it's going to have on the environment and on the health of the people in their own communities. I can't believe they don't want to hear from the minister so they themselves will have more knowledge when we're going through clause-by-clause, with amendments coming forward, about the implications of the bill. It's unbelievable.

Mr Hardeman: I would first ask the Chair to rule on whether the motion is in fact in order. I deem it to be the same motion that was dealt with at 6 last night. After the ruling of the Chair, I would like to debate the motion, if the Chair rules that it is in order.

The Chair: It is in order, Mr Hardeman. It's substantively different inasmuch as the request is for a specific day, namely, the first day of clause-by-clause.

Mr Murdoch: The parliamentary assistant, you mentioned, couldn't be here today, but he was here yesterday, I understand.

Mr Baird: He told you he wouldn't be here today.

Ms Churley: I don't know about that, but I do know we have a very important presentation, for instance, coming up now, and I am disappointed. He gave the reason it wasn't necessary to have the Minister of Environment and Energy here: because he was here to represent the minister.

Mr Baird: He said yesterday he wouldn't be here.

Ms Churley: None the less, I think my motion makes it very clear why I'm asking that at some point—and I'm being specific: during clause-by-clause, when we are putting forward amendments—we all know what's going on here. I would hope you'd want that information yourself.

Mr Murdoch: Certainly, and I'll do my best to know what's going on myself and talk to different people we hear in submissions, but I understand Mr Galt will be here, hopefully, when we go through clause-by-clause. As you know, parliamentary assistants are somewhat as bright as the minister. Somebody may object or may disagree with that, but you know that. Your motion maybe is not out of order, in terms of putting the motion in, but I think it shouldn't be passed at this time. We should make sure we have capable people here to answer any questions you'd like answered, but not necessarily that it has to be the minister.

When you tie it down like that, it's unfortunate we can't vote for something like that or I can't support it. But I have no problem having people here who are expert and things like that, and we do have different ones within the ministry. That's why I think it's a little premature to say that at this point. We still have two more weeks of meetings and all kinds more presentations come to us, and I think we should wait until then and look at it then.

Mr Hoy: Having been here yesterday when the parliamentary assistant was speaking about the possibility of the minister coming before the committee, his suggestion was that his presence was enough to satisfy.

Mr Baird: He said yesterday he wouldn't be here.

Mr Hoy: That isn't the case, though.

Mr Baird: Check the record. He said he would not be here.

Mr Hoy: The request was made for clause-by-clause. Yes, we do have other weeks of hearings to come, but certainly the minister would be able to respond to those at that time, and I will be supporting the motion.

Ms Churley: I found Mr Murdoch's suggestion very interesting. If this motion is lost, I'd be happy to take him up on the offer that the parliamentary assistant will be able to answer questions on behalf of the Minister of Environment and Energy. In terms of process I'd have to ask you, Chair, but if this motion fails, which it appears it's going to, I'd like to put that forward as a motion. But I assume I have to wait until we deal with this one.

Mr Hardeman: I will not be supporting the resolution. Contrary to the Chair's ruling, I believe that the resolution yesterday dealt with the appearance of the Minister of Environment and Energy at these committee hearings. I do not believe that just changing the time and defining the time that they would or would not appear changes the resolution.

Having said that, I want to point out that in terms of the minister being here to speak as it relates to the delegations that will be coming forward and the fact that the parliamentary assistant is unavailable to be here today to hear the presentation, I suggest that if the minister came to the clause-by-clause, she would not have had the opportunity to hear any of the delegations. I suggest that the ability of the parliamentary assistant to address the issues and the clause-by-clause will still be as well served as it was previously.

I would also point out that the Canadian Environmental Law Association, which the presenters will be members of, has had meetings with the minister where a number of people were in attendance to discuss the issues, and in fact they have been requested to meet with the minister to discuss the policy statements but at this point have not yet agreed to do that. I think we should carry on hearing the delegations as they come forward to speak to the bill. I will not be voting for the resolution.

Mr Murdoch: I think when we go into clause-by-clause we should have a free-wheeling discussion and everybody should be able to put their points on, and I'm sure we'll have as many people with expertise as we can here, different parliamentary assistants. Municipal Affairs is here today, and I'm sure Doug will be here. He can't be here all the time. I know he left. You knew yesterday he wouldn't be here. I haven't been here for two days, unfortunately, but we can't always be here.

Ms Churley: That's okay. We forgive you.

Mr Murdoch: Thanks, Marilyn. I'm always happy when Marilyn will forgive me.

I think we should get on. I think we'll have that free-wheeling discussion. I hope to be here for clause-by-clause too, and then we can get at some of these issues that the opposition so dearly wants to.

The Chair: Seeing no further debate, I'll put the question. All those in favour of the motion?

Ms Churley: A recorded vote, please.

Ayes

Churley, Hoy.

Nays

Baird, Fisher, Hardeman, Murdoch, Ouellette, Skarica, Smith.

The Chair: By a vote of 7 to 2, the motion fails.

Ms Churley: Okay, I have another motion. I move that this committee formally requests the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Environment and Energy to make a presentation before this committee during the first day of clause-by-clause deliberations and answer questions relating to the effect of the Planning Act amendments, Bill 20, on the environment and the people of the province of Ontario.

Mr Murdoch: I still think it's premature. I don't think we need to do this at this time. I think you're way ahead of yourself. I don't like to see anybody play games, and I'm sure you're not. As I said on the other one, I think you're premature in this motion. I think we've got to wait and see what we get. Who knows? Maybe by the end of this you'll be so full of wisdom that you won't need any wisdom from us. I think we should just let it go and defeat your motion and let's get on with business and later on bring up some of these ideas you have.

Ms Churley: Mr Chair, with all due respect, we were not able to get any credible answers from the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing on the first day about the impact on the environment. With all due respect to the parliamentary assistant to the minister, he's been full of very flowery language about what a wonderful job this government is doing on the environment but doesn't seem to understand what's within this bill. I would like to make sure that he is aware, in terms of his duties as parliamentary assistant to be fully apprised of the implications to the environment, and that we have somebody involved in that ministry, one of the politicians involved in that ministry—I think we deserve that as a committee—come in here willing to give a presentation and answer questions, for everyone's comfort. I think that is extremely important.

It is not premature. Perhaps it might even prevent other motions tomorrow and the day after and the day after, in terms of me trying to get this government to agree to have some presentation and questions answered at some time in this process. I would urge the members to agree to this motion today. It makes sense. I don't see why anybody should have any problems with it.

Mrs Fisher: Mr Chair, I do understand Ms Churley's concerns. We are all sitting here. We are all in receipt of the delegations and presentations being made. We will have an opportunity, through clause-by-clause, to do our debating as necessary. We'll also have another opportunity in the House to do the same, and I do happen to agree with Mr Murdoch's statement that there'll be an opportunity, a time and a place to make that happen. We know we have credible people in our party who can represent the ideas and the interests that are being discussed at the table. We'll make sure they're here. So I would urge the rest of our caucus members to vote against the motion at this time.

Mr Hardeman: Mr Chairman, I agree with the last speaker. The parliamentary assistant to the Ministry of Environment and Energy was appointed to this committee, subbed into this committee, because of his expertise and his involvement with the Ministry of Environment and Energy. I have all confidence that Mr Galt will be present during the clause-by-clause debate and I have no reason to assume that he would not be prepared to answer questions as they were asked, so I do not believe it's appropriate to pass a resolution that that in fact must happen.

As the process is unfolding, it in all probability will happen. I think we should carry on and hear from the delegations who are here to present to us, rather than to sit and debate who should and who should not be sitting around the table on the first day of clause-by-clause.

Mr Hoy: Would you repeat the motion for me, please?

Ms Churley: I move that this committee formally request the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Environment and Energy to make a presentation before this committee during the first day of clause-by-clause deliberations and answer questions relating to the effect of the Planning Act amendments, Bill 20, on the environment and the people of the province of Ontario.

The Chair: Thank you. Is there any further debate? Seeing none, I'll put the question.

Ms Churley: Recorded vote.

Ayes

Churley, Hoy.

Nays

Baird, Fisher, Hardeman, Murdoch, Ouellette, Skarica, Smith.

The Chair: By a vote of 7 to 2, the motion fails.

Ms Churley: I don't know what you're so afraid of.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL LAW ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next presentation this afternoon is the Canadian Environmental Law Association. Good afternoon. Sorry for the delay. We appreciate your indulgence.

Ms Kathleen Cooper: Thank you. Before I begin, I just want to clarify something that Mr Hardeman just said in the context of that debate you just went through. In fact, there were no meetings with the Canadian Environmental Law Association and the Minister of Environment and Energy on the matter of amendments to the Planning Act, as I think I heard you say. There should have been. There were not.

There was very little consultation during the fall as very quickly these changes to the Planning Act and the policies were made. There was one very brief meeting with members of citizens and environmental groups in September concerning possible changes to the Planning Act. That was not consultation, as far as I am concerned. I just think it's important to clarify that matter. Now, on to my presentation.

Just for your information, the Canadian Environmental Law Association is a non-profit, public-interest organization specializing in environmental law and policy. We have had at least eight years of experience in land use planning work in Ontario. Four years ago we assisted with the formation of the land use caucus of the Ontario Environment Network, which is a network of over 90 citizens and environmental groups from across the province.

Through that structure, we have worked with citizens and environmental groups across the province on matters of land use planning reform, both in terms of direct client representation and in the consultation that was undertaken by the previous government on planning reform.

Those organizations with which we have worked have detailed involvement in planning issues in their communities all the way to OMB hearings. That's just some background on who CELA is and whom we have worked with on this matter.

Just to summarize the concerns we have with Bill 20, the changes in this so-called Land Use Planning and Protection Act are regressive in many respects. We believe that the bill will remove essential planning tools and thereby contribute to continued environmental damage, urban sprawl and renewed delays in the planning process. The bill will also contribute to excessive costs as a result of both delay and conflict during the process itself and as a result of bad planning decisions.

A little bit of history. The need to reform planning was well known in the late 1980s. It's fair to say that the controversy around planning decisions contributed to the fall of the Liberal government in the late 1980s. Much of that controversy surrounded the inability of the system to adequately address environmental concerns.

With the establishment of the Sewell commission, there was in Ontario one of the most extensive consultations I have ever participated in and that I think this province, perhaps even Canada, has ever seen. The planning reform package that was developed was a result of extensive consultation and compromise and represented a broad consensus and a very valuable step forward in Ontario. Bill 20 reverses those reforms. In particular, it reverses reforms that were broadly supported by citizens' groups, by environmental groups that have extensive experience in the land use planning system.

I want to draw your attention for a moment to the media background that was distributed on the day that Bill 20 was introduced. On a fact sheet about changes to the planning process, the introductory paragraph says: "A coalition of municipal leaders, planners and developers, the people who actually use the land use planning system, says the current system hurts Ontario's competitive position."

I can't emphasize enough to you how insulting citizens' groups and individuals and environmental groups that have been deeply involved in this process find that statement, that they are not people who actually use the land use planning system. These are thousands of people across the province: They are ratepayers' groups, they are cottagers' associations, they are individuals and members of citizen and environmental groups. They have spent thousands of hours of their own time volunteering and thousands of dollars of their own money, taking precious time away from their families, because they care very deeply about their communities, about the environment and about the shape of their communities. They use the land use planning system just as much as municipal leaders, planners and developers do.

Nor are the changes in Bill 20 supported by the public at large. There have been several polls recently; every six months there are opinion polls done of Canadians' views on the environment. The most recently published one, in October, pointed out that a very high percentage—I think it's 78%—of Canadians supports increased environmental regulation in Canada and does not support reliance on voluntary encouragement as a strategy for pollution reduction and environmental controls. The changes in Bill 20 essentially—and I'll get into it in a minute—go back to a voluntary approach because of the vagueness of the language of subsection 3(5).

There was another poll in the greater Toronto area which found that residents thought that provision of environmental services ranked first among all municipal services listed, and most survey respondents wanted spending increased on environmental protection. That public faith in effective environmental regulation seems well placed.

There was another survey done by KPMG consultants in 1994. It was a survey of managers in Canadian companies, hospitals, municipalities, universities and school boards. When those managers who had environmental management policies in place were asked what had motivated them to establish the policies, 95% said the number one motivator was compliance with regulation, 69% were motivated by potential director liability and only 16% were motivated by voluntary government programs.

There is similar scientific consensus of the need for environmental protection: the need to protect the intrinsic value of biodiversity, the need to reverse environmental degradation and the need to ensure a healthy environment as the basis for a healthy economy. There are several citations provided for you in this brief to support those statements.

There's equally broad consensus about the need to curb urban sprawl and scattered rural development. Again, there are many citations in this brief about the need to curb sprawl, including support from the Provincial Auditor of Ontario, who pointed out in his most recent annual report that there was "significant progress" made with the previous government's land use planning reform package towards establishing "specific roles and responsibilities for the province and municipalities, helping to eliminate inconsistencies and unnecessary duplication in planning decisions."

As well, there are many studies in the United States and in Europe pointing to the need to move towards a more compact form of development. The recently published Golden commission report and background reports equally stress the need to curb sprawl for the sake of environmental protection and saving costs.

The need to curb sprawl also has not escaped the scrutiny of bond raters. In 1990, bond raters gave Howard county, Maryland, which is near Baltimore and Washington, DC, an AAA bond rating. They said the limits that were placed by the county on development, including a farm land preservation program, enhanced the county's fiscal integrity by demonstrating a commitment to a high quality of life and controlling the costs of development.

These widely held views of the need for environmental protection and the need to curb sprawl did not escape the authors of Bill 20. However, the importance of environmental protection only survived into the title of the bill.

The word "protection" in the title is a misrepresentation of the content of the bill and the associated regressive changes that have been made to the proposed provincial policy statement. In fact, I would submit that the government is trying to apply a false green veneer over essentially political favouritism to the development industry by making the changes that have been made in Bill 20.

More importantly, under this, what I consider to be a false green veneer, the stated goal of streamlining the process and saving costs will not be met by Bill 20. The reason for that is because the key changes that have been made in Bill 20 substantially reinstate the planning system that was in place in the late 1980s and for which there were so many calls for reform. In particular, the decision to go back to the standard of "shall have regard for" policies in subsection 3(5) of the act means that we will again have situations where policy will be ignored. On top of that, the language that has been chosen in the changes makes the rules very vague, so we have vague rules that can be ignored.

The key point is that what the government has done in Bill 20 is stripped municipalities of the tools to say no when they need to say no. There was a key provision in the old policies and backed up by the "shall be consistent with" standard in subsection 3(5) that came to be called the "'no' means 'no.'" It was a provision to protect natural heritage areas from development. It was finally a provision where "no" meant "no." It didn't mean "maybe," it didn't mean "later"; it meant "no."

The reason we will go back to the site-specific battles each time a development application comes along instead of the goal of upfront planning that was the original objective, and I'll give you an example—there are several examples in this brief for you to review. Without the tool, without the ability to say no when they want to say no, if they're in a situation where they want to say no to a development that could be potentially environmentally destructive—if they say no, developers will challenge them at the OMB. If they say yes, citizens' groups will challenge them if they have a chance; there's no intervenor funding, they have limited resources etc.

The point here is that it appears you're under the impression that if you strip away the environmental protection tools, public concern and motivation to protect the environment will also disappear, and that is simply not the case, that the result will be community discord and costly delay.

Another problem with Bill 20 is that the government has removed important quality control measures concerning official plans. There's no longer a definition of an official plan in the act. The ability to prescribe the contents of official plans is deleted. This was essentially a quality control measure that was widely supported during the four years of consultation that led up to the previous reform package. If you add that vagueness to the ability to process a private official plan amendment in 90 days, we're going to see a return to being able to criticize official plans as being neither official nor a plan.

There are also important deletions in Bill 20 of planning tools that will enable municipalities to curb urban and rural sprawl and ensure public involvement. On the matter of tools to curb sprawl, some of the changes that have been made, the bill takes out the restriction on municipalities on exclusive zoning. It takes out the apartments-in-houses provision. It takes out the prematurity test whereby if developments come forward before the servicing is in place, municipalities have the ability to say no on the basis of prematurity. All of those were tools that enabled municipalities to ensure a movement towards more compact form, transit-supportive land use planning etc., all those things are removed. There are several restrictions as well on public involvement that are of concern.

I will turn now to some of the examples that are in here to make the point why I think we are basically going back to the old system. Because we are reinstating a system of vague rules that can be ignored, we're back into the same situation that's existed, for example, in Eagle Creek and West Carleton. That was a situation in the late 1980s where the West Carleton township council approved a golf course development as compatible with the function of a class 1 wetland. The MNR, the Wetlands Preservation Group of West Carleton and a private citizen objected and the proposal was the subject of a lengthy OMB hearing.

Despite these objections and despite the fact that the matter was going to a hearing, construction of the golf course went ahead. The OMB did in fact conclude that environmental damage occurred during the construction of the golf course and that the operation of the golf course would lead to ongoing environmental degradation, which has occurred. The rezoning necessary to operate the golf course was denied by the OMB. Nevertheless, the golf course was built. The township decided, through a sort of interesting, circuitous route that I won't get into—it's in a footnote—decided not to prosecute for contravention of the zoning bylaw and the mayor was given an honorary membership in the golf course.

In this situation, local citizens, The Ministry of Natural Resources, the OMB all concluded that a golf course was indeed incompatible with the function of a class 1 wetland. The provincial wetlands policy statement was only in draft form at the time, but it did provide that development interfering with the function of a wetland should be prohibited. The township spent over $100,000 defending its decision, only to hear from the OMB that indeed the development would interfere with the function of the wetland and should not have been allowed. The Ministry of Natural Resources had to spend tens of thousands of dollars on the matter as well. Meanwhile, the golf course was constructed and, as I have noted, controversy over pesticide and fertilizer contamination from the site continues to the present day.

This example is typical of situations where policy is ignored at every step of the process despite the views of provincial officials and objections and interventions of local citizens. The matter had to drag on for over two years and a lengthy OMB hearing only to confirm what the province and citizens had maintained from the start. It also underscores the difficulty of small municipalities to exercise independent judgement and to properly evaluate the environmental implications of development proposals.

The point here with the vagueness in the rules and the ability to ignore the rules is that with clarity, as existed in Bill 163, as to the status of policy, that is, it shall be consistent with, "We mean it; yes, you should apply it," and a clear "No means no" on development in provincially significant wetlands, this kind of development could have been directed to a more appropriate location and a lot of time and money could have been saved.

This kind of situation can now be repeated from Kenora to Cornwall, and it will be, because people will continue to be concerned about these kinds of proposals and the municipalities will not have the tools to say no to these kinds of proposals.

I want to draw your attention to a typographical error in the next example. It's on page 13, the discussion of Sydenham Mills in Grey county, a matter that Mr Murdoch will have some familiarity with. In the first paragraph, where it says, "This plan would have built about 25 estate residential homes," 25 is the correct number; however, further down where it notes that nearby residents were concerned about "the installation of up to 40 wells and septic tanks," that should say "up to 25 wells and septic tanks." It's in the second-last line of page 13. If you could correct that, I would appreciate it. I just noticed that while I was sitting down.

Mr Murdoch: I'm getting a question on that for you.

Ms Cooper: Okay.

This situation is another example of lack of policy tools to say no to environmentally harmful developments and the unnecessary expenditure of enormous amounts of time and money by many different people who are involved.

This was a very complicated situation. The proposal was a plan of subdivision in the headwaters of the Spey River. The area is characterized by springs, crevices, easily blown-over trees and generally obvious indicators of a very shallow water table. Local residents nearby were very concerned about the water table effects of this development because they frequently experienced spring flooding and didn't want to see clearing and installation of wells and septic right in the headwater areas. The ministries of Environment and Natural Resources also noted the potential for even more distant downstream impacts along the Spey River if development were allowed in the headwater area.

At the same time that there was a plan-of-subdivision application circulating in the province and local citizens had asked the minister to declare a provincial interest in the matter, the developers decided to make a separate application at the local level for eight severances and a roadway, presumably to avoid provincial scrutiny by applying for a series of consent applications at the local level as opposed to a plan of subdivision that has to be circulated at the provincial level. This technique is often referred to as subdivision by consent.

After many months of debate, a review of the proposal by the Environmental Assessment Advisory Committee, the many aspects of this matter ended up in four weeks' worth of hearings at the Ontario Municipal Board. The ministries of Environment, Natural Resources and Municipal Affairs were all separately represented by counsel, the appellant was represented by counsel and of course the proponent was.

Incredible amounts of money were spent on lawyers and consultants to debate the merits of this proposal, and after all the time and effort that was expended, it became clear that no amount of engineering would address the water table concerns that were raised right from the start. The board's decision discussed the inappropriateness of the proposal on this particular site and the approach taken by Grey county officials to such matters in general.

There's a quote in the brief from the board's decision, "Although the proposed housing may well be desirable and marketable, it is in no way essential nor is this the only location in Grey county where such housing can be located." The board also said, "However, even if it was the last site in Grey county, the board would still consider the risks unacceptable."

The board went on to say, "In the board's view and considering the letter and obvious intent of the Planning Act and this official plan, there are major flaws in the approach taken by the county planners and council to this proposal and generally to estate residential housing in the rural areas of Grey county."

Once again, this situation illustrates the need for clear policy with clear status to give municipalities the tools to say no up front when they need to. That is what you're stripping out of Bill 20 and the policy statements.

I should probably stop there. There are five examples for you to review and a detailed discussion of the excessive costs of sprawl. Given the broad matters of public concern and public interest raised about this bill and the policies, we urge the withdrawal of Bill 20 and the proposed provincial policy statements. Sorry to go on too long.

The Vice-Chair: It's not too bad. We will have one very short question from each of the parties. We will start with the PCs, please.

Mr Hardeman: I just want to clarify. I think at the start of the presentation there was some discussion about the meeting. In fact, I understand there was a meeting with the Ontario Environment Network held in September with the minister, at which about 40 people were present. There may be some debate whether that is consultation, but I just wanted to clarify for the record that the meeting did take place. I also wanted to point out for the record—

Ms Cooper: No, that is not true. I'm sorry, that is not true.

Mr Hardeman: Well, we will check it further. That's the record that's here, and obviously I was not at the meeting so I cannot personally—

Ms Cooper: Neither was I.

Mr Hardeman: —say it happened, but I've been informed that the meeting took place. I also wanted to point out that the Canadian Environmental Law Society was invited to attend the stakeholders' meeting with Mr Galt; we had previous debate to talk about the policy statements, but at this point in time they have refused to meet to discuss the impending policy statements, which are presently out for discussion. I just wanted to put those two items on the record.

Ms Cooper: May I respond?

Mr Hardeman: I also wanted to, going to your first—
The Vice-Chair: Excuse me, Mr Hardeman. I'm sorry to cut you off, but—

Ms Churley: She should have the opportunity to respond to—

The Vice-Chair: It's not a question, and I'm just—

Mr Hardeman: It's a statement.

The Vice-Chair: There's not a question involved in this. He was making a statement. The official opposition, please.

Mr Gerretsen: We gladly yield our time to Mr Murdoch, since we feel that whatever he would say would obviously help our cause.

Mr Murdoch: I'm certainly appreciative of my friend across the way. I'll have to be more careful of what I say to him from now on and be nice.

I'd just like to point out, because I don't have a lot of time and we could debate this and the Mills one all the time, that under the previous bill, which is Bill 163 under the NDP government, they've just approved a subdivision—not just; about six months ago, before the election—closer to the Spey head with no problems. So unfortunately it's an all-draft approval. So all this was in somebody's mind, who had a vendetta against people who were involved. I'm sorry, they've just approved a subdivision closer to the Spey River. Right, that's fine, the NDP government.

Ms Cooper: Not under the rules of Bill 163 or the new policies.

Mr Murdoch: Yes.

Ms Cooper: No.

Mr Murdoch: They did. They just approved it. Well, that bill was in power at least eight months ago and that's when it was approved. It had draft approval. I'm sorry.

Ms Cooper: I think it's important as a matter for the record here that Mr Murdoch had a conflict of interest. He had a development interest in—

Mr Murdoch: No, no conflict. Careful.

Ms Cooper: You had to declare a conflict many times with respect to the Sydenham Mills development—

Mr Murdoch: No, I didn't declare any conflict. Let's get it right.

Ms Cooper: —as chair of the local conservation authority, as the reeve of Sydenham township, and when you were involved on the Grey county planning advisory committee and the Grey county planning approvals committee, you had to declare conflicts repeatedly over the Sydenham Mills proposal.

Mr Murdoch: There's one more. You forgot I was chair of the conservation authority too.

Ms Cooper: Right.

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me. We're not into debate here. I thank you.

Ms Cooper: I think it's important to put that on the record.

The Vice-Chair: I thank you very much. Again, it was a statement; it wasn't a question. I thank Mr Gerretsen for forfeiting his time. On to the third party, please.

Ms Churley: Very quickly, back to the consultation issue, this government is not listening to what you have to say anyway.

Ms Cooper: Clearly.

Ms Churley: They only listen to developers on this. I just want to get into the whole consultation area. I want you to clarify and be able to respond to what Mr Hardeman said. But I also want to ask—you saw the headline in the Globe and Mail today: "Ontario Unfettering Dump Firms." Were you consulted on that? Were you consulted on any of the other masses, pages and pages worth, of deregulation and cuts that are going on in the Ministry of the Environment and Energy?

Ms Cooper: Starting with the Planning Act, we did not see the point of attending the recent meeting with respect to the proposed provincial policy statement. We felt the time for consultation was prior to issuing this draft which is when the development community and the Association of Municipalities of Ontario were consulted—we were not—on the changes to the policy.

The views we have on provincial policies are a matter of public record for the last four years. We basically did not feel like wasting any further time. We had to focus on this committee. We will do a written response to the changes to the policy.

With respect to the other consultations, there was no meeting with 40 members of the Ontario Environment Network in September. That is false.

The Vice-Chair: Excuse me. I think you've answered the question.

Ms Cooper: She asked me several other questions. Did you want me to answer them?

The Vice-Chair: Maybe at a later date. The problem here is, you were granted 25 minutes; you used 23 for presentation. According to the standards, in fairness to everybody else as well, you are entitled to 25 minutes. We have now exceeded—

Ms Cooper: You would like me to stop. That's fine.

Ms Churley: Madam Chair, before we move on, perhaps what would be helpful to clear up some of the matters of consultation is, I would like to ask that the Minister of Municipal Affairs be asked to table with this committee all the people he formally consulted with and held meetings with. I'm sure we won't get information about the informal consultations that we know happened, but at least we should be presented with the formal consultations that took place, the lists that are available.

The Vice-Chair: I would be glad to make a request to provide that to you as soon as possible.

Ms Churley: Thank you. I'll follow up on it tomorrow.

BEAVER VALLEY HERITAGE SOCIETY

The Vice-Chair: I would ask that the representative from the Beaver Valley Heritage Society please come forward. Welcome to our hearing process, Mrs Anderson. Just so that we can set the parameters around how we're proceeding in these hearings, there is a 25-minute allotment to be used as you see fit. You might note, though, that if you would like a question-and-answer at the end, perhaps maybe we could leave that. Otherwise, feel free to do with the time as you wish.

Mrs Muriel Anderson: Good afternoon and happy Valentine's Day. I just came from a household of seven children, and if they hadn't taken all the cookies, I could have brought some for you.

I'm Muriel Anderson and I'm president of the Beaver Valley Heritage Society. My husband and I live on a small farm in the bottom of the valley. Thank you for giving time to hear our concerns.

The Beaver Valley Heritage Society is a non-profit citizens' group incorporated in 1981 to preserve and protect the unique natural environment of the Beaver Valley. It endeavours to represent the interests of both the valley's year-round and part-time residents. Our role is to present the views of our members in a clear and organized way to the decision-making bodies that have jurisdiction over the valley. Our society supports development that occurs in areas designated through proper planning for growth, provided that such development or its accumulated effect does not compromise the environment.

We believe that a planning act reflects the agreement on how we live together on the land that is available. Therefore, the Planning Act must be based on a consensus reached by the citizens, protect the public interest, provide clear foci for protecting the environment and clearly define roles and responsibilities.

With these broad purposes or needs in front of us, we look at the proposed changes to the present act and we see a great backward move on the part of your government. That's the PC government, of course. The present act was developed after two years of consultation with citizens of Ontario. We are dismayed that by a quick rewriting we can be so easily and rapidly dismissed as having no rights over the development standards of our communities.

It seems to us that your Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing is just suggesting a return to the old system. All stakeholders came close to agreeing that the old process didn't work for the good of anyone. The lack of vision in the proposed changes and the hasty time lines cause us to fear that opportunity for planning our lives together is being denied. Your proposed amendments negate the concerns so carefully stated by the citizens of Ontario during the past consultations.

The community groups, the environmental groups and the public interest groups have never opposed planned and fiscally responsible development. Since the present act has only briefly been part of our history—less than 10 months—there is no statistical evidence that it has prohibited or inhibited development. We believe the act should be left in place and tested for its efficacy in order to prove whether or not good planning stands in the way of a growing economy.

Good planning does encourage a stable society because the directions are clear to all participants. Poor planning is time-consuming and expensive. Each time in the future, as in the past, that an environmentally destructive development proposal is applied for, there will be a long, site-specific confrontation, and valuable energy and money will be consumed. The recent floods in our small Beaver River have shown the extent to which poor or bad planning can cost individuals, insurance companies and municipalities—the taxpayers. The flood is over, but the problem remains where severances were allowed on floodplain lands.

To quote from a Toronto Star editorial: "Good planning is, in fact, a spur to economic growth, while bad planning costs taxpayers. It encourages insufficient use of existing infrastructure and forces up demand for more—sewer lines, highways, transit etc—to service far-flung developments."

There is no mention in the revised proposals of the need to preserve productive land or encourage compact development, and only weak proposals on protection of environmentally sensitive areas. Rather, these new items encourage urban sprawl, rural strip development and the using up of more good and necessary agricultural land that we need for food production. The wetland areas are our recharge areas of uncontaminated water, an absolute essential to healthy living. The rewriting of guidelines that loosely protect our water resources is unacceptable. The clear set of rules newly in place since March 1995 is what our communities want. Protection of the environment is strongly supported by the vast majority of Ontarians. It is very important in Grey county. Our wealth is to be found along the Georgian Bay shoreline, the Niagara Escarpment, our class 1 and 2 wetlands, our old-growth forests, the rare plant areas, the cold water fishing streams, our crystal-clear and pure groundwater, and our many scenic valleys, of which Beaver Valley is one.

Rural tourism is the up-and-coming industry of our global village. Our cities have become similar in every nation, but the geography in every country is varied. This is where economic gains are to be made. But it means greater protection will be required for our rural landscapes, including those features that are distinctive to them. With bad planning, this economic base can be quickly destroyed. Good planning will provide for development, expand the tourist trade, enhance our environment and protect our community values.

Bill 20 withdraws the need for a municipality to have a comprehensive official plan that speaks to the chief planning needs. At the same time, the provincial government is not retaining responsibility for approving plans that have been approved by upper-tier municipalities. In denying this important provincial role, the comprehensive planning at the local level may not take place. This will work against any serious planning in our communities. The suggested time line of 90 days, from six months, for amendments to an official plan indicates the lack of permanence and dependability of any plan. Again, time and money will be lost as the stakeholders debate the direction of planning in a municipality. In fact, this 90-day period establishes an ad hoc approach to planning in Ontario. Will this create clarity and certainty for those seeking development and economic progress? No. Rather, it will produce rancour and division in our communities.

While purporting to give municipalities more local autonomy, Bill 20 takes away their power to refuse development where infrastructures do not exist. This may lead to an OMB hearing and a requirement to provide expensive infrastructures for the benefit of a developer.

The suggested appeal time of 20 days severely limits the participation of the public in the plan approval or amendment process. Studying complex documents, consulting with a group or an executive and finally preparing an adequate brief for submission takes more than 20 days. We read this as a definite rejection of the expertise that exists in society and that is available to the decision-makers in our province. Under such conditions more OMB hearings will be necessary as there will be no time for mediation actions. The limitation on public input will necessarily lead to more unrest and dissatisfaction with politicians and government generally.

In consideration of the importance of good planning in Ontario, we urge you to act on the following recommendations:

(1) Consider that a planning act is a document of how we are to live together and not only an economic strategy.

(2) Ensure that all Ontarians dwell in livable communities that protect a high quality of life.

(3) Allow the present Planning Act to remain in place for 1996-97.

(4)(a) That statistics be logged over the time period from March 1995 to December 1997.

(b) That the above information be readily available to all.

(c) That consultation with all stakeholders on planning matters take place during this time.

I would like to add that our brief on changes to the policy statement section is not included in this brief and will be forwarded to the appropriate committee next week.

That is my submission.

Mr Gerretsen: Thank you very much, Mrs Anderson. You've certainly put a different focus in your recommendations than some of the other briefs we have heard. I really like this concept that the Planning Act is not just an economic strategy document, but a document as to how we develop the communities in which we live.

Bill 163 is not one of my favourite documents, but I do agree with you to this extent, and that is that at least the act should have been given its proper length of time in order to determine how it was going to affect development. Because so far many developers who have come in here have said one of the reasons why development hasn't been going on over the last year or so is because of Bill 163, and then others have said it isn't, it's because of changing economic circumstances etc. I totally agree with you that certainly the act itself has not been given any sufficient amount of time to determine how it would have affected the whole planning process.

One of the things that has been taken out of the act is the whole notion of public participation, and that's something I'm a great believer in. One of the areas that they've taken it out of is the approval of subdivisions, on the theory that once a property has been rezoned, then presumably what goes on that property in detail, which is normally sketched out in a plan of subdivision, is of no concern to the community and to the people in the immediate area, which is something that I totally disagree with. I think the layout of subdivisions and how the land is utilized even within the zoning that is allowed on that property is of a great concern to the people in the community. It also gets rid of a lot of turmoil that may happen without the public meeting. I wonder if you have a comment on that.

Mrs Anderson: Certainly I have. We are a group of people who are vitally interested in land use, because you can't protect a valley—which is our primary concern, to keep the valley as beautiful as possible for the people who live there and the people who play there and the people who pass through there. The way the land is used is of utmost importance, and certainly if you're going to have a subdivision near any other environment that's peopled with people, there's going to be strife if they don't have a choice of input on that. I think it speaks ill of a government that has cut that out.

This 20-day short appeals period is very bad for everybody, not just for the public citizens. It's very bad because it means you have to go immediately from the first day, supposing you get—well, in our area, I got the letter today for this meeting delivered by Purolator in Toronto at 10:45. If I were doing an appeal process, I might wait five days, and if there happened to be a weekend in between, I might wait seven days. And if I wait seven days, I'm probably going to get ready to go for an appeal straight to the OMB rather than to wait for—

Mr Gerretsen: You see, I think the government is somehow of the view that we can have an economic resurgence of this province if somehow we just deal with municipalities and developers and leave the general public out of it. I think that's why a lot of the public meeting requirements have been taken out of the act.

Mrs Anderson: We are the municipality.

Mr Gerretsen: That's correct. You're right on.

Mr Hampton: I want to ask you a general question. Given the changes in the legislation the government is proposing and given the changes in the policy statements being proposed, and given the fact that the Ministry of Natural Resources will lose about 2,000 of its staff over the next 12 to 15 months, and I expect there will be similar reductions in the Ministry of Environment, if this legislation passes and the policy statements are implemented, where do you think that will leave planning in the province?

Mrs Anderson: I think it will leave planning, and the loss of conservation areas in the omnibus bill is going to leave planning, as an ad hoc business. You buy your way in and you're in.

Mr Hampton: You buy your way in and you're in.

With the limitations on appeal periods and some of the other limitations that are part of this legislation, what's your sense of how groups who care about planning and who care about environmental protection and proper resource management will react, both within the planning process that comes out of this and in terms of other avenues they might pursue: the courts etc?

Mrs Anderson: All the groups interested in proper land use will probably have to work out different strategies. We probably won't be responding to legislation by briefs, because we don't feel we're being heard. Therefore, we're going to have to do something that makes much more noise, quite a different strategy. You're going to have a very irate, noisy population in Ontario.

Mr Hampton: Your major recommendation here is that the present Planning Act be allowed to remain in place for 1996-97. Do you have the same view with respect to the policy statements?

Mrs Anderson: Oh, definitely. You can't separate them, I don't think, although you have for this committee; you've separated the Bill 20 body away from the policy statement. But I think Bill 163, the previous bill, plus the policy statements stand as a unit.

Mr Murdoch: I won't ask any questions, but just thank you for coming down and making your brief, and I also thank you for making your brief at Bill 26 at my hearings in Owen Sound. I appreciate that. You always have lots to say and lots to tell us and you stick up for your rights, and that's what we want. I just want to thank you. I appreciate your coming in.

Mrs Anderson: I thought it was rather a short brief.

The Chair: Don't go yet.

Mrs Anderson: My ride is going to go back to Grey county without me.

Mr Gerretsen: Bill will take you home, then.

Ms Churley: Is she one of your voters? You're being awfully polite.

Mr Murdoch: Yes, she's a voter. You're always polite, aren't you, to your voters? We may not always agree.

Mrs Anderson: I'm a voter. He lives in hope.

Mr Smith: I have just one quick question. I noticed with interest that on page 3 of your document you made reference to the increased importance of rural tourism. As an owner of a small farm and a land owner, I'd like to present this to you. Would you agree that the granting of additional authority to municipalities in terms of local planning decisions would allow you to foster the local economic development initiatives that would contribute to your community better than a provincial standard?

Mrs Anderson: Yes, for sure. Every community has to do its own economic development, because no one is going to do it for them. In our area, what we are trying to foster, some of it, is going to be destroyed by this bill.

The Chair: Thank you, Mrs Anderson. We appreciate your taking time to make a presentation before us today.

GEORGIAN BAY TRUST FOUNDATION

The Chair: Our next group up is the Georgian Bay Trust Foundation. Good afternoon.

Mr Christopher Baines: My name is Christopher Baines. I am the president of the Georgian Bay Trust Foundation Inc. For those of you who may or may not know what a trust foundation is, essentially look at us as a cemetery commission in that we don't look at our assets as assets but rather as liabilities. We have to take care of these in perpetuity, if you will.

Presently we are in our fifth year of operation. We're a federally registered, charitable non-profit, and our business is preserving and protecting "environmentally significant" sites on the eastern shore of Georgian Bay. We currently have three properties worth about $880,000 altogether under our stewardship, with about another four or five in the pipeline or under consideration. I might point out that at the present time most of our cash and islands have been as a result of gifts from Americans rather than Canadians, but that's another point.

If you want a definition of what it is that we look at preserving, it's the definition of "environmentally sensitive" as indicated here. Environmentally significant real estate is defined as rights that control the use of a parcel with attributes of geographical, biological, ecological, archaeological, palaeontological, cultural and/or historical significance. Indeed, all our properties do now and certainly will in the future have those attributes within them; otherwise, we wouldn't accept them.

More background on land trusts: There are approximately 1,100 land trusts right now in the United States. There are about 12 or so to my knowledge now in Ontario, and I think you're going to find that this is the hot new "industry," that term, in the environmental conservation movement. We're really modelled after the national trusts in England and most particularly the Nature Conservancy in the United States, whose motto is, I might say, "All action and no talk." My being here today, I'm an exception to that rule.

I'd also like to congratulate the government for a recent action under the Ministry of Natural Resources which has made it easier for our organization and other trusts to work, and that is the change to the conservation easement legislation which will allow trusts such as ourselves to hold easements. Quite frankly, that will be a growth area for us.

Nevertheless, you will see an evolution of organizations like us in the partnerships developing in the new reality, that which we all face these days, and that is particularly that we walk the talk. As various provincial and federal agencies and ministries run out of money, it's organizations like ours, that are in the field, that deal with land owners of identified significant properties, either by ourselves or government agencies, that actually will end up, hopefully, stewarding this property. We have a number of relationships with a number of different governments and bodies that seek to preserve and protect these environmentally significant properties.

As such, we have a stake in this, and that's the reason we're here today. We are land owners. We are stewards of some very important property. Most particularly, we're owners of property in an area, on the eastern shore of Georgian Bay, where the environment is what sells. It is the industry. The fisheries were exploited in the late 1890s, the lumbering was all gone by the 1920s. There is nothing else at the present time other than the natural environment and what it provides, and we are an actual agency that is delivering on that. Our actions, by preserving and protecting sites up and down—and remember, we're very young, but give us 10 or 15 years and wait—tangibly benefit the whole society in our area. The municipality, certainly all developers and all future land owners, actually benefit from our actions.

Indeed, proof of that is my latest appeal to the Assessment Review Board. The impact of us getting a lower zoning down to a natural state conservancy in the township, the archipelago or whatever, is that the assessor, who had never heard of a land trust before, suddenly says, "So what you're saying is that if you are putting restrictions on the development of this property in perpetuity, that makes the land around it actually worth more, because that owner will not see development beside his property." Consequently, the assessor assesses that property more. So there is cause and effect all the way down the pipeline.

What I'm stating here is a philosophical point that I think it's important the Planning Act reflect. We are sympathetic to the interests of the development industry in trying to get through the red tape and speed up easements and subdivisions and severances etc. However, what we don't believe is currently reflected in the current legislation is the fact that we are, as I said, an industry unto itself as well, which is perfectly on a par with what a subdivision or the development industry is itself. As I stated, the environment is the industry we are from, and we would like that specifically reflected in specific points as I have pointed out here in this brief with these recommendations.

I'm not going to go through them all because it's rather explicit here, but I would point out two in particular. Under (d), which is public notice, recommendation 6 on page 4, "Establish a public registry of interested parties to be informed of applications and appeals concerning particular topics or geographical areas," that would certainly be of great importance to us. As other speakers have indicated, we are all volunteers, we do not have any paid staff, we have a diverse board, and it's very difficult to keep on top of all our interests. We will have quite soon probably about 10 or 12 different properties up and down a wide area in three or four different municipalities, so for us to have the manpower to respond in a judicious way will be a challenge. If a registration such as this were to occur, we would certainly avail ourselves of it and take advantage of it, again to protect our own particular interests as a land owner and as a steward.

The other item would be point (e), which is the government review period. We would think that rather than 90, it should go to 150 days, particularly when these reviews of an application would run during the months of December, January or February, and particularly because all of our properties are islands. As you know, right now the ice is good some weekends and not good the others, and it's a challenge to get up there, and when you do get up there, it's covered in three feet of snow. So if there is something that's under review or that is contentious particularly, it's a challenge for us to actually do due diligence to comment on the particular state of affairs.

I would point out to you that, for instance, we do not accept or engage in the purchase or acceptance of properties during the winter, quite frankly because we can't conduct an environmental audit. It's difficult with two or three feet of snow to ensure there are no PCBs—not that there ever would be.

So those are two very specific points. The rest are contained in here. But I did want to give you and share with you our philosophical bent and let you know that on behalf of land trusts, look for a lot more coming. If there are 1,100 now in the States—and I recently attended a rally of some 950 trust directors and staff down in the States—you know it's going to happen up here, and quite frankly it should, because hopefully, we will be able to deliver on what has to be done as government increasingly pulls back. We accept that and understand that. We don't necessarily like it or agree with it, but we will do it because it has to be done. But for that, there is a bit of a quid pro quo here, if you will, that we would like some latitude in the Planning Act to allow us to carry out, to give us the tools, if you will, to steward our sites appropriately.

Other than that, I would invite questions.

Mr Hampton: I want to ask you just some further questions about your organization, which I find interesting. Your membership, the people who are part of your organization, are not just found in the Georgian Bay area but throughout southern Ontario?

Mr Baines: There's an interesting quote that one of our directors uses, "I may work in Toronto, but I live in Georgian Bay." The answer to that is, in most cases, we have seasonal residents who have cottages up there, but we do have some permanent residents as well. So their summer cottage would be on the 30,000 islands but they would live around southern Ontario, and indeed in the United States as well, because 30% of our inhabitants, our seasonal residents, are American residents.

Mr Hampton: How do you typically acquire land?

Mr Baines: We've been successful in three different mechanisms: (1) direct donation; (2) we've been lucky enough to work with the federal government to get a change in the capital gains provision in the recent budget so that now instead of just 20% you can get 100% capital gains write-off; and (3) as I indicated, a brand-new weapon, if you will, or tool, I should say, is the use of conservation easements, whereby the individual would continue owning the property and pay taxes, but we would have a conservation easement which would prohibit the development of the property. So basically we have our cake and eat it too, which is the best of all worlds.

Mr Hampton: Conservation easement became applicable to your kind of work I gather about a year ago.

Mr Baines: Just in March, yes.

Mr Hampton: A year ago.

Mr Baines: A year ago, yes, that's right.

Mr Hampton: You're basically saying to the government, as I read your brief: "Don't be in such a rush. Don't throw out all the good work that was established coming out of the Sewell commission and most of the consultations held around and after the Sewell commission."

May I ask you this: If the government fails to follow your recommendations here—in other words, if they go back to "have regard to," if they exempt plans from the minister's approval, if they maintain some of the unrealistic time guidelines that they've set out here—what do you think's going to happen? What do you think's going to happen, for example, in Georgian Bay?

Mr Baines: It's very difficult to speculate on that. We're a determined group, quite frankly, and our experience has been that our donors or potential donors really don't want very much to do with governments, consequently that phrase, "All action, no talk." We will have to adapt, whatever happens, regardless of what the legislation is. It will just put a great strain on our resources to monitor and effectively represent our interests, both at the municipality and at the district and indeed with the government itself. So in that sense we would see it as retrogressive.

Mr Hampton: What does retrogressive mean, in terms of your ability to do some of the work you're doing now?

Mr Baines: A good question. I would say retrogressive in respect to some of the elements in Bill 163. There was certainly a lot to applaud in that and we would hope that some of that could be incorporated into this.

1450

Mr Murdoch: I appreciate your brief here. I sort of like what you're saying, if I take it right: If you want to sort of control it, you buy it.

Mr Baines: Or get an easement for it.

Mr Murdoch: Yes, and that's the same. That's fine.

It's too bad you couldn't come around here today. We have what we call the Niagara Escarpment around Huron county, and it would be really nice if you'd buy the whole escarpment, and then we wouldn't have any land owners on it who would have problems. Is there a consideration of expanding, or is it just your—

Mr Baines: Not at the present time. Who knows? When the occasion arises, perhaps there could be chapters or so on, but we're so young right now. We really have to see what happens.

Mr Murdoch: I think it's a good idea and I hope you can expand it into our area. If you need someone to take your message, I'd like to do that.

When you get the land, though, and then of course again you're talking about islands so it's a little different, but do you have it rezoned, like no development?

Mr Baines: Yes, and that is a very interesting point, because quite frankly municipalities have never heard of—nor have assessors, nor has the ministry, quite frankly—restrictive covenance and what we are all about. When we went to the assessment appeal board, it was very suspect as to what our motives were, that any organization like ours would be around. It took quite some explaining to understand where we were coming from, that no, we basically just wanted to protect and preserve this in perpetuity.

Mr Murdoch: The Bruce Trail Association now is doing a lot of that. They were buying land, and basically it's no development, because I know they're allowed to buy 50 acres off the back of a farm where there isn't actually even an access to it because it's part of the trail. So in a sense they're doing that.

Mr Baines: Correct.

Mr Murdoch: But I think this is a good idea and I applaud you on it.

Mr Baird: One of the unique aspects I think your group brings is it's a small local group, locally driven, with a very specific mandate and what not. One of the principles that's being discussed I think as certainly underlying this bill is local autonomy, to try to put greater zoning and planning requirements at the local level. Given the success that obviously your group has had in the relatively few short years and the promise for the future that you've mentioned is the direction you're headed with some of the things, what do you think of the principle of giving local areas more autonomy, where's there's often, I think, at least in my community, a greater degree of accountability, where obviously government is much closer to people?

Mr Baines: I would say that's a double-edged sword, quite frankly, because we deal with about four or five different municipalities, some of them unorganized, some of them with upper-tier, such as the district of Muskoka and the township of Georgian Bay, and that in itself of course is changing, what with the potential for municipal reorganization.

This gets back to "have regard to" or "be consistent with." Quite frankly, we'd rather see a provincial interest expressed. We're very sensitive to the local municipalities' interests and autonomy, and indeed we would not survive, or it must be political in a sense to understand their needs and interests.

But having said that, I think there is much to say for the provincial government expressing provincial interests in specific environmentally sensitive areas, because when it comes down to a choice between development and a provincial interest, it becomes a political battle that unfortunately I think on some occasions the environmental interests have lost out on, to the detriment of the environment itself.

So the short answer to your question is—

The Chair: Very brief, 30 seconds.

Mr Baines: Yes, I know.

Mr Baird: If there's only a few seconds, then I won't use time. You can start.

Mr Hardeman: If I could, just one question, in the presentation, as it speaks to "shall have regard for" or "shall be consistent with," you indicate that after widespread consultation and consensus, they used the words "shall be consistent with." I would suggest that it was a long way from a consensus that they came to when the choice was made to use that wording.

Mr Baines: With respect, I suppose that's where your opinion lies. I participated in the Sewell commission and made submissions and was very impressed with the to-ing and fro-ing of that, and perhaps it's our impression. I understand your difference and your disagreement with that.

Mr Hardeman: I also participated in the Sewell commission, and I was not one of the ones that would've agreed to the consensus.

Mr Gerretsen: I wonder if I could have your comment on this. There's no question about it that a lot of this is local autonomy driven, and I basically agree with that, but the one area where it sort of misses the mark is that they have equated local autonomy with the fact that we no longer need public meetings, for example, in order to get subdivisions approved or severances approved. I wonder if you would agree with me that that sort of completely misses the mark. You can have local autonomy, but the public input and a public say is still extremely important before a lot of these planning decisions are reached. Would you agree with that statement?

Mr Baines: In the main, yes, but there again I'm sensitive to the time elements and the difficulty and the delays in getting people together. So it's difficult to make a generalized response to that. Certainly, from our part, were there to be any potential subdivisions around us, we would want—and that's why we stated it in here—to be notified to that effect and would make our response to it. Whether or not that would require public meetings specifically—for our purposes, it's not necessary. We would want to be notified, though, at the very least.

But there again, when you're dealing with, for instance, the municipality of the township of The Archipelago, a very diverse, quite a large municipality, it can take some time to get everybody together. I would think it would be in their own best interests, the politicians of a municipality, to have public meetings.

Mr Gerretsen: By the same token, local autonomy, when it comes to minor variance appeals, has also missed the mark in the sense that what we're talking about is, yes, the original decision ought to be made at the local level, whether it's the council or the committee of adjustment, but there still ought to be an independent appeal to some other body, such as the OMB, that could decide the issue if there is, obviously, a difference of opinion as a result of the appeal being launched. I guess your brief sort of indicates that.

I wonder if you could tell me a little bit more about your organization. How do you differ then from an organization, let's say, like the Bruce Trail Association and the Rideau Trail Association?

Mr Baines: Actually, perhaps there is very little difference, but you could say that the trail is a mechanism to educate the public on the benefits of the environment. And to a certain extent, our sites would be similar. By getting more people to participate to walk the Bruce trail, hopefully more enjoy the environment and would appreciate it more. To do that, they need the tools, which is conservation easements and to own the property and they must maintain it. Similarly, we look at preserving and protecting specific, unique sites, both, as we said, archaeologically—

Mr Gerretsen: But you have no problem then with people having access to the properties that you own and operate.

Mr Baines: Indeed, it's part of the condition. We don't necessarily encourage it. It depends on the particular site. If it's very sensitive, that would be a potential restriction, depending on the land owner and the donor.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Baines. I appreciate you taking the time to make a presentation before us today.

INCLUSIVE NEIGHBOURHOODS CAMPAIGN

The Chair: Our next group up, the Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign. Good afternoon.

Ms Jacqui Buncl: Good afternoon. My name is Jacqui Buncl and I'm the coordinator of the Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign. I'm going to use the first section of my time to present a brief, and then I hope to entertain questions from you. I'd like to say just to start that my presentation only deals with the apartments-in-houses provisions of Bill 20.

When the Honourable Al Leach, Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing, introduced Bill 20, he stated, "This government has promised to promote economic recovery by slashing red tape and getting rid of obstacles to growth." He continued: "Ontario's planning system is tied up in red tape that kills development and jobs. We will...bring in a system that's faster and less bureaucratic...that people can understand...a system that delivers an answer more quickly."

As an organization that has done education and advocacy about apartments in houses for five years, I want to tell you that Bill 20 in fact will do the opposite of what Mr Leach has stated. The provisions of Bill 20 that deal with apartments in houses run counter to the intention of the legislation as outlined by the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing. Instead of promoting economic growth, Bill 20 will hinder economic activity in the building and development industry by creating disincentives to construction of much-needed affordable housing in the form of accessory apartments. It will also create unnecessary obstacles to homeowners wishing to install an apartment in their house. Furthermore, instead of slashing red tape, it will produce needless, complicated bureaucracy for homeowners, developers and tenants. Finally, it will certainly not result in a system that people can understand. Bill 20 will produce a complicated maze of zoning and standards variations which will be incomprehensible to the average person.

In fact, I will argue during the next 15 minutes that the provisions of Bill 20 dealing with apartments in houses not only run counter to Mr Leach's claims, they also run counter to the direction of the housing policies of this provincial government. The Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing has stated many times that the province of Ontario wants to get out of the housing business to give the private sector a greater role in housing construction. Bill 20 will do the opposite of this goal. The proposed legislation will choke private enterprise by individuals wishing to build apartments in houses and increase government intervention in their lives. I will also argue that Bill 20 will result in a decline in the supply of this form of private rental housing and will produce housing that is once again unsafe and unregulated.

Before I proceed to substantiate these claims about the likely effects of Bill 20, let me tell you about my organization, the Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign, and our history and current work on this issue. The Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign, or INC, as we call ourselves, is a coalition of 138 organizations from across Ontario. Many sectors are represented in the coalition, including faith communities, business, labour, construction and environmental groups, legal clinics, social services, women's organizations, housing help centres and registries, seniors' organizations, youth groups, disabled groups, and ethno-specific organizations.

These organizations came together from 1991 to 1993 united in the position that apartments in houses needed to be legalized across the province. At this time, studies indicated that there were 100,000 apartments in houses across Ontario. It was estimated that approximately half of these units were located outside Metropolitan Toronto. The organizations which formed the Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign had seen at first hand the problems and suffering resulting from the illegal status of accessory apartments. These organizations found that both tenants and homeowners were experiencing hardship because of the illegal status of apartments in houses in many communities. In order to determine the extent of the problem, the Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign organized a public Inquiry into Legalizing Safe Apartments in Houses on June 3, 1993, and we produced a report, which looks like this. A panel of experts heard testimony from planners, community representatives, homeowners and tenants. The panel heard about first-time home buyers who could not afford to pay their mortgage without the income of a rental unit, and disabled homeowners and seniors who were house-rich but cash-poor renting out an apartment for extra income and company.

Peter Simpson, a homeowner living in Barrie, told the panel about his experience of being harassed and fined by his municipality for renting out an apartment in his house where his elderly mother lived. The house had only three adults living in it, but—and this is what Peter Simpson said: “The position of the alderman, the mayor, was that all I had to do was take away the stove. You cannot take a stove from an 82-year-old lady—you take away her independence. I was fined $3,000.”

Another homeowner who wrote a submission to the inquiry was Jean, a disabled senior citizen who had lost her husband several years earlier. Jean, who did not give her name because of fear of more harassment by her local municipality, wrote:

“The municipality is hounding me. Personally, I feel under seige. My tenant has been very understanding. She is very comfortable and secure in my home. Her help and interest in the garden is also needed for me to hold on to my property. Emotionally, I feel intimidated and much more insecure, watching to see who is approaching my house. The independence I once felt has been affected. Financially, I have managed to be independent and self-supporting without having to rely on very much government assistance. Ultimately, if my rental unit were to be closed down, I would have to move to a high-rise and, unhappily, my tenant would have to find alternate accommodation and I would lose my home of 36 years. The effect of having to sell the property and move after all these years would cause me great mental and physical stress.”

Subsequent to the inquiry and before Bill 120 was passed, Jean did lose her home because she could no longer tolerate being hounded by her municipality. The municipality was harassing her even though her apartment was spacious and safe and she and her tenant had lived harmoniously in her neighbourhood for many years.

Before Bill 120, tenants who lived in illegal apartments in houses were in a legal limbo. The courts were inconsistent in their decisions on whether the tenants living in illegal apartments in houses were covered under the Landlord and Tenant Act. Therefore, tenants were often defenceless against a variety of problems in their units, including illegal rent increases, illegal evictions and property standards violations.

Tenants in illegal apartments also faced an additional disadvantage, since they could not make complaints regarding violations of health and safety standards in their unit without risking eviction. City inspectors who enforce health and safety standards are the same inspectors who could order an illegal unit to be shut down. For example, I personally assisted a husband and his pregnant wife, who was about to give birth any day, who were experiencing problems in their basement apartment in Scarborough. In anger, their landlord had decided to remove the tenants' toilet. Because they were living in an illegal unit, the tenants could not call on the municipal authorities to rectify the situation; if they did this, they would risk losing their home.

As apartments in houses have traditionally been more affordable than apartments in buildings, many low-income tenants have to rely on this form of housing. Thus, many seniors, newcomers, families with children and single adults tend to live in apartments in houses. For these economically disadvantaged people, living in an illegal unit added another layer to the many problems they already faced. The Latin American Community Centre told INC's public inquiry that for refugees coming “from situations where fear is the dominant feeling, and when you live in an illegal apartment and you don't have rights and are like a second-class citizen, your fear is doubled.”

Finally, a number of fire deaths of tenants living in basements in the Metropolitan Toronto area made the situation even more urgent. It was vital that safety standards for apartments in houses be established and fire inspections carried out to ensure safety.

To change this intolerable situation, local housing groups had been actively lobbying their local municipal governments for many years to change their official plans and zoning bylaws to permit accessory units as of right. They had met with minimal success. This, despite the fact that in 1989 the Land Use Planning for Housing policy statement, released by the former Liberal government, gave strong direction to municipalities to amend their official plans and bylaws to encourage as-of-right zoning for apartments in houses. However, most municipalities refused to change their official plans to allow apartments in houses, despite studies which indicated public support for them.

Indeed, an Environics survey in 1988 quoted in a Ministry of Housing document, entitled Apartments in Houses Proposed Legislation: Some Facts and Figures, showed that 75% of Ontario residents favoured “allowing homeowners to add a rental unit” as one way to provide affordable housing.

One of the many consultants hired by municipalities to study the issue was Mr Frank Lewinberg, who conducted extensive research in Scarborough on accessory apartments. When Mr Lewinberg's research clearly pointed to the need to legalize apartments in houses, the city forced him to resign. Mr Lewinberg told INC's public inquiry: “The fact is that, despite all these studies, not one new municipality has changed its zoning.”

Because of the resistance and sometimes outright hostility of municipalities to apartments in houses, community groups realized that the only solution was for the province to take action. The 138 organizations which formed the Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign demanded that the provincial government introduce legislation which would allow apartments in houses as of right throughout the province. Bill 120 was introduced in November 1993 and after extensive public consultation was proclaimed as the Residents' Rights Act in July 1994. Apartments in houses became a legal, permitted use across the province as long as reasonable building, fire and planning standards were met.

The Residents' Rights Act brought into a regulatory framework a form of housing that had been previously underground. Section 9.8 of the fire code, which was introduced as part of the regulatory framework for apartments in houses, established fire safety standards for existing apartments. These included smoke alarms, safe means of exit, and fire separations. Homeowners had two years, until July 14, 1996, to bring their units up to standard to comply with the fire code. At the same time, changes to the building code established standards to ensure that new units would be built to meet safety standards. The Residents' Rights Act sets a reasonable framework within which municipalities can set their own standards for such issues as parking, minimum size of units and ceiling heights. For example, municipalities are allowed to set a minimum ceiling height, but they cannot set their minimum as higher than six feet, five inches. Under the Residents' Rights Act, municipalities continued to have control over many of the important issues regarding apartments in houses, such as the physical characteristics of the neighbourhood, the house, the lot and property standards.

For the last year, the Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign has done extensive education across the province about the new fire safety and planning standards for apartments in houses. Along with local housing help centres and community organizations, we have organized community forums to educate tenants, homeowners, welfare workers, children's aid workers and housing workers about the rights and responsibilities of tenants and homeowners under the Residents' Rights Act. Building inspectors and fire inspectors have come to speak at our forums in Ottawa, Sudbury, Kirkland Lake and New Liskeard to tell homeowners about their obligations under the new law.

In conjunction with the Community Legal Education Ontario clinic, INC also developed a series of brochures educating the public about the fire code standards and as-of-right status of apartments in houses. Approximately 70,000 copies of these brochures have been distributed across Ontario. I should just point out to you that our fire safety brochure was praised by fire inspectors from several communities as being very clear and the best they'd seen on this material.

In our work across the province, we saw that the Residents' Rights Act was working. Homeowners were doing the necessary repairs and renovations to bring their units up to standard. Fire departments were inspecting units to ensure safety and fire code compliance. A monitoring survey conducted by the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing indicated that from July 1994 to June 1995, 280 inspections of existing units had been completed; 119 units had been upgraded. Only 60% of municipalities participated in this survey, so the actual number of completed inspections would in fact be much greater than this.

The inspectors found that 53% of units inspected required smoke alarms, a critical lifesaving device. We anticipate that more and more units will come up to standard as the July 14, 1996, compliance date approaches. In addition, statistics from the office of the fire marshal indicate that prior to the passage of Bill 120 in July 1994, seven fire fatalities had occurred in houses containing two apartments that year. Since the passage of the law until the end of December 1995, there was only one fire fatality in a house containing two apartments. We can say without hesitation that the Residents' Rights Act promoted safety in apartments in houses.

Construction of new apartments in houses was also generated by the Residents' Rights Act. The ministry's monitoring survey indicates that from July 1994 to June 1995, 433 new apartments in houses were created. The ministry estimated the construction associated with these installations and upgrades as $12,454,326, resulting in 205 direct and indirect person-years of employment.

Bill 20 proposes to turn back the tide on apartments in houses, to return the authority to municipalities to decide where these units can be built and what standards will apply. Many people who are unfamiliar with the history and political dynamics of this issue might ask, "Shouldn't planning decisions be made at the local level?" While this sounds reasonable, in fact the experience of the Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign demonstrates that there is a proactive role for the province in encouraging this form of housing through enabling legislation. The historical and vehement opposition of many cities to apartments in houses is well known.

Over 30 municipalities have launched a charter challenge opposing the apartments in houses provisions of Bill 120. This case was spearheaded by the city of London and includes such municipalities as Ottawa, Sarnia, Owen Sound, Waterloo, Oshawa, Thunder Bay and Windsor, as well as many other municipalities. There is little doubt that some cities will use these new powers to prevent tenants from living in certain residential areas and prevent homeowners from exercising free enterprise to rent out an apartment in their own home. If Bill 20 is passed, apartments in houses will again be subject to the political whims of municipal governments, which might again choose to create single-family-home enclaves.

The municipalities have chosen in the past to listen to the NIMBY concerns of neighbours, which many studies document, including the Lampert report commissioned by this government. As aptly stated at the inquiry by Canadian Pensioners Concerned:

"Apartments in houses are illegal, because in our view, local governments have pandered to the demands of middle-class homeowners who don't want 'those' people living in their neighbourhoods. 'Those people' are some of us, our children, our grandchildren...our friends, our neighbours, old Canadians or new, singles or families, the employed or unemployed, students."

While INC is pleased that Bill 20 grandfathers the existing 100,000 units, my organization is very concerned about the confusion that Bill 20 will create for the public. Bill 20 will produce three classes of apartments in houses: There will be the so-called Bill 120 grandfathered apartments, which will be governed by the Bill 120 planning standards and the fire code; then there will be the post-November 16, 1995, apartments which will have different planning and zoning standards and will be governed by the building code; then there will be the illegal apartments in houses, apartments in houses built without building permits in areas that will now be zoned again for single-family homes.

We know that people will continue to build these apartments because homeowners and tenants need them. I'm sure that other presenters have also told you about their benefits around promoting housing intensification and preventing urban sprawl. However, Bill 20 will discourage homeowners and tenants from coming forward, because they will not know whether or not their unit is legal. The lack of common standards across the province will result in this form of housing going underground again. We can expect that there will be illegal building and again apartments which are unregulated and therefore unsafe. Once again there will be fire deaths in unsafe, illegal units.

Homeowners will be caught in a legal maze as municipalities require them to provide evidence about when their apartment was built to determine its legality. In January, I made a presentation to about 30 homeowners in Ottawa about apartments in houses. When I described to them the status of apartments in houses under Bill 120 and then outlined the proposed changes under Bill 20, I was met with looks of confusion and dismay. They asked, "How will I know if my apartment is legal?" This is a question which homeowners and tenants will constantly be asking if Bill 20 is passed.

Tenants will once again be prohibited from living in certain neighbourhoods because of restrictive zoning bylaws. For the more than half a million tenants who rely on apartments in houses, their tenure and rights will be uncertain. Once again tenants will risk losing their housing if they attempt to have their unit inspected by a municipal property inspector.

Because of the confusion of standards and the restrictive zoning bylaws which Bill 20 will lead to, this proposed law will limit the creation of new apartments in houses just at a time when vacancy rates are plummeting and affordable housing is becoming more and more scarce. The vacancy rate for the Toronto CMA was 0.8% in October 1995. Furthermore, the private rental starts for this area for January to October 1995 were only 14 units. At the same time, this government has cut back 385 social housing projects across Ontario.

The importance of accessory apartments meeting this critical need for affordable housing cannot be underestimated. Indeed, Greg Lampert, in his report commissioned by the present provincial government entitled The Challenge of Encouraging Investment in New Rental Housing in Ontario, points to the contribution apartments in houses can make to the supply of housing. I won't read his quote because I think it was referred to earlier on and you're welcome to read it. Basically, it's pointing out that apartments in houses are a low-rent, low-cost addition to the rental stock which doesn't require any infusion of public expenditure.

The Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing has emphasized his commitment to removing barriers so as to encourage the private sector to build more rental housing. Indeed, one of the four principles of his tenant protection program is greater housing choices through increased supply. Why then is this government introducing legislation which will result in more red tape and obstacles which will discourage the private sector from creating accessory apartments? Surely the role of the provincial government should be to enable the growth of this form of housing rather than stifle it.

Since the introduction of Bill 20, some municipalities have started to refuse to issue building permits to homeowners wishing to instal an apartment in their house. We have heard about homeowners who are now being told they won't be able to instal an apartment because they will be illegal again.

I would like to conclude by addressing two final issues: the registration schemes and the retroactivity of this legislation.

Bill 20 gives municipalities the right to establish registration systems for apartments in houses. While this sounds good in theory—INC has always advocated that units be safe and inspected—INC is concerned that municipalities hostile to apartments in houses will use registration schemes to crack down on these apartments. Mandatory registration will place even further demands on the already overburdened building and property standards departments of municipalities.

Any tenant who has experienced delays in getting a municipal inspector to inspect their apartment knows just how few municipal inspectors there are. Why not put resources into existing inspection departments rather than create a new bureaucracy for apartments in houses? Also, registration systems will create more red tape which will discourage homeowners from renting apartments.

In fact, mandatory registration schemes seem contrary to the spirit of the other sections of Bill 20 which focus on getting rid of red tape and restrictive regulations. Furthermore, registration schemes seem contrary to the general philosophy of the current provincial government which promotes reducing government bureaucracy and cutting administration costs.

While some municipalities have argued that they need registries to enforce safety standards, INC would argue that there are already processes to ensure units come up to standard. Any homeowner wishing to instal a new apartment must apply for a building permit and their unit must be inspected to ensure that safety and building standards are met. Existing units are being inspected by the fire department to ensure compliance with fire code standards.

It is our position that public registries are redundant and an unnecessary use of taxpayers' dollars. In addition, public registries might be used by municipalities to close units down for minor zoning infractions like parking. An inspection process for apartments in houses which responds to complaints from tenants is more consistent with the inspection processes and procedures currently in place for all other rental units.

The final issue I would like to address briefly is the issue of the legislation being retroactive. Many homeowners have indicated to us that they believe the grandfathering clause should be extended for units up until the date of proclamation. Many homeowners and developers planning to instal an apartment in a house or in the process of doing so were caught by the introduction of Bill 20 as they discovered that their municipality would no longer issue building permits for the construction of accessory units.

In conclusion, it is the position of the Inclusive Neighbourhoods Campaign that the apartments-in-houses provisions of Bill 20 will choke the supply of affordable housing, create more red tape and bureaucracy and stifle economic activity in the building and development industry in the area of accessory apartments. In addition, it will create confusion for tenants and homeowners and will result in unsafe, unregulated units being built.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms Buncel. You obviously practised: 25 minutes exactly to the second. Thank you very much for making your presentation before us today. Oh that the three parties could be that timely.

GREY ASSOCIATION FOR BETTER PLANNING

The Chair: Our next presentation today is the Grey Association for Better Planning.

Ms Churley: More friends of yours, Bill.

The Chair: Friends of Bill Murdoch.

Mr Peter Ferguson: My name is Peter Ferguson. I'm president of the Grey Association for Better Planning. I'm glad to note that Bill Murdoch, our local member, is on the committee, and I think I recognize a few familiar faces from the omnibus committee meetings. I hope you won't find our information approach boring if you're one of our friends or acquaintances.

I'm going to go through the handout you've been given, because that's what we want to say, and presumably we'll get on to questions afterwards.

Oh, I should say I hope the opposition members won't mind if I seem to direct my comments towards the government, because they're the people we're trying to convince.

Mr Gerretsen: You can speak to them all you want.

Mr Ferguson: Thanks. I'm sure you'll have something to say about it, though.

The Grey Association for Better Planning has 300 members across Grey county, represented by a board comprising members from each township in the county. We came together in 1990 to ensure adherence to the county's official plan and provincial planning policies. Currently, we're working at community development, Grey's new official plan and planning policy at the provincial level, our reason for being here today.

We believe that planning is the fundamental activity of a democratic society, determining together how we can live together without hurting one another. We also believe that planning has four primary facets: firstly, active community involvement in establishing planning objectives; secondly, establishment of clear, strong planning rules; thirdly, consistent and fair enforcement of the agreed-upon rules; and then fourthly, regular reassessment and revision of those rules.

We do not believe, as some would think, that planning should just be a matter of preserving the environment. Rather, we believe that we must decide together how best to utilize it, how to live together in it and how to maintain it as a continuously productive asset to society.

And so today, we come before you, our local flowering of a North American phenomenon, the conservative renaissance. Reform, Republican, Progressive Conservative, across the continent there is a surge of parties similar to yours. What do they have in common? We believe our Conservative front runners believe in three primary tenets, all of which have a visceral appeal for us good old boys and good old girls up in Grey county. We're far enough from the seat of power to still have a bias towards a kind of out-on-the-edge pioneer self-reliance.

Those are: firstly, strong government leadership allied with a reduction in government interference; secondly, fiscal rectitude and economic revitalization; and thirdly, responsiveness to the grass roots and community values.

We trust government members of the committee will agree that these broad thrusts underlie their Common Sense Revolution. We come before you because we fear you risk undercutting these admirable aspirations in your proposed revisions to the Planning Act which we and countless others across the province spent much time and effort improving over the past few years. We'd like to discuss each of these aspirations and make recommendations regarding your proposed alterations to the act in the interests of ensuring that your aspirations are in fact realized.

Firstly, under government leadership and non-interference: We agree, government must show leadership while trying to reduce its intrusiveness. The best way to do this is to establish strong rules and then leave citizens and lower levels of government alone to respond to them. Planning, as you know, takes place through the municipalities which are simply administrative creatures of your provincial government. A government which allows these servant levels of administration too long a leash runs the risk of abnegating its responsibility to them and to its voters.

Our recommendations in this area are, firstly, require that municipalities follow provincial policies. Take your responsibilities as provincial regulators to heart. You're in charge. We didn't elect you to wash your hands of controlling the municipalities. The previous NDP government toyed with the idea of changing wording on policies to "have regard to," just as you're doing now. We were able to convince them at a committee meeting very similar to this one that if they were confident in their own abilities and willing to wield their legislated power, they should require municipal plans to be consistent with their policies. We have the same faith in you and expect a similar strength of will. You can make good rules. Make the municipalities and all the rest of us follow them.

Secondly, strengthen provincial policy statements. If municipalities are going to have to dance to your tune, make sure it's one that's got clear rhythm and a memorable tune. Most of the revisions you propose to the policy statements make the language ambiguous. We've sat through many meetings with municipal politicians, developers and other interest groups during the development of the present Planning Act. The one thing everybody wanted was a clear set of rules: the municipalities so they could write clear plans, the developers so they could start to invest with some assurance of eventual success, and the rest of us that we could assist both the other groups without getting needlessly in the way. Just give us some clear, crisply stated rules so we can get the economy moving again.

Thirdly, deny planning approval to authorities with inadequate official plans. Your proposed revisions provide municipalities approval authority regardless of whether their plans are consistent with your policies. Why make the policies if you allow subject levels of government to ignore them? If your rules are good, you have the responsibility of requiring adherence to them.

Fourthly, allow ministries other than Municipal Affairs and Housing to appeal planning decisions to the Ontario Municipal Board. Municipal Affairs and Housing cannot administer all the areas of concern included in intelligent planning. Our other ministries are provincial assets in which we have made a large investment over many decades. To reject their expertise is to throw this investment away and limit the resources available in making fully considered planning decisions.

Under the rubric of economic revitalization, in developing fiscal policy for the province we must take the long view and not leap on short-term, Band-Aid solutions. We want sustained growth in this province, not just an early, convenient blip in our incomes. The "environment" in this context is not just a frill, a pretty picture out there to visit on weekends. It's our fundamental infrastructure, our necessary habitat, a precondition to effective economic development.

1530

Economic planning must take into account all costs, including the future cost of environmental remediation, should you, our leaders, make decisions which lead to the deterioration of this heritage infrastructure. Right now, we're in debt to international financiers. If we go wrong on maintaining our natural infrastructure, we will be putting ourselves in debt again for the eventual costs of cleanup of misguided decisions. Just look at eastern Europe. There, short-term economic planning destroyed rivers, cities and farms to the extent that the embryonic free economies are hamstrung by the massive cleanup necessary before they can even begin to approach our level of production and income.

Our recommendations in this area are:

Save wetlands, water recharge areas and other ecologically important areas. We don't want to wake up five years from now with dirty water, dying fields and choking cities and all the costs attendant on repairing those situations.

Restrict low-density, scattered development. Ensure that we won't have to blow our declining budgets in straining to provide services over huge areas of what used to be valuable farmland which can no longer contribute to our health and our income.

Finally, under grassroots community values, once we have clear rules for development, which will keep us from running up future debt, the best way to work within those rules is by making the development system locally responsive. Your government stands for a renaissance in our society, a reinvigoration of the idea of small, local groups as the fundamental building blocks of a caring society taking care of social needs through direct involvement. To carry this through, you must begin to smooth the way for the participation of citizens and their local societies rather than throwing up barriers to it.

Three recommendations in this area:

(1) Maintain the required public meetings at all levels of the process. The only way to strengthen local organizations is to give them authority. If you shut them out of the planning and development process, the social infrastructure you're seeking to develop will wither. Municipalities, developers and even yourselves will end up spending much more time and money on rear-guard action, assuaging the demands of shut-out citizens than you would if you simply took advantage of their contributions in the beginning.

(2) Maintain public appeals to the OMB. A fundamental tenet of a party attempting a Conservative restoration is that all citizens should have equal access to the mechanisms of power. To exclude citizens from the OMB implies that your government does not trust the average citizen.

(3) Finally, maintain public meetings for the approval of housing subdivisions. To remove the capability of citizens to comment on those developments which are most likely to directly affect their lives is a further imposition on their autonomy, which flies directly in the face of any vision of government founded upon responsiveness to community values.

Together, these recommendations will go a long way towards ensuring that your Planning Act truly reflects the exciting possibilities of the Conservative revolution. Please incorporate them so that we may live in a province with strong, fair rules, a healthy economic infrastructure and a strengthened network of locally responsible community service groups. We're behind you in these aspirations. Please let us know how we can help you to achieve them.

Mr Toni Skarica (Wentworth North): Regarding public appeals to the OMB, one thing that troubles me about the current system is how complicated and expensive it is. I don't know if you're familiar with the Sydenham Mills project in Grey county?

Mr. Ferguson: Glancingly. It was before my time.

Mr Skarica: Apparently there were months of debate, a review by an environmental assessment committee and then there were unknown tentacles which ended up in four weeks' worth of hearings before the OMB. Apparently the Ministries of Environment, Natural Resources and Municipal Affairs were all there. They were represented by legal counsel, there was an appellant there, there was a proponent there, they all had lawyers, there were consultants. They debated the merits. This thing went on, apparently, for quite some time and at the end of it the development was refused. Then we heard today that there was another development that was put either there or nearby after all that time and trouble.

So my concern is, surely there's got to be some way to make development more streamlined and less expensive, because ultimately, when you have these kinds of hearings it makes development far more expensive and the average taxpayer, the average citizen, is the one who has to pay for it.

Mr Ferguson: So what's your question?

Mr Skarica: My question is, do you have idea as to how we can streamline the present system so that we don't get into these endless hearings with lawyers and consultants and the expense that's involved?

Mr Ferguson: I think the first thing you shouldn't do is eliminate public participation. You may not be enamoured of lawyers and accountants and so on.

Mr Skarica: I'm one myself and I'm not.

Mr Ferguson: It's a difficult problem. You have to either decide to have hearings or not to have them. If you're going to have them, you have to make them open to everyone. You can't say that there's one class of citizen that's approved and one class of citizen that isn't. If there are going to be hearings about these things, then you must let anyone appear. Of course, your predecessor government went to the extent of providing funding for anyone who wanted to appear and didn't feel they could bear the costs of that which, you're right, are quite high.

I guess we're looking to you folks to come up with a vision of how to permit everyone to participate while at the same time shortening time and reducing costs. I think those are two valid aspirations or intentions which we've tried to meet during the development of the past act. But the way to do it isn't to cut out one half of the population, which is what you're attempting to do right now.

Mr Skarica: Perhaps you could give me some idea as to how you could have a more streamlined process, because to me the present system is unacceptable. When you have all these ministries and lawyers and endless hearings, it's just too expensive. As you've indicated, we just can't afford it.

Ms Churley: A 30% tax cut.

Mr Skarica: Sorry?

The Chair: Just looking for a fight.

Mr Skarica: I don't know this area as well as you do, obviously, and I'm just looking to you for guidance, all right? The present system is too bulky. How can we have a more streamlined system that will still satisfy your concerns?

Mr Ferguson: That was the intention of Bill 163, and to this point of course it hasn't really been tried.

Mr Skarica: It appears not to have worked, according to this last submission.

Ms Churley: It hasn't had a chance to work.

Mr Ferguson: No, it hasn't. Until we know that it's broke, let's not fix it, is what we're saying. Until we know that the OMB in its revised form is not working, why are you cutting out citizens' participation? If you're going to cut out someone, why not cut out the proponent rather than the objector? If there are two sides to the argument, why are you removing the possibility of one side of the argument making its case?

Mr Skarica: I'm looking to you for guidance. I'm asking you the question: What kind of system could you have that's more streamlined and cheaper than the one we have now but still satisfies the concerns?

Mr Ferguson: The thrust of the majority of our recommendations is to maintain the act in its present form and give it a chance. Let's get together and try to work things out, once we find out how it is working, and then come up with revisions. As I said in the beginning, good planning is done through setting the rules, using them, seeing how they work and then going back and looking at them. We haven't had that chance yet to see how the new act works.

The Chair: Now we move to the official opposition.

Mr Gerretsen: Oh, how I wish, Mr Chair.

The Chair: I did that just to tease you.

Mr Gerretsen: You put your finger right on it, because I'm as interested as my friend on the other side there in speeding up the process. But the one thing that this government, in this bill and in Bill 26, just hasn't been able to understand is that it's exactly the way you put it: Cutting one factor out of the equation, namely, the general public, not holding public meetings—that's not the answer; the answer is administrative. It takes too long to go through the various systems in our local town halls, in our planning departments, in our government departments. That's where the real problem lies, not in whether or not there should be a 20- or a 30-day appeal period. That's where they've got it totally wrong, as far as I'm concerned.

By the way, with this kind of document I'm sure that the government will hire you as a speechwriter, because the tone and flavour of it is I'm sure exactly what they're looking for.

But I wonder if you agree—it's the point that I've been trying to make for the last three days to the government members and to people who have been presenting here—that what they've basically done is listened to the municipalities and that the municipalities have said, "Just give us the final authority on a lot of this stuff and we'll somehow speed the process up." By doing that, they've taken appeals away from the OMB, where they should be as a final appellate body, as a final independent body, and they've also taken public meetings away in getting subdivisions approved, which to my way of thinking is absolutely absurd. Having zoning in place does not deal with the final product of what you may actually see there. I wonder if you could comment on that.

Mr Ferguson: That was our final point, its being the most fundamental. At least give people a chance to comment on things that are happening in their own backyards. In order to answer the previous question and yours at the same time, I think you're on the right track, which is to say that if we have, shall we say, three participants in the process—the municipalities, the developers and the public interest—then the way to streamline things isn't to just simply remove the participation of one third, but rather to streamline the participation of all three.

I don't have an immediate answer for that right now, and our intention is to try and get together. That's why we're saying "achieving the Conservative renaissance." That's why he thinks it's a good speech. We want to work with you guys to try and come up with revisions that make sense. But what we're saying is, let's not eliminate the participation of people who are fundamentally concerned in the process. Let's come up with administrative ways of streamlining it together.

Mr Gerretsen: One of the suggestions that has been made in these hearings is that, in a similar way that we are starting to hear more and more about alternative dispute resolution within the court system, we introduce a mediation process used before the hearings between, let's say, the developers, the interested citizens, the municipality. In some municipalities it's already done on an ad hoc basis and in some it's being done very effectively, I might add. Do you have any comments on that?

Mr Ferguson: That immediately raises the spectre of an additional level of process and level of bureaucracy.

Mr Gerretsen: I realize that, yes.

Mr Ferguson: But the intention should be to try and get people together in the beginning, as you say, modelled on the legal system, to say, "If it looks like we're going to have a dispute, let's get together in one room and let's try and hash this thing out," rather than getting all formal and expensive. It would be really nice to do that.

Mr Gerretsen: And to build true consensus, which is what the 42 years of Tory rule were all about.

Mr Ferguson: Or at least agreement, yes.

Mr Gerretsen: Exactly. Anyone else? No?

Mr Hampton: I want to say to you, Mr Ferguson, you've done an excellent job of exposing to the Conservative members of the committee the internal contradictions of their public statements on the one hand and their legislation on the other. It's an excellent job. I commend all members of the Conservative caucus to read this. It might help you down the road.

Mr Ferguson: That was my intention.

Mr Hampton: I wanted to ask you this. On page 2 you say, "We come before you because we fear you risk undercutting these admirable aspirations in your proposed revisions to the Planning Act which we and countless others across the province spent much time and effort improving over the past few years." I want to focus on the word "risk." If the government doesn't follow your sage advice here—I think it's very sage political advice—what do you think will be the result in terms of the planning that does occur out there and in terms of the kinds of battles that are going to occur as a result of the system that's now being proposed?

Mr Ferguson: I think the term "battle" probably hits it on the head. The problem is that as soon as you cut people out of a process, they become combative and they begin to try and make their feelings felt and you end up back in your corners—developers against people, municipalities against people, people against municipalities—which is precisely what we're trying to get away from. What we also end up doing then is hamstringing development in all of our jurisdictions.

What we want, just like we believe the Conservative government wants, is development. Up in Grey county we're dying. Our historical basis, agriculture, is falling apart. Our tourism, everybody wants to do tourism these days, but hopefully it would be of some use to us. Anybody looking at Grey county, at its history, at the legislation that's in place, at the official planning process that's in place, any person wanting to invest in that jurisdiction simply walks away. We can't get anybody to come up there and talk to us. Nobody wants to because they understand that the rules are so muddled, that the municipality and the citizens will be in fundamental disagreement because the rules are not understood. So what we're asking you to do is, set up some crystal-clear rules so that people will start coming to our various municipalities and start investing in them because they know what to expect, rather than muddling everything up again by putting together an act that's nowhere near as good as it used to be. We all want development. That's why we talk about not being environmentalists. We don't care about the environment except in so far as it benefits people, and right now our legislative environment is not benefiting the people of Grey county, and what you're proposing to do is going to wreck it even further. So please, get it together. That's my answer.

Mr Hampton: Do you know much about OMB decision times and OMB—

Mr Ferguson: I participated in a couple of them.

Mr Hampton: This might help answer some of the questions that have been raised by some of the Conservative members. It's my understanding that in fact the time to get a decision out of the OMB has come down, and it's come down significantly over the last three and a half years. In fact the OMB has started to remove a significant backlog that existed. It's my understanding the OMB has also put in place some administrative procedures which will allow them to give decisions even faster in the future.

Mr Ferguson: I believe you're right. And we're looking to the Conservative government, as presumably a small business and big business kind of government, to have the administrative wherewithal to be able to streamline these processes, as has already begun, in order that we can get going in this province. Don't throw us more muddled rules. Give us something to work with, so that our developers can do a good job for us. That's what we're after.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Hampton, and thank you, Mr Ferguson, for taking the time to make a presentation before us here this afternoon.

ONTARIO HOME BUILDERS' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next group up is the Ontario Home Builders' Association. Good afternoon.

Mr Ian Rawlings: First of all, my friend has abandoned me. My name is Ian Rawlings; I am a past president of the Ontario Home Builders' Association. I am here today because I have been given the burden of following through on a process that I guess I started when I was president of the association in 1991 with the Sewell commission.

For those of you who are not familiar with the Ontario Home Builders' Association, we're a voluntary association of companies that are involved in all aspects of the building industry. We represent approximately 3,500 member companies located in 35 local associations around the province. I understand the time I am allotted, sir, and I will be very brief.

You have already heard from our local association from Toronto earlier this week. I understand you'll be visiting locals of Sudbury, Ottawa, Cobourg and Hamilton. I think you'll find there will be a common theme of support for Bill 20 from representatives from our local associations in those areas. In that context, I think my time is best spent in, as I said, being brief and then having some discussion.

There are a couple of points I did want to emphasize. Specifically to begin with, you'll no doubt hear that the change back to "have regard to" from "be consistent with" will weaken the policies and cause great harm to the environment and other interests. I submit to you that this is unlikely to happen. As the minister explained on Monday, those features that are protected under the current system will still be protected under the proposed system, and I agree with his view. The change that's proposed recognizes nothing but a simple fact: Responsible land use planning must address a wide range of interests. Those interests frequently compete with each other.

For example, the more you restrict development to certain areas, the more valuable that developable land becomes, and the more valuable the land gets, the more expensive the homes you build on it become. The consequences, restrictions on land and land use, compete with the need to build low-cost housing. That does not mean you ignore one or the other, it means you have to balance the interests.

How you do that, quite frankly, when you must be consistent with each and every one of the policies, with the "be consistent with" framework, was never clear to me. I am a professional planner; I've practised for 20 years; it is clear to me that you must consider them, but there is a conundrum. You're also likely to hear that the removal of the requirement for public meetings for plans of subdivision will undermine public confidence in the system. Anyone who understands the process knows that this need not be the case. The public has plenty of opportunity to learn about a plan and give comments. There is, quite frankly, a level of planning and planning detail that makes a difference to the overall community. That is handled at the official plan stage, the official plan amendment stages, and zoning bylaws. There is then a level of detail that affects only those people who will actually live or work in the area being planned. This is in the plan of subdivision stage.

I want you to keep in mind, of course, that you do not get a subdivision if you do not have an official plan, or an official plan amendment, or a zoning bylaw. The drafters of Bill 163, in their zeal for openness and transparency, wanted the general public to be involved at all levels of detail. I submit to you, there is no reasonable justification for this.

You will also hear some groups say that prematurity should be restored as a basis for a municipality refusing to refer or for the Ontario Municipal Board dismissing appeals. The defence, I imagine, will be both articulate and impassioned, but I have to question why. Both the policies as they're proposed to be revised and the legislation provide ample safeguards to ensure that development does not outpace essential services. Why do we need yet another provision to guard against premature development? The question of whether an application is premature is a fundamental planning issue. It's not one that should be decided on the basis of prima facie evidence, and it is not one that should be decided without benefit of appeal.

I'd like to touch on a few things that I'd like to see changed in Bill 20. Certainly, the time frames for the process have been shortened, and that is good. One is still too long; I'm referring to the one for review of privately initiated official plan amendments that have been adopted by council. Under Bill 20, if the region does not exempt these plans from its review—and there's no reason to believe they will exempt them—they have 90 days to make a decision. That's 60 days too long; in fact, I would go further and say it's probably 90 days too long, but I'll get to that.

If the region insists on reviewing local council decisions, then they should have applications circulated to them concurrently so that they're in a position to make a decision within a very short period of time: 30 days, not 90. But the fundamental question that's raised, of why they might insist on the duplication, is not resolved. They will have an opportunity to review and comment while the local council is studying the application. If they think the council decision was made incorrectly, they can appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board, the same as everyone else, including the province. The process of allowing regions to review decisions of local councils has one of two effects: It either duplicates the review, or it shifts consideration of issues back to the end of the process. Either outcome is incompatible with effective streamlining.

The other issue that is avoided by Bill 20 and needs to be addressed is the ability to change conditions on draft approved plans of subdivision right up to the moment the plan receives final approval. This is too much like being able to change the rules of the game while it is being played. Some limits need to be placed on this.

I'll digress from my prepared remarks and give you an anecdote, if you'd like. In my view, "draft approval" is not the appropriate terminology; today, it's a "draft refusal with conditions." If that helps you understand the point, I offer that to you.

That covers some of the key planning issues on Bill 20 that I think are important. I want to say a few words about the amendments to the Development Charges Act.

Since the act was passed in 1989, development charges have doubled and tripled in many cities and towns around Ontario. I don't want to go into the reasons why they've escalated so quickly, at least not in my prepared remarks, but I do want to remind you that the policies associated with financing growth-related infrastructure were devised during a time of unprecedented growth. The policies today are out of step with the market conditions that exist and with the conditions that are likely to exist in the foreseeable future.

The amendments proposed, in my view, lay a groundwork for a fundamental review of the Development Charges Act that is badly needed by the home building industry, badly needed by the people who want to buy or rent homes in Ontario. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Gerretsen: Well, first of all, let me tell you that I've been involved with this kind of a situation over the last 25 years, both from the municipal viewpoint, from representing developers, home builders like yourself and from representing members of the general public that may want to have some input or may even object to a particular proposal. My own relationship with the home builders in my own community has always been quite good. As a matter of fact, I've got two plaques on the wall sort of attesting to that.

But I do take exception with your notion on public meetings with respect to subdivisions, and I realize where it's coming from. It's coming from the notion that you'd like to see the plans approved as quickly as possible, and I'm totally in favour of that. But surely you will agree with me that there is a major difference in getting the general public involved at a zoning or rezoning of a property or an official plan amendment, and having them actually see the result or what is actually being proposed for a particular area by way of a plan of subdivision. Would you not agree with me that once people actually know the layout of the particular development that's next to them, from past experience that you yourself have had, that they are much more likely to react to that either positively or negatively rather than in the abstract concept of a rezoning that takes place with respect to that property?

Mr Rawlings: I guess I would say I probably am going to disagree with you. I say that partly because my comments are made in the context of what I see to be some very significant improvements in terms of how planners—and I am a planner—plan. I think what we see before us is an opportunity to have planners perhaps do a better job of doing community design as part of the official plan process so that the fuzziness that perhaps has existed historically with those, as we used to call them, blobs and colours plans, has some better edge to it.

I believe with that context, and the fact that the process is a public process—superimposed over that is a process that identifies lot sizes and zoning and land uses, and traditionally uses things like roads as division lines between particular zones. Implicit and obvious in that statement is that there is a plan that has roads on it for that to happen. Quite frankly, once you reach the subdivision approval stage, without being glib, there's not much left than to talk about how many trees you're going to plant and where they're going to be planted on the front yard.

Mr Gerretsen: And where the park is going to be located.

Mr Rawlings: No, sir, I'm sorry. The park is zoned and it's in a zoning bylaw and it's very often identified in an official plan.

Mr Gerretsen: But not very specifically.

Mr Rawlings: I guess I go back to my early comment where I suggested to you that I see the process of planning now forcing us to define those things very concisely because they are, to a large extent, in many cases, environmentally driven—or for hazards or slopes and those things are going to be very well identified.

Mr Gerretsen: Let's just say it's different for different for different municipalities, I guess. That's what it basically boils down to.

Would you not agree with me that the real problem with respect to development in this province is not so much in actual time periods that are set out in legislation, but rather the lengthy time periods that it takes planning departments, city councils, the OMB, the various ministry offices to actually deal with a particular application? From a development viewpoint, quite often you don't want to rock the boat, particularly if it's coming your way, by holding them to the strict time lines in the legislation. Is that not where the real problem lies, that it takes five, six years to get a development approved in some cases where there really isn't any opposition?

Mr Rawlings: I think certainly that problem does exist. Is it the problem? Is it the entirety of the problem? I don't believe that's the case. I think there is a whole host of improvements that are being addressed by this legislation. Part of the improvement, quite frankly, is the time frames. The reality of out-on-the-ground practice very likely will be that those time frames, for the most part, are not adhered to strictly. They are there, quite frankly, as worst-case best defence, if I can describe it that way.

I think in many cases people are processing applications as best they can. Personally, I've been both a land developer and a consultant-planner for 20 years and I have been able to find instances where people might be taking longer than I wanted but there's a sincere effort being made. By the same token, I've encountered situations where people are being largely obstructionist, and at that point putting an appeal in is your best defence because at least there's closure to it and you've got the fundamental of a time frame. We now have more of them and I think that's part of the improvement to the system. I think it will be useful.

Mr Hampton: One of the things I've found confusing over the last three days—and in one of your paragraphs you get into it and you say, "The more you restrict development to certain areas, the more valuable that developable land becomes." We've had some groups come here and say: "Don't worry. There's lots of land that can be developed."

Mr Rawlings: I'm sure you have.

Mr Hampton: To do good planning, you should determine those areas that are of environmental importance or importance in terms of farm land and have those clearly identified so that people know the rules coming in, so that you don't spend a lot of time arguing about, is this environmentally sensitive or is this something that we ought to set aside for special management or is this something that is apt to be or is now important for agricultural purposes? Don't you think that's important? Doesn't that save you time in your work?

Mr Rawlings: Clearly it does. The easy instance for planners is when you have the obvious before you, which I think is the situation you were describing, where you have a community, perhaps you need to expand the urban envelope, you look around your edges and you find that on one side of your community it's prime agricultural land, you look on the other side and it's a prime mineral aggregate resource, you look at the other side and it's wetlands and groundwater recharge area, and you find on the fourth side that there's nothing of very much redeeming value. That's a pretty easy decision I would suggest to you. What isn't so easy is when you find the fourth side also has some significance to it. The consequence of being consistent with all of the policies is that you can't touch the agriculture, you can't touch the mineral aggregate, you can't touch the wetlands, and for argument's sake let's say there's a heritage resource on the fourth side—you can't touch that.

Now what do you do? You need to grow. You have families. You have businesses that want to open in your city. They want to have people live to make their widgets, work behind their cash register. You'd like them to live close to their place of work. What does one do? It's the conundrum where you've tried, looked and found that you're surrounded by significant and important competing uses for that particular piece of land. Now, how do you reconcile?

Mr Hampton: How do you reconcile that?

Mr Rawlings: When you have legislation that says you shall be consistent and respect all of those, you're stuck.

Mr Hampton: I think what people would probably say in those kinds of situations, and I'd be interested in your response, is that you are going to reach limits. Whether they're naturally imposed or, in some cases, imposed by government being cautious about the future, you're going to reach limits where there may not be any further growth spread in a given area. I happen to live in a place like that. It's surrounded on three and a half sides by water, okay? And then you move further.

But it seems to me that you're still better served if you know going in what the rules are, if you know going in that you don't spend six months, six years arguing, "Well, what about this piece of land?" Isn't that helpful to all concerned? We know what the ground rules are, so now let's look at where development can take place and let's do it speedily and efficiently and effectively and in the least costly way.

Mr Rawlings: I think what we're looking at is a model here that would allow some judgement to be exercised, and I think where judgement is necessary, one should be able to make those judgements. I firmly believe that that should be part of the process, and that it is best made at the local level. It is too simple to bring down the tablets from the mount and hand them to everybody across the province. It doesn't work. I think the easy situations will resolve themselves quite easily. The difficult situations will be the true test of the planning profession and the political leaders of the particular community. But I firmly believe that the exercise of judgement has to be part of this process.

Mr Hardeman: First of all, I'd like to deal with the issue of the public hearings for plan for subdivision. I personally have had a number of years' experience, as has Mr Gerretsen, in the municipal field dealing with applications. I've also been involved with the citizens who wanted to be involved with the application. Unfortunately, I never had the opportunity to be a land developer, or a developer of any kind, as Mr Gerretsen was.

Mr Gerretsen: Maybe you will one day, Ernie. I'm sure you will. Stick around.

Mr Hardeman: So I'll have to ask you as a representative of that group. In the local planning that I was involved with, the zoning application for a plan of subdivision was usually subsequent to a draft plan approval to deal with where the subdivision was going to be put. Is that a reasonable assumption?

Mr Rawlings: Sometimes it has occurred that way. I think there have been a number of different approaches to achieving the same end. Yes, in fact you can get draft plan approval with a condition that the approval is subject to having zoning put into place that would implement that subdivision, so in this case you'd have the very detailed plan dealt with before you deal with the zoning. In many cases for the purpose of contracting a process, they are, as I say it, overlapped, they're run concurrently so that you would have a subdivision application moving forward together with a zoning application, so that in essence they're both before council, the region, the approval authority and the public at the same time. Those opportunities exist. They would still exist under the model before us and before the committee today.

Mr Baird: Your 3,500 members, would they primarily be big business or small business?

Mr Rawlings: No, I would say they pretty much run the gamut of work out of a pickup truck; one mom-and-pop operation; there are some large public real estate companies; there are manufacturers of construction products; there are consultants like myself.

Mr Baird: I appreciate your comments on page 1, when you stated the need to create a balance of interests. I guess one of the key elements of this is to create such a balance between interests. In your expert opinion, what impact will this legislation have on job creation and economic growth?

Mr Rawlings: My view of the bill is that it will be a certain and measurable improvement over a process that is clearly—and I'm not subjecting one to the other; we have two, and some guys older than me will say you've had more than that. So clearly I see this as being an improved process. To the extent that it allows people to bring product on stream quicker, I see the opportunity existing to get back to work people who are waiting for projects to be approved, and in some municipalities there are projects waiting to be approved. Perhaps in our neck of the woods there are not so many of them. In Ottawa, it's a pretty tough town right now.

Mr Baird: It's a tough time.

Mr Rawlings: You betcha. But I clearly see an opportunity here for some tremendous economic stimulus to be gained from getting our industry back to work.

Mr Gerretsen: On a point of information, Mr Chairman: I think Mr Hardeman put his finger right on it, that different municipalities require different things for rezoning. In some cases, you do need a draft plan of subdivision so that people know what's happening, and in other cases, rezonings can be done with very, very little actual physical subdivision plan information. That's really the whole point. If everybody approached it the same way, there would be no problem. A lot of municipalities don't.

The Chair: Let's not undertake a debate, shall we, but thank you for your comments, Mr Gerretsen. Mr Rawlings, thank you. I appreciate your taking the time to make a presentation before us today.

PHILIP BYER

The Chair: Our next presentation will be from Professor Philip Byer, department of civil engineering, University of Toronto. Good afternoon.

Dr Philip Byer: Good afternoon and thank you for the opportunity to speak to you today about Bill 20 and the land use planning and approval process in Ontario.

I come to speak to you with three backgrounds. First, I'm a professional engineer and professor of civil engineering working in the area of project evaluation and environment planning.

Secondly, as the past chair of the Ontario Environmental Assessment Advisory Committee, I became involved in a number of cases dealing with the Planning Act. I'll return to that later in my submission.

Finally, I'm a parent who wants his children to live in a province that is healthy economically and environmentally. I want them to be able to afford their own homes. For example, I love my children but I don't want them to be living with me when they're 40 years old. I also want them to have a quality of life that requires that we protect our rich natural heritage.

This brings me to Bill 20. I am greatly concerned that passage of Bill 20 as it is will lead to a very different and worse Ontario, one where inappropriate development destroys or degrades important environmental resources such as wetlands, fisheries, rivers and forests, and where the costs of infrastructure and services to support this development place a high and unnecessary cost to our children.

This future for Ontario is not one that many would like, and none of this is necessary. I am convinced that we can have both economic growth and protection of environmentally significant features from sound land use planning.

In my submission I would like to focus on four basic and interrelated concerns about Bill 20:

(1) Weakening of provincial policy statements by going back to requiring that municipalities only "have regard" to these policies.

(2) Weakening of requirements for the contents of official plans.

(3) Delegation of important approval decisions to municipalities that may not have the understanding or incentives to protect important natural features or consider the long-term economic costs of some development.

(4) Inadequate time for consideration of official plan amendments and plans of subdivision that, one by one, can subvert the intent and vision of an approved official plan.

I will return to these later.

I'd like now to back up and explain my background and experiences that lead me to these concerns. As I mentioned, I was chair of the Ontario Environmental Assessment Advisory Committee. The committee was established in 1983 to increase public input to decisions by the Minister of the Environment on the application of the Environmental Assessment Act. I was appointed a member of the committee in 1985 and then as chair in 1986, and I continued as chair until last fall when the committee was terminated.

During the 1980s and early 1990s the minister received numerous requests that land development proposals be made subject to the Environmental Assessment Act. Many of these requests to use the EA Act were based on public concerns that the requirements under the Planning Act were inadequate to protect the environment. In a number of these cases, the minister asked the committee to carry out public reviews. These included cases dealing with land developments on wetlands and forested areas, on the lake front, over old dump sites, and around a sensitive headwater and a recreational lake.

We also carried out public reviews in the Ganaraska watershed and in Grey county of the more general issue of the adequacy of the Planning Act to protect the environment, and finally, we carried out public reviews of a number of road, water and sewage projects tied to land development decisions. We saw the land use planning and approvals process in action, with conflicts within communities, delays in decision-making and threats to the environment.

In almost all of these land development projects, we did not believe the use of the EA Act was appropriate or necessary, but we heard significant, valid concerns about the land use planning process. This included the lack of clear and meaningful provincial policies, the cumulative effects of official plan amendments, the need for much better information on environmental resources and the economic effects of development alternatives, and the need to control site preparation prior to approvals.

These issues were addressed by the Commission on Planning and Development Reform and the subsequent changes to the Planning Act, to both streamline the process and provide better protection to the environment. Similarly, I assume we all want at least four things from the land use planning process: first, efficient review of applications and approval of development proposals that are in the long-term public interest; second, infrastructure and servicing that is economically efficient; third, protection of environmentally significant resources; and finally, meaningful public involvement in planning decisions that may affect them.

Bill 20 will probably achieve the first objective, efficient review and decision-making, but will likely fail with respect to the other three. As I stated earlier, I believe that Bill 20, as it is, will over time give us an Ontario that is much poorer in terms of environmental quality and costs to future generations.

I would now like to briefly discuss each of my four main areas of concern about Bill 20.

(1) Inadequate status of provincial policy statements: In the past, decision-making in many controversial cases could have been greatly speeded up if there had been clear, firm, provincial direction through policies under the Planning Act such as the one related to development near wetlands. Many developers have stated to me in public hearings that it's better to have clear, strict rules rather than unclear, loose ones, since the latter create uncertainties and delays in approvals, which are critical factors in development.

Proponents, municipalities, government reviewers and the public need to know the rules of the game so they do not waste their valuable time and money arguing unnecessarily over the protection of environmental features. Some things should be protected and others needn't be, and the appropriate level to make these basic decisions is not with each development proposal but through provincial or municipal policies.

I believe that environmental features can be put into three categories. First, those that are insignificant to those outside the municipality. Protection of these resources should be left to the sole discretion of the local decision-makers. Second, those that have some significance and we would like to protect, but protection must be weighed against other objectives—here provincial policies could help direct the local decision-makers but the final decision would still be left to them. This is what we would get with the policy statements under Bill 20. Finally, there are environmental resources that are of such importance that the province should protect them through meaningful policy statements. But Bill 20 does not allow the province to establish such a level of protection.

Policies to protect the environment must be different from many other types of policies such as economic ones. Economic policies can be tried, and if they don't work, then we adjust them. Unfortunately, weak environmental policies can result in the destruction of significant and sensitive features, and once lost to development, they are lost forever.

I therefore strongly urge you to amend Bill 20 to allow for two levels of environmental policies under the act: ones that give provincial direction but may be overridden, in other words, the ones that are to "have regard to"; but add those that will provide true protection, as we could get with requiring decisions "to be consistent with."

(2) Inadequate requirements for contents of official plans: There can be a great deal of variation between contents and degree of detail in official plans for different areas. Differences are obviously necessary to reflect differences between municipalities. However, there are certain elements that are necessary to inform and direct more specific planning decisions, for example, objectives and policies to direct physical change and manage environmental impacts. Clarity of objectives and policies should help streamline decision-making. Yet Bill 20 weakens this requirement.

These are also important to help avoid unnecessary duplication with the Environmental Assessment Act. Currently planning and approval of municipal infrastructure, such as major roads and sewers, must go through the environmental assessment process, yet this approval is divorced from the development plans that such infrastructure supports. The basic decisions on such infrastructure should be made at the official plan level rather than through an environmental assessment of individual projects.

(3) Delegation of important decision-making power to municipalities: Bill 20 allows for further delegation of certain important decision-making powers to municipalities. Unfortunately, many municipalities lack the staff and expertise to properly review applications, and this will get worse with the downsizing. It will also be more difficult for municipalities to turn to expertise in the provincial government with the cutbacks.

More problematic and more difficult to deal with is the incentive that often exists for municipalities to approve developments for perceived short-term economic benefits at the expense of long-term protection of the environment and long-term costs of infrastructure and servicing.

Finally, development decisions often create environmental effects outside of the jurisdiction such as downstream in the watershed. There needs to be decision-making at the level appropriate to the extent of the environmental impacts.

(4) Inadequate time for consideration of development proposals: An official plan, if it is to mean something, must have some permanence. Official plan amendments, while often necessary, can cumulatively erode the original long-term intent of a plan. Bill 20 gives too little time for constrained municipalities and the interested local public to review such OPAs. I'm concerned that inappropriate developments will simply be approved under the threats of the deadline or of the developer going to the Ontario Municipal Board.

As you can see, these issues are interrelated and must be considered together. For example, the delegation of authority can be appropriate if there are strong, clear provincial policies to direct this authority and if there are adequate resources for reviews.

In conclusion, I believe that Bill 20 will only achieve half of its purpose. The title on the bill states that it is, "An Act to promote economic growth and protect the environment." It may, and hopefully will, promote economic growth, but it will not protect the environment. This is sad since we actually can have both. Thank you.

Ms Churley: I regret that I missed, Dr Byer, the first part of your presentation. I should tell you, first, that I now call this bill the environmental destruction bill. It's more—

Interjection.

Ms Churley: Well, actually, I think my title fits the bill, so to speak, better than the official title, from what we're hearing.

I wanted to talk to you about, and I don't know if you have any knowledge of this, consultation by this government with environmental advisory groups. I know some have been disbanded, which you personally have some experience with, but the environmental groups, citizens groups, overall, do you have any knowledge of that?

Dr Byer: I don't have any. I certainly know, through the contacts that I have, that there seems to be a closed door. I don't know of anyone who has been consulted on the bills prior to the bills being put forward. I don't know of anyone who is being consulted on legislation that will affect the environment. I could be wrong, but that's certainly my impression.

Ms Churley: I don't know if you covered it or not, but I'd like to ask you your opinion on what the government is calling the coordination role of the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing, as that minister being the only who can appeal to the OMB, and that the Minister of Environment and Energy and the Minister of Natural Resources will no longer have that option.

We haven't had a clear answer from the minister as to what role both these other ministries will have, and I'm still looking to get a very clear, concise answer that they will have a strong role. But right now, I fear very much, because I've been there, I've been in government, I know that there are various pressures on each minister, and there's a great fear that the ministers of Environment and Natural Resources, particularly with staff layoffs in both ministries, are not going to have a say in that. I wonder if you have an opinion.

Dr Byer: There are cases where other ministries have appealed to the OMB or at least, let's say, their concerns have been the cause of a case going to the OMB. I can think of the Ministry of Natural Resources, for example.

I think the clout within government of one minister—these are from my experiences under the Environmental Assessment Act and the types of cases that I talked about—I think quite frankly the threat of one minister to another minister, if you want to call it a threat, that they're thinking about going to the OMB would cause quite a bit of concern and a serious or a second look at some development proposal.

I don't think, from a practical level, that one ministry actually goes and appeals over the objections of another one. That's my experience. But I'm more concerned about the public having the right, and for there to be appropriate review within ministries of development proposals, and their reviews be put on the public record.

Ms Churley: I understand, but what you just said, though, is one of my concerns. In the past, the Minister of Municipal Affairs knew that the Minister of Environment and Energy or Natural Resources could cause a lot of trouble by threatening to appeal.

Dr Byer: That's right. I think that was valuable.

Ms Churley: So there was an incentive for that minister, the Minister of Municipal Affairs, to sit down and really listen and try to work out the differences and make some compromises. But now, without that ability, we're not assured that they will come in and, say, give information to the public, be able to express publicly even if they disagree with where the development is going. That is my concern. I have no problem with trying to coordinate and streamlining it, but I have a serious concern about those two ministries being shut out and not being able to express concerns about environmental problems.

Mrs Fisher: Professor, I'm from a rural riding, and just so you know my background a little bit, I have been a 15-year member of a conservation authority board of directors. I also was on a planning committee of county council. I do believe there needs to be a very firm balance between fairness and opportunities for all Ontarians with respect to good planning and not knee-jerk reaction to planning. So I concur that we should be looking ahead to the future and taking into consideration as well the environmental aspects.

However, I would also argue that the environment under this act will remain protected, with the same regulations for the implications resulting around ANSIs or wetlands or setbacks on Great Lake waterways, 15-metre to 45-metre setbacks. I could tell you, in my riding, for example, I have 40 ANSIs. We have the Niagara Escarpment. We have multiple provincial parks, national park designation, two native reserves and the 15-metre to 45-metre setback all along the lakeshore, and I'm surrounded by water on three sides.

So if you were living in my community, knowing that that is there now, with the regulations and laws that were in place for the last number of governments and number of years, I would think that our government at a local level has acted very responsibly to take into consideration, given the list I've just read you, environmental concerns in the Bruce. Would you agree with that?

Dr Byer: I don't know the planning in the Bruce, but if it's as you describe it, that's wonderful. I think the purpose of the legislation would be to make sure that other jurisdictions provide the same level of environmental protection for significant resources. There are areas that I've seen where that has not happened and the Planning Act did not provide that protection.

Mrs Fisher: Well, the Planning Act is the same for all areas, in terms of it may differ in how it's implemented; there's no question. We, as a government, believe the local level government should decide the planning aspects and the environmental protection of all areas in Ontario. You've raised a point in your brief with regard to two levels of approvals as they relate to environmental issues. I've just given an example where the acts are the same for everybody relating to many of the environmental issues in Ontario, and it seems to have worked. Why do you think it can't work?

Dr Byer: I think you've missed something. The act provides minimum requirements. If a municipality or the planning jurisdiction, for example, in Bruce wants to provide a higher level of environmental protection or a higher level of planning, that's great, that's fine. But where the crunch comes, where the conflicts come are where municipalities are either just at the edge of the Planning Act requirements or, quite frankly, subverting them, and I've seen it. You can have lawyers reading it, but I've seen cases, because there's so much subverting the intent, the spirit, even if they might be meeting the legal requirements.

With respect to the local decision-making, I agree with you. Most decisions should remain at the local level. But there are environmental resources and features that go way beyond that, so that if we leave everything to the local level, we will see in 10, 20, 30 years that many of the things we cherish now will not be there.

Mrs Fisher: My question in closing would be, would it not be better then to identify those and put those into the act under the decision-making capacity of the local level, as opposed to creating a two-tiered bureaucracy in terms of an environmental issue at this level, or environmental issue at this level has two ways of process. I prefer a local level decision-making capacity, but I prefer also to protect the environment. Maybe what we need to be doing here is looking at those areas that you might be able to identify of provincial decision-making necessity, as opposed to those local, and include those in the act as opposed to two-tiered decision-making.

Dr Byer: Let me give you an example of wetlands. We've been fairly clear. It's been fairly, I won't say easy but at least it's been done, to rate wetlands on a scale, and it's served us I think quite well, where we have insignificant wetlands, regionally significant wetlands and provincially significant wetlands. We can do that for a lot of other environmental features. It's difficult, but I think we have to try.

If we can do that, let's take the ones that are not significant and leave it up to the local municipality; regionally significant can be at a different level of decision-making and approval; but provincially significant, there are aspects of that also that need strong provincial protection. And there are environmental effects that go beyond, for example, downstream of a municipality. We cannot leave all decisions up to municipalities when the effects go beyond them. If one municipality is upstream and wants to do development, but the effects of that development through erosion into the stream and so on create problems downstream, they should not have sole decision-making authority.

Mr Gerretsen: To just give my friends an indication as to how it's affecting my area, which is eastern Ontario, the map has been significantly changed so that much of eastern Ontario is eliminated entirely from the area where wetlands are protected. Somebody made that decision. I know my conservation authority is concerned about that. Other people in the area are concerned about that. It just happened in a new statement. Nobody knows where it came from. You just try to explain that one to me.

If I could take up your time up for just a moment, because it leads into a question to you, sir, we've just had a perfect indication how rezoning applications are dealt with in different parts of the province in different ways. In some areas, you can only get a rezoning if, in effect, you give the whole plan of subdivision in detail etc. In other areas of Ontario, and I know this for a fact, you can get rezonings with very little detail as to what you actually want to put on the land, and the first time that people actually see it is when a subdivision proposal comes forward. That is a fact.

We can get political about that and argue about that, but I'm telling you that is a fact. In that particular case where somebody can get a rezoning in the abstract, if I can put it that way, if you're taking the public meeting concept away from when the subdivision comes forward, it means the local community will have absolutely no input and won't know what's going to go on that site until after it's a fait accompli. That is a fact—not a political statement, but a fact.

I wonder if you have any comment on that kind of situation that can develop under the new rules, because the methods in which rezonings and OP amendments are being handled by the various councils throughout this province are not the same. Do you have any comments on that, sir?

Dr Byer: Not at the direct level of the rezonings, for example. I have seen quite a bit of variation in terms of the approval process and, most importantly, the level of information that different municipalities require up front. That's why I think it's important to have minimum standards in effect in official plans, that all official plans be required to have a certain process or information for rezonings.

But I want to get to something that has come up, I think, through your question and through Ms Churley's question, which has to do with the role of ministries.

With the obvious downsizing of government, there is going to be less—it was difficult enough before to get government ministries to do reviews of zoning applications or official plan amendments. It's probably going to be impossible now, certainly not in the time lines that are available. If we look at the downsizing and the tight time frames, basically it won't happen.

Where does that leave us? It leaves us with the public needing to see this information as early as possible, and that's a heck of a burden on us.

Mr Gerretsen: I wonder if you could comment on this, sir. The one-window approach is at first sight a recommended thing from my viewpoint, so that people will know what ministry to go to to get the necessary information. However, it is extremely important in my view that if the other ministries are still going to play an active role in this, a memorandum of understanding be established between the various ministries, a protocol memorandum as to how the concerns of the other ministries will in effect be brought forward.

Otherwise, a lot of the concerns are going to be finessed if there's only one view that comes out of the ministry; for example, if the Ministry of Environment has a concern that it really feels strongly about, that there will be an understanding that the Minister of Municipal Affairs, who will be the only agency that will be allowed to make the official appeal, will do so and that it will not be something that will be internally negotiated without any input from the developer, from the municipality, or indeed from the general public. Do you share that concern?

Dr Byer: I share the basic concern of where the Ministry of Municipal Affairs or the municipalities are going to get the information they need about the economic and environmental effects of applications. I honestly don't know where it's going to come from. Municipalities are not going to have the staff to be able to do this.

If on the one hand you want economic growth, if there's an increase in development applications—right now maybe they can handle it because there aren't many, but I can just see everything crashing down so that there are going to be municipalities that will be approving these applications because they can't do anything other than that, they don't have the studies to show not to approve them. That's basically what I think is going to happen.

The Chair: Thank you, Professor. We appreciate your making a presentation before us here today.

I'm sorry, committee, I should have noted that before the professor on your agenda was the North York Inter-agency and Community Council. They cancelled earlier this afternoon. The clerk has just received a phone call that our next group, from the CAW, has also cancelled. Sorry for the lack of notice, but that would appear to conclude the agenda items for today. The committee stands adjourned until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The committee adjourned at 1640.

URBAN DEVELOPMENT INSTITUTE/ONTARIO

The Vice-Chair (Mrs Barbara Fisher): Good morning, everybody, and welcome to the resources development committee considering the new Bill 20. Only a minute behind this morning, but with a quorum here we can start. I welcome you to our hearing process. Just so we understand the conditions or the terms on which we can work here, each of the presenters will be allocated a 25-minute period to be used as you see fit. If you would like question-and-answer at the end, make sure to leave time for that. That time will be divided evenly to give each of the parties an opportunity to ask questions. If you'd like to introduce yourselves, please.

Mr Jack Winberg: Thank you, Madam Chair and members of the committee. My name is Jack Winberg and I am the immediate past chair of the Urban Development Institute. To my left is Lucy Stocco, the current chair of the board of directors of the Urban Development Institute of Ontario.
